APPEAL by the appellant society from a judgment of the High Court of Judicature at Fort William in Bengal (delivered Apr. 24, 1945, and reported [1945] 13 I.T.R. 295), answering in the affirmative a question of law submitted to it by the Assam Board of Agricultural Income Tax, namely, whether the society was chargeable to Assam agricultural income tax in respect of the cultivation and/or manufacture at its Assam estate of tea and sale exclusively to its members. The appeal was dismissed. The facts appear in the judgment.

The Board took time for consideration.

Apr. 27. The following judgment of the Board was delivered by LORD NORMAND : The appellant, a society incorporated in the United Kingdom under the Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1893, submits to review in this appeal a judgment of the High Court at Fort William in Bengal in a reference made under s. 28 (1) of the Assam Agricultural Income Tax Act, 1939. By that judgment the High Court answered in the affirmative a question of law submitted by the Board of Agricultural Income Tax in relation to the assessment of the appellant for the year 1939-40. The question is "whether the society is chargeable to Assam agricultural income tax in respect of the cultivation and/or manufacture of tea at its Deckiajuli estate in the province of Assam, and sold to its members." The question is neither grammatical nor intelligible as it stands, and the statement of facts omits to state some of the facts regarded by the parties as material for the decision of the question which the Board seems to have intended to submit.

That question emerges clearly enough from a consideration of the proceedings which took place while the company's assessment was under consideration. The Assam Agricultural Income Tax Act, 1939, applies to all agricultural income derived from land situated in the province of Assam (s. 5) and it provides by the charging section (s. 3) that agricultural income tax at the rate specified in the annual Assam Finance Acts shall be charged for each financial year on the total agricultural income of the previous year. The part of the definition section (s. 2) which is relevant to the present case defines agricultural income as any income derived from land used for agricultural purposes by agriculture. The Indian Income Tax Act, 1922, s. 4 (3) (viii), contains a definition of agricultural income in the same terms, but by the Indian Income Tax Rules, 1922, r. 24, made under it: "Income derived from the sale of tea grown and manufactured by the seller in British India shall be computed as if it were income derived from business and 40 per cent. of such income shall be deemed to be income profits and gains liable to tax." The scheme of the Assam Act is to tax the remaining 60 per cent. only of the income derived from the sale of tea grown and manufactured by the seller in Assam and that result is secured by suitable provisions which need not be recited: see the explanation to s. 2, the proviso to s. 8, and r. 5 made under the Act. Under the Act appeals against assessment lie to the assistant commissioner of agricultural income tax (s. 24) and from him to the commissioner (s. 26). When a question of law arises in the course of any assessment the Assam Board of Agricultural Income Tax may, either of its own motion or on reference from any agricultural income tax authority subordinate to it, draw up a statement of the case and refer it with its own opinion to the High Court (s. 28).

The procedure which led to the reference under s. 28 can be briefly summarised. While the assessment was under consideration the appellant petitioned the Board of Agricultural Income Tax, Assam, to state a Case to the High Court. The petition stated that the appellant society was a co-operative society incorporated under the Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1893, and that the tea produced on its estates belonged to and was distributed entirely to its members, except certain inferior grades of dust teas which were sold in the Calcutta market, and that no profit accrued by such sales as the prices obtained were below the cost of production. The petition also stated that the question of law was whether the appellant society, owning tea estates in Assam, the produce of which is distributed only among its members, is liable to assessment to Assam income tax. The Board refused the prayer of the petition, but subsequently changed its view and of his own motion the Board member stated the present Case. It is unfortunate that he neither consulted the parties about the facts which were necessary to raise the supposed question of law, nor about the formulation of the question of law itself. For some reason he rejected the formulation suggested in the petition and substituted a question of his own. As the accompanying statement of facts merely stated that the tea produced by the appellant society (apart from the dust tea) was sold to its members and said nothing of the price, it can be inferred that the Board member intended to submit the question whether a business carried on by a society or company, whether incorporated or not, which cultivates produce on its own land and sells it exclusively to its own members, is by its nature incapable of begetting profits as that term is understood in the Assam Agricultural Income Tax Act, 1939, or, since there is no distinction on this point, the Indian or the United Kingdom Income Tax Acts. It is unfortunate that this question is presented in an abstract and general way without any statement of facts setting out or summarising the society's accounts for the year of computation. The statement of facts is also defective for, besides failing to refer to the price at which the tea was sold, it omits to mention certain loans made to the appellant society by its members to which the appellant's counsel attached much importance. This Board was urged by both parties to proceed with the appeal as if the statement of facts contained in the judgment of GENTLE, J., in the High Court were substituted for the findings of fact in the submission. It is with reluctance that their Lordships would grant such an indulgence, but, taking into account the circumstances that the present case began not long after the Assam Agricultural Income Tax Act, 1939, came into operation, and making allowance for the lack of experience which may have been the cause of the inadequate presentation of the case in the submission, they will accede to the parties' request.

The facts as stated by GENTLE, J., are ([1945] 13 I.T.R. 295, 303) :

As previously mentioned the society is incorporated in the United Kingdom under the Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1893. It has an unlimited capital divided into shares of £5 each. It is non-resident in British India. Its objects, as set out in its rules, inter alia, are : "To carry on the business of planters, growers, producers, merchants and manufacturers and brokers of tea." The society consists of two members, viz., the Co-operative Wholesale Society, Ltd. and the Scottish Co-operative Wholesale Society, Ltd. The society owns the Deckiajuli estate where it grows and manufactures tea. Except a small portion of produce, which is unfit for export and which is sold locally, the whole of the society's output of tea is sold to its two members at market rates and is exported to England and Scotland. Each year the members of the society pay, by way of advances to the society, sums of money to meet the cost of tea to be supplied by the society to the members. The market prices of the tea, with which the members are supplied, are debited against these payments. The supplies are recorded as sales to the members. Out of the proceeds from the sales, the expenses of production and management and the interest on loans are paid or provided. By the rules of the society its net profits are applied (a) in depreciation of land (except agricultural land and tea gardens), buildings, live and rolling stock ;

(b) payment of interest not exceeding 6 per cent. per annum on the share capital; (c) appropriation to a reserve fund; (d) appropriation to a special fund for making grants as determined in general meeting; (e) payment of a dividend to members rateable in proportion to the amount of purchases made by them from the society; and (f) the remainder, if any, carried forward to the next account.

An argument was addressed to their Lordships by counsel for the appellant in which the advances made annually by the two members to the society were treated as contributions by the members in cash which afterwards came back to them in kind when the tea was sold to them. This is a view of the transaction which their Lordships cannot accept. The advances were a loan to the society for the purpose of enabling it to produce tea on its own land. When the tea was produced it was sold to the lenders, and the price was set off against the amount of the loan. There was, therefore, a dual relationship between the appellant and its members—there was a mutual creditor-debtor relationship and there was a buyer and seller relationship. There was nothing notional about either of these relationships. They were not mere conventional machinery to give efficacy to a relationship which was, in substance, that of principal and agent. On the facts stated the members genuinely made a loan to the appellant, the appellant genuinely owned the land which it itself genuinely cultivated, and it genuinely sold the tea at a genuine market price to its members.

The statement of facts shows that, in the ordinary sense of the word, profits might well result, for the proceeds of the sales might and probably did exceed the expenses of production and management and the interest on loans; that profits would result was, in fact, contemplated; and there are rules providing for the application of the net profits. These rules are made under the Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1893, s. 10, which contemplates that a society registered under the Act will be a profit-making concern, and, therefore, requires that all societies registered under the Act shall make such rules. The application of net profits which may be made under the rules is, in essentials, not different from the application of net profits which might be made by any trading company, and it need not result in the distribution of all profits among the members of the society. Thus, any net profits applied under heads (a), (c), (d) and (f) would be retained by the appellant society. When the constitution, rules and business practice of the appellant society so closely conform to the pattern of an ordinary profit-making concern, how can it plausibly be maintained that no profits can result? The answer to this question is to be found, if anywhere, in English and Scottish Joint Co-operative Wholesale Society v. Madras Income Tax Comr. (1), a case under the Indian Income Tax Act, 1922, decided in the High Court at Madras, in which it was held, on facts indistinguishable from those stated by GENTLE, J., in this case, that this very society was a purely mutual co-operative society making no profits and, being within the ruling of New York Life Insurance Co. v. Styles (2), was not liable to be assessed to income tax. It is on this decision that the appellants found their claim to exemption from the Assam Agricultural Income Tax Act. The High Court in the present case refused to follow the Madras decision and GENTLE, J., after considering it, Styles' case (2), and other authorities, expressed himself thus ([1945] 13 I.T.R. 295, 308):

In the view which I hold, the society is a trading concern and carries on business as growers, manufacturers and sellers of tea; out of this business it derives profits; the dividends which it pays to its members are a distribution amongst them of its trading profit; and the payments of these dividends are not a return to the members of balances from the sums which they have subscribed to the society . . . The circumstance that the society's produce is sold to its members does not affect the position and would not do so even if the society were restricted to selling to its members alone.

In English and Scottish Joint Co-operative Wholesale Society v. Madras Income Tax Comr. (1) COUTTS TROTTER, C.J., expressed the opposing view, which is the view now supported by the appellant's counsel. He says (3 I.T.C. 385, 396):

Before its incorporation there existed two large co-operative societies in Great Britain, one in England known as the Wholesale Co-operative Society, Ltd., and the other in Scotland known as the Scottish Co-operative Society, Ltd. They were co-operative societies of the familiar type which deliver goods to their members on a system the object of which is to eliminate the profits of the middleman as between those societies and their individual members. The goods they were to distribute to their members the societies had of course to purchase in the market. A portion of the goods so distributed were products of southern India, notably tea. The idea then occurred that a further elimination of outside profits could be effected by producing their own tea and other products. Accordingly the corporation now sought to be assessed was founded with the object of acquiring and working estates in various parts of the world including southern India to supply the two original co-operative societies with the goods they required direct . . . In fact the only shareholders in the English and Scottish society are the two original co-operative societies registered in England and Scotland respectively and the object of the society sought to be assessed is simply to run the estates, grow the produce required and ship it to the two component societies which are its shareholders . . . The society cannot make taxable profits out of its own component elements, and, with that starting point established, it is to my mind immaterial that the monies that came into the hands of the apex society are distributed in the form in part of a dividend to the shareholders so long as those shareholders do not include any person or body who is not a member of the co-operative society.

He, therefore, concluded that the case fell within the principle of Styles' case (2). The foregoing passage has been cited in extenso lest injustice should be done to it by condensing it in a summary. The learned Chief Justice has treated the motive for setting up the appellant society as material. There was in the case no finding about the motive, and the learned Chief Justice has assumed it, but motive is altogether irrelevant. The component members may have wished and intended that middlemen's profits should be eliminated, but the question is whether profits have, in fact, been earned by the appellant society which they set up. The learned Chief Justice has also failed to notice that tea grown on estates which belonged to the appellant society was not tea which the members could correctly describe as "their own tea," but the crucial part of the judgment is the affirmation that the society could not make taxable profits out of its own component elements. The proposition is derived by the Chief Justice from Styles' case (2).

In Styles' case (2) and in the other cases in which the principle established by it was applied the business carried on by the company or society sought to be taxed was mutual insurance. The essence of that kind of business (with the exception of life insurance) is that a number of persons form an association which collects from the members contributions to a common fund which the members authorise the association to use for payments in indemnity of the losses assured against, for defraying the expenses of management, and for repayment to themselves of any balance. In life insurance business the association is authorised to use the common fund not for payments in indemnity of losses but for payment of sums payable on the death of a member. But in the nature of things there are no profits to be made out of a mutual arrangement to share losses, and there are no profits to be made out of a mutual arrangement to pay a sum to executors or assignees on the death of an associate. It is also to be observed that in Styles' case (2) and similar cases the contributors to the common fund and the participators in it are two identical bodies. The role of the association is to collect from the associates the contributions to the common fund and to make the payments from it in accordance with the contributors' mandate, and this mandate may be and usually is written into the constituent documents of the association, which may or may not be a corporation. The association is, therefore, no more than a convenient agent for carrying out what the associates might more laboriously do for themselves. What kinds of business other than mutual insurance may claim exemption from liability to income tax under the principle of Styles' case (2) need not be here considered, but their Lordships are of opinion that the principle cannot apply to an association, society or company which grows produce on its own land or manufactures goods in its own factories, using either its own capital or capital borrowed whether from its members or from others, and sells its produce or goods to its members exclusively. In the present case the appellant society is not bound by its rules to sell its tea only to its members, but it could make no difference if it were. No matter who the purchasers may be, if the society sells the tea grown and manufactured by it at a price which exceeds the cost of producing it and rendering it fit for sale, it has earned profits which are, subject to the provisions of the taxing act, taxable profits.

It is next necessary to show that this view truly represents the judgments in Styles' case (2) and is in accordance with judicial comments subsequently made on them. The appellant in Styles' case (2) was a life insurance company, the members of which were the holders of participating policies, each of whom was entitled to a share of the assets and liable for all losses. The company collected as premiums from members a sum to cover its requirements on a calculation of the probable death rate and of the probable expenses and other liabilities. An account was taken annually and the greater part of the surplus of premiums over expenditure was returned to the policyholders as bonuses, either by addition to the sums insured or in reduction of future premiums. The remainder of the surplus was carried forward as funds in hand to the credit of the general body of the members. It was held that no part of the premium income received under the participating policies was liable to be assessed to income tax as profits or gains under sched. D. LORD WATSON having distinguished the case from the earlier case of Last v. London Assurance Corpn. (3) on the ground that in Last's case (3) some of the policyholders were outsiders whereas in Styles' case (2) the policyholders and they alone were members of the company, said (14 App. Cas. 381, 393):

The individuals insured and those associated for the purpose of receiving their dividends, and meeting policies when they fall in, are identical; and I do not think that their complete identity can be destroyed, or even impaired, by their incorporation. The corporation is merely a legal entity which represents the aggregate of its members; and the members of the appellant company are its participating policyholders. When a number of individuals agree to contribute funds for a common purpose, such as the payment of annuities, or of capital sums, to some or all of them, on the occurrence of events certain or uncertain, and stipulate that their contributions, so far as not required for that purpose, shall be repaid to them, I cannot conceive why they should be regarded as traders, or why contributions returned to them should be regarded as profits.

LORD HERSCHELL, after stating that the Attorney-General had conceded that the fact that the persons associating themselves together for the purpose of mutual assurance had been incorporated was immaterial, added (ibid., 408):

I think the Attorney-General was correct in thinking it immaterial that the persons thus associated had been incorporated, and that a legal entity had been created distinct from the members of which it was composed. This being so I shall, for the sake of simplicity, consider the questions that arise as though the association were unincorporated.

He later says (ibid., 409):

Persons who agree to contribute to a common fund for mutual insurance, certainly would not in ordinary parlance be regarded as carrying on a trade or vocation for the purpose of earning profit. Let us see how the so-called profit arises. It is due to the premiums which the members are required to pay being in excess of what is necessary to provide for the requisite payments to be made upon the deaths of members, and not being, as the case states they were intended to be, commensurate therewith. . . . The members contribute for a common object to a fund which is their common property; it turns out that they have contributed more than is needed, and, therefore, more than ought to have been contributed by them, for this object, and accordingly their next contribution is reduced by an amount equal to their proportion of this excess. I am at a loss to see how this can be considered as a "profit" arising or accruing to them from a trade or vocation which they carry on.

From these quotations it appears that the exemption was based on (1) the identity of the contributors to the fund and the recipients from the fund, (2) the treatment of the company, though incorporated, as a mere entity for the convenience of the members and policyholders, in other words as an instrument obedient to their mandate, and (3) the impossibility that contributors should derive profits from contributions made by themselves to a fund which could only be expended or returned to themselves.

Cornish Mutual Assurance Co. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (4) was a case similar to Styles' case (2) and would have had the same result but for a provision in s. 53 (2) of the Finance Act, 1920, which expressly provided that the surplus arising from the transactions between mutual trading concerns and their members should be treated as profits. The only importance for present purposes of the judgments in the case is that LORD CAVE, L.C., took occasion to question and correct LORD WATSON's opinion that the company in Styles' case (2) was not carrying on a trade. It was carrying on a trade, but one in which no profits could be earned by it. In Liverpool Corn Trade Association, Ltd. v. Monks (5) a company incorporated with the object of promoting the interests of the corn trade, with power to declare dividends, collected entrance fees from its members and made charges, both against members and other persons, for the use of various facilities provided by it. It was found liable to income tax. The case is consistent with the view expressed by their Lordships because the shareholders and the contributors to the fund out of which dividends were paid were not identical. Thomas v. Richard Evans & Co., (6) was held by ROWLATT, J., to fall within the principle of Styles' case (2). The association was a purely mutual assurance association and the contributors and the assured persons were identical bodies: any surplus of contributions over payments to policyholders was ultimately returned to contributors. ROWLATT, J., said ([1927] 1 K.B. 33, 47):

Where all that a company does is to collect money from a certain number of people—it matters not whether they are called members of the company or participating policyholders—and apply it for the benefit of those same people, not as shareholders in the company, but as the people who subscribe it, then, as I understand Styles' case (2), there is no profit. If the people were to do the thing for themselves there could be no profit, and the fact that they incorporate a legal entity to do it for them makes no difference; there is still no profit. This is not because the entity of the company is to be disregarded; it is because there is no profit, the money being simply collected from those people and handed back to them, not in the character of shareholders, but in the character of those who have paid it.

The judgment came before the House of Lords and was affirmed. LORD CAVE, L.C., said ([1927] A.C. 827, 832):

Sooner or later, in meal or in malt, the whole of the company's receipts must go back to the policyholders as a class, though not precisely in the proportions in which they have contributed to them; and the association does not in any true sense make a profit out of their contributions.

LORD DUNEDIN's judgment was to the same effect.

In Municipal Mutual Insurance, Ltd. v. Hills (7) a company formed primarily for the purpose of mutual insurance against fire also carried on employers' liability and other miscellaneous insurance business. It was admitted that the fire insurance business was purely mutual and did not attract tax, but it was found as a fact that on the other side of the business the redundant part of the premiums was not returnable to the contributors of the premiums, and it was, therefore, held that the surplus was subject to tax. LORD MACMILLAN, dealing with the tax exemption of surpluses arising in the conduct of mutual insurance, said (147 L.T. 62, 68):

... the cardinal requirement is that all the contributors to the common fund must be entitled to participate in the surplus and that all the participators in the surplus must be contributors, to the common fund; in other words, there must be complete identity between the contributors, and the participators. If this requirement is satisfied the particular form which the association takes is immaterial.

The requirement is not satisfied in the present case, for there is no common fund to which the members of the appellant society contribute and in which they participate.

For these reasons the appeal fails, and English and Scottish Joint Co-operative Wholesale Society v. Madras Income Tax Comr. (1) in which the appellant society was concerned must be held to have been wrongly decided. In the course of the debate the suggestion was thrown out that on the facts and accounts of a particular year the appellant society might be in a position to maintain that a payment to its members under para. (e) of the rules for the application of profits fell to be treated as a discount having the effect of reducing the price of the tea sold to the members, and so reducing, or, perhaps, eliminating, the profits. Their Lordships are not concerned to discuss that suggestion in this appeal and express no opinion, favourable or unfavourable, on it. It is expedient, in view of the defects of the question, to answer it, not by a simple affirmative, but by declaring that the society is not exempt from liability to Assam agricultural income tax in respect of profits from the sale to its members of tea cultivated or manufactured at its Deckiajuli estate in the province of Assam. Their Lordships will, therefore, humbly advise His Majesty that the judgment of the High Court should be varied by the substitution for an affirmative answer to the question this following answer :—" The society is not exempt from liability to Assam agricultural income tax in respect of profits from the sale to its members of tea cultivated or manufactured at its Deckiajuli estate in the province of Assam," and that subject thereto the appeal should be dismissed. The appellant must pay the costs of this appeal.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

W. T. LAMB & SONS v. RIDER. SAME v. SAME.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Scott, L.J., and Romer, J.), June 14, 15, 30, July 7, 1948.] B

Execution—More than six years after judgment—Application for leave to issue—Previous application refused—New material—Explanation of delay—Validity of R.S.C., Ord. 42, r. 23 (u).

On Nov. 14, 1938, the plaintiffs issued a specially endorsed writ against the defendant claiming the balance of the price of goods sold and delivered, and on Dec. 8, 1938, judgment was entered for the full amount with costs. No steps to enforce the judgment were taken until Mar. 25, 1946, when the plaintiffs issued a summons in the action applying for leave to proceed to execution notwithstanding that six years had elapsed since judgment was entered, and, on May 7, 1946, the master refused to grant leave. No appeal was entered by the plaintiffs against this order, but on Apr. 6, 1948, they issued a further summons, which was identical in form with that of Mar. 25, 1946, and on May 4, 1948, the master granted the plaintiffs leave to proceed under R.S.C., Ord. 42, r. 23, on the judgment, notwithstanding that six years had elapsed. The defendant appealed against this order to the judge in chambers. The judge rescinded the order, but, although no application for such leave had been made by the plaintiffs and without affording the defendant an opportunity to give evidence, the judge granted leave to the plaintiffs to appeal out of time against the original refusal, on May 7, 1946, to make an order under R.S.C., Ord. 42, r. 23. The plaintiffs appealed to the Court of Appeal against the rescission of the master's order and the defendant appealed against the granting of leave to appeal against the previous order out of time :— C

HELD : (i) the dismissal of a summons for relief under R.S.C., Ord. 23, did not, of itself, shut the door against a subsequent application for the same relief, but the later application should be granted only if founded on material which was not before the court on the first occasion, and, there being no such fresh material in this case, the order was rightly rescinded. D

(ii) the granting of leave to appeal out of time was a matter of discretion, but before granting such leave the plaintiffs should have been required to adduce evidence explanatory of their long delay and the defendant should have been given an opportunity of answering it, and, there not being before the judge evidence of new facts sufficient to entitle him to exercise so exceptional a discretion in favour of the plaintiffs, the order should be set aside. E

(iii) R.S.C., Ord. 42, r. 23, did not conflict with s. 2 (4) of the Limitation Act, 1939, and the plaintiff had no right to proceed to execution except with leave of the court under that rule. F

Lougher v. Donovan ([1948] 2 All E.R. 11), distinguished. G

Per cur. : The right to sue on a judgment has always been regarded as a matter quite distinct from the right to issue execution on it. The two conceptions have been the subject of different legislative treatment, and the definition of "action" in s. 31 of the Limitation Act, 1939, has not the effect of merging the two together. Execution is essentially a matter of procedure—machinery which the court can, subject to the rules from time to time in force, operate for the purpose of enforcing its judgments or orders. The H

Common Law Procedure Act and R.S.C., Ord. 42, were concerned, and concerned alone with procedural machinery for enforcing a judgment when attained.

APPEAL by the plaintiffs from an order of PRITCHARD, J., dated May 19, 1948, in so far as it rescinded an order of the master giving the plaintiffs leave to proceed under R.S.C., Ord. 42, r. 23, on a judgment notwithstanding six years had elapsed since such judgment, and APPEAL by the defendant from the same order in so far as it gave liberty to the plaintiffs to appeal out of time against an order previously made by the master. Judgment was given in favour of the defendant on both appeals. The facts appear in the judgment of the court.

Dare for the defendant.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 7. SCOTT, L.J., read the following judgment of the court. These are two appeals, one by the defendant and one by the plaintiffs, from an order made in chambers on May 14, 1948, by PRITCHARD, J. By that order the learned judge rescinded an order made by the master on May 4, 1948, and the appeal by the plaintiffs is against that rescission. The order of the learned judge, however, also gave leave to the plaintiffs to appeal out of time against an order which the master had made on May 7, 1946, and it is against that part of PRITCHARD, J.'s order that the defendant has presented his appeal.

This action was started by specially endorsed writ issued on Nov. 14, 1938, and by it the plaintiffs claimed a sum of £500 6s. 6d., being the balance of the price of goods sold and delivered. The defendant, who was a building contractor, found himself in financial difficulties in that year. All his creditors, however, except the plaintiffs, accepted a compromise under which they were to be paid, and were paid, a sum of 4s. 3d. in the pound in satisfaction of their claims. The plaintiffs did not come into this settlement and brought their action instead. The defendant did not appear to the proceedings, and on Dec. 8, 1938, the plaintiffs signed judgment for the whole amount of their claim together with £11 18s. 6s. costs. This judgment was not satisfied and no steps were taken by the plaintiffs to enforce it until Mar. 25, 1946, when they issued a summons in the action applying "under the Courts (Emergency Powers) Act, 1943, for leave to proceed to execution or otherwise to the enforcement of judgment under R.S.C., Ord. 14, r. 1, herein dated Dec. 8, 1938, notwithstanding six years have elapsed since such judgment." The relief sought by the latter part of this summons was referable to R.S.C., Ord. 42, r. 23. The plaintiffs filed no evidence in support of the summons, but the defendant put in an affidavit which was sworn on Apr. 27, and filed on May 7, 1946. By this affidavit the defendant, after referring to the above-mentioned composition with his other creditors in 1938, said :

The plaintiffs took no steps whatever to enforce the judgment and have by their own neglect allowed over six years to elapse since the date of the judgment. I am in no better financial position now than I was at the date of the judgment and I respectfully submit that any steps to enforce judgment which the plaintiffs may be advised to take could have been taken in 1938. Owing to the plaintiffs' attitude and the continual threat of further proceedings and possible bankruptcy in this matter I am unable to recommence my business as a builder. I retained the amount required to pay the plaintiffs the composition of 4s. 3d. in the pound on the amount of their debt for as long as possible and offered it to them on various occasions. On the outbreak of war I was again in serious financial difficulties and was obliged to use this money for living expenses.

The defendant then gave details of his financial position with a view to making out a case for relief under the Courts (Emergency Powers) Act, 1943. The summons came before the master on May 7, 1946, and he endorsed it as follows : "No order for leave under R.S.C., Ord. 42, r. 23. No costs." No appeal was entered by the plaintiffs against this order. On Apr. 6, 1948, the plaintiffs issued a further summons identical in form with that of Mar. 25, 1946. Two affidavits were filed on behalf of the plaintiffs in support of this summons, one sworn by Mr. Lamb and the other by Mr. Carr. Mr. Lamb's affidavit was as follows :

1. That I am a director of the above-named plaintiffs a company incorporated under the Companies Act, 1929, who obtained judgment herein on Dec. 8, 1938, against the above-named defendant for £500 6s 6d., and £11 18s. 6d. costs, making a total of £512 5s. 0d. 2. That no part of the said judgment has been paid or satisfied. 3. That I have read what purports to be a copy of an affidavit by the defendant sworn on Apr. 27, 1946, and filed on May 7, 1946, in opposition to a former summons by the plaintiffs for leave to proceed under the Courts (Emergency Powers) Rules, 1943. 4. That the plaintiffs pressed the defendant for payment of their judgment debt at intervals from the date of the said judgment until about November, 1943, when they lost trace of the defendant until about January, 1946, since when they have continued to press him. 5. That the correspondence between the plaintiffs and the defendant and between the plaintiffs' solicitors and the defendant and his solicitors prior to June 29, 1943, which was handed to the plaintiffs' solicitors, Messrs. A. M. Longhurst & Butler, of 136, Fenchurch Street, in the said city of London, was lost or destroyed through enemy action when one of their offices were destroyed. 6. The bundle of correspondence now produced and shown to me and marked "A.L." contains letters and copies of letters between the plaintiffs and the defendant showing that the plaintiffs were pressing the defendant for payment in 1943. 7. In response to enquiries I have made from the plaintiffs' bank as to the defendant's credit, I am informed that his credit is considered good for £100. 8. I respectfully submit that the defendant's said affidavit herein shows he did not pay the plaintiffs' debt because he was insolvent and that his inability to pay (if he was unable to pay) was not by reason of circumstances attributable to the recent war and that the defendant's said affidavit shows that he owns a house and is in receipt of income which now enables him to make some payment on account of the plaintiffs' judgment debt.

It is not necessary to refer in detail to the correspondence exhibited to this affidavit. It shows that between June and November, 1943, the plaintiffs were unsuccessfully pressing the defendant to pay them the amount which was due under the judgment. The defendant was then living, as he still is, at 59, Graham Road, Wealdstone, Middlesex, and by a letter written to the plaintiffs by a Mr. Gibbs, of their London Office, Mr. Gibbs told them that the defendant had informed him that letters to that address would find him and if he was away on a contract they were forwarded on to him. Mr. Carr is a traveller in the plaintiffs' employment and by his affidavit he said :

On July 21, 1943, I called at 123, Somerville Road, Chadwell Heath, Essex, and interviewed Mrs. Maskell, who lived there. Mrs. Maskell informed me that she collected the rent of the house she occupied, No. 123, Somerville Road aforesaid, and paid it into the banking account of the defendant. She informed me that she had not seen the defendant for some two years, but to the best of her knowledge, information and belief he was in work at Harrow in the county of Middlesex at that time.

The defendant filed no evidence in answer to these affidavits of Mr. Lamb and Mr. Carr. The summons came before the master on May 4, 1948, when he made the following order :

It is ordered that the plaintiffs have leave to proceed under R.S.C., Ord. 42, r. 23, on the judgment under R.S.C., Ord. 14, r. 1, herein dated Dec. 8, 1938, notwithstanding six years have elapsed since such judgment. And it is further ordered that the plaintiffs' application for leave to proceed to execution or otherwise to the enforcement of the said judgment dated Dec. 8, 1938, under the Courts (Emergency Powers) Act, 1943, be adjourned for ten days or first open day.

The defendant appealed and PRITCHARD, J., made the order to which we have earlier referred and against which the two appeals before us have been brought. The operative part of the order of the learned judge is as follows :

It is ordered that the said order be rescinded and that the defendant's appeal be allowed with costs. Certificate for counsel. It is further ordered that the plaintiffs be at liberty to appeal out of time against the original refusal dated May 7, 1946, to make an order under R.S.C., Ord. 42, r. 23, and to file the affidavits sworn Apr. 17 and 22, 1948. Liberty to either party to apply generally.

On the hearing of the appeal before this court the defendant asked for leave to read and file an affidavit which he had sworn since the hearing before PRITCHARD, J., and we gave him leave accordingly. We need not refer to the affidavit in detail. It was directed (successfully as we think) to negating the suggestion contained in Mr. Lamb's and Mr. Carr's affidavits that the defendant had concealed his whereabouts from the plaintiffs.

A The first point which we propose to consider is whether the learned judge acted rightly in rescinding the order which the master had made giving leave to the plaintiffs to proceed under R.S.C., Ord. 42, r. 23, notwithstanding that six years had elapsed since the date of the judgment. The defendant's appeal from the master's order to the judge in chambers was, as we understand, founded on the view that, having regard to the order which the master had made dismissing the plaintiffs' similar summons some two years previously, the matter was res judicata and could not be reopened. We do not know whether this was the view on which the learned judge acted, but we do not think that it was right. The dismissal of a summons for relief under R.S.C., Ord. 42, r. 23, does not, in our opinion, of itself shut the door against a subsequent application for the same relief. On the other hand, the subsequent application should only be granted if founded on material which was not before the court on the first occasion, and the question, accordingly, is whether the master was right in acceding to the plaintiffs' second application having regard to the evidence by which it was supported. In our judgment, there was no sufficient evidence to justify the order which the master made and the learned judge acted rightly in rescinding it. Mr. Lamb does not appear to have applied his mind in his affidavit sworn on Apr. 22, 1948, to explaining why the plaintiffs had remained inactive for so long or to showing in what way, if at all, the position had changed since their first summons was before the master two years previously. The affidavit is directed in the main to considerations which are relevant only to an application for leave to proceed under the Courts (Emergency Powers) Act, 1943—and, indeed, para. 3 of the affidavit indicates that Mr. Lamb regarded the plaintiffs' former application as having been made under that Act alone. D Apart from this, the affidavit suggests (as also does the affidavit of Mr. Carr) that the defendant had in some way tried to conceal his whereabouts from the plaintiffs, a suggestion which is, in our opinion, altogether wanting in substance. Finally, Mr. Lamb exhibits the correspondence (already mentioned) which passed between the plaintiffs and the defendant in 1943 without explaining why it was not before the master, if the plaintiffs placed any reliance on it, on the application which they had made in 1946. There was, accordingly, no evidence at all on the second summons which was in any way relevant to the relief which the plaintiffs were seeking under R.S.C., Ord. 42, r. 23, and, in the absence of such evidence, this summons should, in our opinion, have followed the fate of the first.

E Next comes the question whether the learned judge was right in giving the plaintiffs leave to appeal out of time against the dismissal by the master of their earlier summons by the order made on May 7, 1946. This matter was not really before the learned judge at all. The subject-matter that was before him was the plaintiffs' summons of Apr. 6, 1948, and nothing else, and neither in that summons nor in the plaintiffs' evidence in support of it was there any suggestion that the plaintiffs were dissatisfied with the master's order of two years before. In these circumstances it is not difficult to believe counsel for the defendant when he tells us, as he did tell us, that he was very much taken by surprise by the suggestion that the plaintiffs should belatedly have leave to appeal from this order. Unfortunately, counsel are at variance in their recollection of what precisely did occur before the judge on this point. Counsel for the defendant is, however, clear that he did indicate to the judge that he had no evidence with which to meet the proposal and, indeed, that the plaintiffs themselves had filed no evidence to support it. He further says that he applied H for an adjournment to consider the question and to file evidence on it, but that this request was refused. Whatever may have been said or done before the learned judge so far as this matter is concerned, it is clear that it was not entertained with the defendant's consent, and, in the absence of agreement by the defendant, we cannot think it right that it should have been summarily disposed of in the plaintiffs' favour without any evidence being adduced by the plaintiffs and without an opportunity being afforded for evidence by the defendant. The granting of leave to appeal out of time is, of course, a matter of discretion, and we are not at all suggesting that the discretion can never be exercised except where there is evidence to support it. The order in question, however, had been made more than two years previously and the plaintiffs were not even in the application then before the court asking for leave to appeal from it. In these circumstances, we are of opinion that before such leave was granted the plaintiffs should have been required to adduce evidence explanatory of their long delay and the defendant should have been given an opportunity of answering it. In our judgment, accordingly, this court should hold that there was not before the learned judge evidence of new facts sufficient to entitle him to exercise so exceptional a discretion in favour of the plaintiffs. Indeed, if need be, we should feel bound to hold that his order was unfair to the defendant and on that ground must be set aside.

As we have arrived at conclusions adverse to the plaintiffs on both of the points which we have been considering it becomes necessary to deal with the final argument which counsel for the plaintiffs addressed to us on their behalf and which is founded on the alleged invalidity of R.S.C., Ord. 42, r. 23 (a). The relevant parts of this rule are as follows :

In the following cases, viz. : (a) Where six years have elapsed since the judgment or date of the order, or any change has taken place by death or otherwise in the parties entitled or liable to execution ; . . . the party alleging himself to be entitled to execution may apply to the court or a judge for leave to issue execution accordingly. And such court or judge may, if satisfied that the party so applying is entitled to issue execution, make an order to that effect, or may order that any issue or question necessary to determine the rights of the parties shall be tried in any of the ways in which any question in an action may be tried. And in either case such court or judge may impose such terms as to costs or otherwise as shall be just.

This rule in its present form dates back to 1883 and the argument for the plaintiffs on this appeal is to the effect that it is in conflict with s. 2 (4) of the Limitation Act, 1939, and must, therefore, be treated as ineffective. Section 2 (4) of the Act of 1939 is as follows :

An action shall not be brought upon any judgment after the expiration of twelve years from the date on which the judgment became enforceable, and no arrears of interest in respect of any judgment debt shall be recovered after the expiration of six years from the date on which the interest became due.

The definition of "action" in s. 31 of the Act is in the following terms :

"Action" includes any proceedings in a court of law, including an ecclesiastical court.

The argument of the plaintiffs, put shortly, is that the execution of a judgment is a "proceeding in a court of law," that under the Act of 1939 such "proceeding" may be brought at any time within twelve years from the date on which the judgment became enforceable and that, accordingly, R.S.C., Ord. 42, r. 23, is ultra vires in so far as it cuts down the right of execution by subjecting it to the discretion of a judge if not exercised within six years of the judgment. The matter is to some extent historical. By s. 40 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, it was provided that no action or suit or other proceeding should be brought to recover any sum of money secured by any mortgage, judgment or lien, or otherwise charged on or payable out of any land or rent, at law or in equity, or any legacy, but within twenty years next after a present right to receive the same should have accrued to some person capable of giving a discharge for or release of the same subject to the qualification as to part payment thereafter mentioned. The result of this provision was that a judgment became barred after twenty years : Watson v. Birch (1). While this Act was still in force the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, was passed. Prior to the passing of this statute the law presumed a judgment to have been satisfied when a year and a day had elapsed without execution being issued on it, and at common law the only remedy in such a case (in personal actions) was by an action of debt on the judgment, though by the Statute of Westminster the Second, 1285, a scire facias or warning could be issued on which, failing appearance or defence, execution might be obtained : see DAY'S COMMON LAW PROCEDURE ACTS, 4th ed., p. 148. The Act of 1852 relaxed this practice. By s. 128 it was provided :

During the lives of the parties to a judgment, or those of them during whose lives execution may at present issue within a year and a day without a scire facias, and within six years from the recovery of the judgment, execution may issue without a revival of the judgment.

A Section 129 provided that in cases where it should become necessary to revive a judgment by reason either of lapse of time, or of a change, by death or otherwise, of the parties entitled or liable to execution, the party alleging himself to be entitled to execution might either sue out a writ of revivor or apply to the court of a judge for leave to enter a suggestion upon the roll to the effect that it manifestly appeared to the court that such party was entitled to have execution of the judgment and to issue execution thereupon, and (by s. 130) on such application, in case it manifestly appeared that the party making the same was entitled to execution, the court or judge should allow the suggestion to be entered and execution to issue thereupon, but in case it did not manifestly so appear the court or judge should discharge the rule or dismiss the summons, in which case the party making such application should be at liberty to proceed by writ of revivor or action on the judgment. It is, perhaps, material to observe at this point that inasmuch as by the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, a successful plaintiff had twenty years within which to bring an action, suit or other proceeding to recover (inter alia) money secured by a judgment, an argument similar to that which was presented to us might very well have been urged at any time between 1833 and 1852 on the ground that the restrictions on the plaintiffs' right to execution were inconsistent with his rights as recognised by s. 40 of the Act of 1833. And, indeed, after 1852 a plaintiff might have argued that the enactors of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, could not have intended to have cut down such right by, as it were, a side wind. No case was brought to our attention in which any such arguments were advanced; nor, as we think, could they have been advanced with any prospect of success for the reasons hereinafter stated. To continue the history of the matter, s. 40 of the Act of 1833 was re-enacted in substantially similar terms by s. 8 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, with the substitution of twelve years for twenty, and in Jay v. Johnstone (2) it was held by the Court of Appeal that the expression "judgment" refers to judgments generally and is not restricted to judgments which operate as charges on land. The provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, to which we have referred became, after the Judicature Acts, 1873-1875, the subject of Rules of the Supreme Court. R.S.C., Ord. 42, r. 18 (now r. 22) provided that, as between the original parties to a judgment, execution might issue at any time within six years from the recovery of the judgment. The predecessor of the relevant part of the present r. 23 was r. 19 of Ord. 42. That rule to some extent varied the practice which existed under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852. It preserved alternative processes, according to whether the right of execution was or was not sufficiently clear to be enforced summarily, but it simplified the procedure by providing that if the right was clear the judge might order execution to issue while, if it was not, he could direct the question to be tried. Finally, the limitation of actions on judgments is now dealt with by s. 2 (4) (to which we have already referred) of the Limitation Act, 1939, which statute repealed the Real Property Limitation Acts, 1833 and 1874.

G It follows from the above brief survey that the right to sue on a judgment has always been regarded as a matter quite distinct from the right to issue execution under it and that the two conceptions have been the subject of different treatment. Execution is essentially a matter of procedure—machinery which the court can, subject to the rules from time to time in force, operate for the purpose of enforcing its judgments or orders. A refusal by the court, whether before or after the passing of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, to place this machinery at a plaintiff's disposal in no way affected his right to sue on the judgment at any time within the statutory limit of time—as indeed was expressly recognised by the proviso to s. 130 of that Act. Counsel for the plaintiffs, however, as we understood him, said that, whatever may have been the position previously, a successful plaintiff is now entitled, by virtue of the Limitation Act, 1939, to issue execution at any time within twelve years of the judgment. He relied particularly on the definition of "action" in s. 31 of the Act and said that it is an extremely wide definition, and should be contrasted with such earlier definitions as that in s. 100 of the Judicature Act, 1873, and s. 225 of the Judicature Act, 1925. It is true that the definition of "action" in s. 31 of the Limitation Act, 1939, is wide, but we are unable to see how this fact gets the plaintiffs within measurable distance of the conclusion which they seek to found on it. The reason for including "any proceeding in a court of law" in the meaning of the word "action" is sufficiently apparent when one sees that many of the actions dealt with by the Act (e.g., foreclosure and redemption actions) are normally commenced by originating summons and not by writ. No more weight can be attached to this definition than could have been attached to s. 40 of the Act of 1833 in which the words "action or suit or other proceeding" were prefatory to a number of different kinds of proceedings, some at common law, some in equity, and would require, accordingly, to be read distributively. The language of s. 2 (4) of the Act of 1939 in itself is plain and re-enacted existing law. To resort to the definition section, not otherwise required, in order to show that the legislature were intending to blend together matters respectively of substantive law and of procedure which had never been blended before is to adopt what is, to our mind, a bold but illegitimate course. The relevant provisions of the Real Property Limitation Acts, 1833 and 1874, and of the Limitation Act, 1939, dealt, in our opinion, with the substantive right to sue for and obtain a judgment, and with that alone. The Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, and R.S.C., Ord. 42, were concerned, and concerned alone, with procedural machinery for enforcing a judgment when obtained. The two subjects were formerly quite independent and distinct, the one from the other, and we are quite unable to attribute to the definition of "action" in the Limitation Act, 1939, the effect of merging the two together. We are satisfied that the plaintiffs' attack on the validity of R.S.C., Ord. 42, r. 23 (a), is without foundation, and, accordingly, that he has no right to proceed to execution except with the leave of the court under that rule. As to the necessity for such leave, counsel for the plaintiffs further argued that even after the expiration of six years a plaintiff is entitled to execution as of right unless a change has taken place by death or otherwise in the parties entitled or liable to execution. In our judgment, however, the issue of execution is within the discretion of the court after six years have elapsed, even where no such change has occurred.

At the request of counsel for the plaintiffs, after we had reserved judgment, we consented to hear him and if necessary counsel for the defendant on the bearing of Lougher v. Donovan (3), reported after the hearing of this appeal. Having now heard him, we do not think that decision relevant. There the plaintiff's right of action was on an order of the court made in 1929 and the twelve years' limit of the Limitation Act, 1939, had brought the original right of action on the order of 1929 to an end five years before the vain attempt of the plaintiff to resuscitate it was made in 1946. The defendant's appeal must be allowed and the plaintiffs' appeal dismissed with costs here and below.

Appeal of defendant allowed; appeal of plaintiffs dismissed; with costs in Court of Appeal and below.

Solicitors: A. M. Longhurst & Butler (for the plaintiffs); Davenport, Lyons & Barker (for the defendant).

CHAPLIN v. CHAPLIN.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Tucker, Bucknill and Somervell L.JJ.), July 2, 1948.]

Divorce—Pregnancy at date of marriage by person other than petitioner—Petition filed more than a year after marriage—Concealment by wife—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937 (c. 57), s. 7 (1) (d), proviso (ii).

The Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, s. 7 (1) provides: "In addition to any other grounds on which a marriage is by law void or voidable, a marriage shall be voidable on the ground . . . (d) that the respondent was at the time of the marriage pregnant by some person other than the petitioner; Provided that . . . the court shall not grant a decree unless it is satisfied—(i) that the petitioner was at the time of the marriage ignorant of the facts alleged; (ii) that proceedings were instituted within a year from the date of the marriage; and (iii) that material intercourse . . . has not taken place since the discovery by the petitioner of the existence of the grounds for a decree."

The parties were married on Oct. 31, 1944, and a child was born on May 30, 1945. The husband, who was serving overseas, became aware that his wife was pregnant as a result of a letter from her, dated May 15, 1945, in which she said the child would be coming before its time because she had had a fall and a fright. In August, 1945, the husband came home on leave and his suspicions were aroused, but a neighbour was called in who confirmed the wife's story as to the fall and fright. The husband accepted that explanation and the parties lived together until July, 1946, when the wife left the husband. On Sept. 20, 1946, the husband made inquiries of the doctor who had attended the wife in her confinement and was informed by him that the child was a nine months' child. On Mar. 8, 1947, the husband filed a petition under s. 7 (1) (d) of the Act of 1937. The trial judge rejected the petition. On appeal, it was contended on behalf of the husband that, in effect, proviso (ii) to s. 7 (1) was in the nature of a statute of limitation and that equitable principles should be applied in its interpretation, and, accordingly, if it were established that the husband's right under the sub-section had been concealed by the fraud of the wife, the period provided for in the sub-section should be extended until the discovery of the fraud.

HELD : there was no provision in the sub-section for the extension of the period on the ground of concealment by fraud ; it was impossible to imply such a provision ; and, therefore, the appeal must fail.

[FOR THE MATRIMONIAL CAUSES ACT, 1937, s. 7 (1), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Vol. 30, p. 339.]

APPEAL, by the husband, from an order of HODSON, J., dated Nov. 11, 1947, refusing a decree under s. 7 (1) (d) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, on the ground that the proceedings were commenced more than a year after the date of the marriage, the husband having discovered the existence of the grounds for a decree within that period. The appeal was dismissed. The facts appear in the judgment of TUCKER, L.J.

Fairweather for the husband.

The wife was not represented.

TUCKER, L.J. : This is an appeal from a decision of HODSON, J., rejecting a husband's petition for nullity brought under s. 7 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937. That section is as follows :

(1) In addition to any other grounds on which a marriage is by law void or voidable, a marriage shall be voidable on the ground : (a) that the marriage has not been consummated owing to the wilful refusal of the respondent to consummate the marriage ; or (b) that either party to the marriage was at the time of the marriage of unsound mind or a mental defective within the meaning of the Mental Deficiency Acts, 1913 to 1927, or subject to recurrent fits of insanity or epilepsy ; or (c) that the respondent was at the time of the marriage suffering from venereal disease in a communicable form ; or (d) that the respondent was at the time of the marriage pregnant by some person other than the petitioner : Provided that, in the cases specified in paragraphs (b), (c) and (d) of this sub-section, the court shall not grant a decree unless it is satisfied—(i) that the petitioner was at the time of the marriage ignorant of the facts alleged ; (ii) that proceedings were instituted within a year from the date of the marriage ; and (iii) that marital intercourse with the consent of the petitioner has not taken place since the discovery by the petitioner of the existence of the grounds for a decree.

The section then goes on :

(2) Any child born of a marriage avoided pursuant to paragraphs (b) or (c) of the last foregoing sub-section shall be a legitimate child of the parties thereto notwithstanding that the marriage is so avoided.

It is to be observed that that paragraph does not apply in cases, like the present, which fall under para. (d).

In the present case the parties were married on Oct. 31, 1944, and the petition was presented on Mar. 8, 1947. It is clear on the face of it that more than a year had then expired from the date of the marriage, and, therefore, the case comes within the proviso that the court shall not grant a decree unless it is satisfied that the proceedings were instituted within a year from the date of the marriage. The marriage having taken place on Oct. 31, 1944, a child was born on May 30, 1945, so that it would have been a premature birth if the husband was the father. The husband became aware that his wife was pregnant as the result of a letter which she sent to him on May 15, 1945. I think it is probable that he had had some communication before that, but that is the first document in the case produced at the trial. In that letter of May 15 the wife said that the child would be coming before its time because of a fright and a fall that she had had. On June 14, after the birth, she wrote again referring in more detail to her accident and fright. In August, 1945, the husband came home on leave and his suspicions were aroused, but a neighbour was called in who confirmed the wife's story as to her fall and the husband accepted that explanation and they lived together until July, 1946, when she left him. He then made inquiries of the doctor who had attended her in her confinement, and on Sept. 20, 1946, he was informed by the doctor that the baby at birth was apparently a nine months' child. He thus became aware of the position, but the petition was not filed until Mar. 8, 1947. The learned judge held that it was impossible to say that the husband had not discovered the existence of the grounds for the decree until a date subsequent to his visit in August, 1945. He said :

On these facts, the husband's suspicions having been aroused when the child was born, and enquiries having been made by him to confirm those suspicions very shortly after his wife left him, it is, in my opinion, impossible to say that he did not discover the existence of the grounds for a decree until after the later date. It may be that his affection for his wife induced him to remain with her at first and to give her the benefit of any doubt there might be, but the result is that he has failed to prove that marital intercourse has not taken place since the discovery of the existence of grounds for a decree.

I do not think it is necessary to express any view with regard to that part of the case, because I think it is clear that the husband is debarred from bringing these proceedings by reason of the fact that a period of considerably more than a year passed between the date of the marriage and that of the institution of the proceedings.

The argument that has been presented to us by counsel for the husband with a view to overcoming this difficulty is as follows. He says that, in effect, proviso (ii) in s. 7 (1) is in the nature of a statute of limitation and that equitable principles should be applied to its interpretation, and, accordingly, if it be established that the husband's right in this respect has been concealed by the fraud of the wife, the period provided for in the sub-section should be extended until the discovery of the fraud. Counsel concedes that this section does not come within s. 26 of the Limitation Act, 1939, which provides for the extension of the period of limitation in actions based on fraud, or where the right of action was concealed by the fraud, or where the action is for relief in consequence of mistake, because that section only covers actions for which the period of limitation is prescribed by that Act and the Act does not prescribe any period of limitation with regard to this matter. In support of the submission that s. 7 (1) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, should be regarded as a statute of limitation, counsel refers us to the Limitation (Enemies and War Prisoners') Act, 1945, which provides, in s. 1 (1) :

If at any time before the expiration of the period prescribed by any statute of limitation for the bringing of any action any person who would have been a necessary party to that action if it had then been brought was an enemy or was detained in enemy territory, the said period shall be deemed not to have run while the said person was an enemy or was so detained, and shall in no case expire before the end of twelve months from the date when he ceased to be an enemy or to be so detained, or from the date of the passing of this Act, whichever is the later . . .

In s. 2 it is provided that for the purpose of this Act " 'statute of limitation' means any of the following enactments, i.e., : the Limitation Act, 1939," and a number of other Acts, including the Copyright Act, 1911, the Moneylenders Act, 1927, certain sections of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, and s. 7 (1) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937.

The mere fact that Parliament thought fit, in the special case of persons who were enemies or were detained in enemy territory, to provide that some extension of time should be given for bringing proceedings under sub-s. (1) of s. 7 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, does not, in my view, bind us to decide that the sub-section should be interpreted as meaning that Parliament has intended to enable the courts, in applying the sub-section, to invoke equitable principles with the result that in many cases the period of twelve months would be considerably extended. I do not think that this case can be dealt with merely by considering whether or not this sub-section is for some purposes a statute of limitation. The question turns on the construction of the sub-section as a whole. One must appreciate the subject-matter with which it is dealing, viz., proceedings to alter the status of the parties, the result of which will affect the children of the marriage, and that in all the cases specified in the sub-section Parliament has thought fit to prescribe in the clearest possible language that the court shall not grant a decree unless it is satisfied that proceedings were instituted within a year of the date of the marriage. It would be wrong for this court to extend that period in a way which might, in some cases, involve bastardising children that had been born of the union which it was sought to avoid. There are cases of bigamy and insanity in which marriages are void or voidable on grounds other than those specified in the sub-section and their avoidance may involve children who have been born of those marriages, but that is no reason why, by our interpretation of this Act, we should enlarge the area of such cases. It seems to me on the clear wording of this section that the husband is out of court and that the appeal on that ground must fail.

BUCKNILL, L.J. : I agree for the reasons given by my Lord.

SOMERVELL, L.J. : I agree. If it is desired to lay down a period of limitation after the expiry of which actions cannot be brought, there are, broadly, two ways in which the period can be delimited. One is to take a fixed period as from a certain date irrespective of whether the person seeking relief has, or could have, knowledge of his rights. The other is to make the period dependent on and running from the date at which the person seeking relief could, or should, have had knowledge of his rights. Those two broad principles are very familiar. They can be combined, and in the present statute Parliament might have provided that proceedings must be instituted within a year from the date of the marriage or within, say, six months from the discovery by the petitioner of the existence of the grounds in question, whichever period was the longer. Counsel is asking us to imply into this sub-section a provision based on what I describe as the second broad method by which the period can be delimited. I can see no reason why we should imply any such provision and a good many reasons against it. Reference has been made by my brother to the Limitation Act, 1939, and I think that a study of the material sections of that Act reinforces the reasons which he has given for arriving at his conclusion. In the first part of that Act one finds certain periods of limitation set out. According to counsel's argument, I think he would have said that the equitable principle as to fraud would have had to be applied to them even if there had been no mention of it in the Act, but, in fact, one finds that extension on the ground of concealment by fraud is specifically set out in the Act. There is no such provision in this Act, and it seems to me impossible to imply it even if the equitable principle had any application (and I rather doubt whether it has) to the subject-matter with which we are concerned in this appeal.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

HADLUM v. HADLUM.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Tucker, Bucknill and Somervell, L.JJ.), July 8, 1948.]

Divorce—Evidence—Adultery—Period of gestation—Three hundred and forty-nine days.

The husband, a serving soldier, having last cohabited with his wife on Aug. 28, 1944, went overseas and remained there until July 7, 1945. The wife gave birth to a child on Aug. 12, 1945, i.e., 349 days after the husband had left her. In a petition for divorce by the husband on the ground of her adultery with an unknown man the foundation for the allegation of adultery was the abnormal length of the pregnancy, suggestions that there was other evidence which might tend towards proof of adultery being rejected by the court. Medical evidence was given that it was not impossible for the husband to be the father of the child.

HELD: the court would not infer that the wife had committed adultery.

HUBBOCK v. HUBBOCK.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Tucker, Bucknill and Somervell, L.JJ.), July 7, 1948.]

Divorce — Pleading — Answer — Particulars — Condonation — Knowledge — R.S.C., Ord. 19, r. 22.

By R.S.C., Ord. 19, r. 22: "Wherever it is material to allege . . . knowledge . . . it shall be sufficient to allege the same as a fact without setting out the circumstances from which the same is to be inferred."

A husband petitioned for divorce on the ground of his wife's adultery. By her answer the wife admitted the adultery, but alleged that the husband, with full knowledge, had condoned it by living with her and having sexual intercourse with her during a stated period. The registrar, on an application by the husband, ordered the wife to give further particulars of her answer, stating the source of her information as to the husband's knowledge and the date on which he acquired it, and this order was affirmed by the judge. On appeal, HELD: by R.S.C., Ord. 19, r. 22, the wife was not compelled to give the information sought by the husband.

[AS TO PLEADING CONDITION OF MIND, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 25, p. 245, para. 406, and DIGEST, Pleading, p. 37, No. 305.]

APPEAL by the wife from an order of BARNARD, J., dated June 17, 1948, affirming an order of the registrar that the wife should give further particulars of her answer. The appeal was allowed. The facts appear in the headnote and the judgment of TUCKER, L.J.

Hale for the wife.

Herbert Clifford Mortimer for the husband.

TUCKER, L.J. : This is an appeal from an order of BARNARD, J., confirming an order made by the registrar that the wife should give further particulars of her answer. The petition was based on the grounds of her adultery. By her answer the wife admits she committed adultery, but she alleges that her husband, with full knowledge of that adultery, condoned it by living with her and having sexual intercourse from Dec. 21, 1947, to Jan. 21, 1948. It seems to me immaterial to show the precise date when the husband acquired that knowledge. The wife cannot be ordered to give the source of her information and the same can be said with regard to the date. This appeal succeeds on the ground that she is asked to give something she is not compelled to give.

BUCKNILL, L.J. : The answer is quite clear. The information the husband seeks is in his possession and I cannot see how he is prejudiced in preparing his case.

SOMERVELL, L.J. : I agree.

Appeal allowed.

ALLEN v. ALLEN.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Wrottesley and Evershed, L.JJ.), June 25, 1948.]

Infants and Children—Custody or upbringing—Welfare—Paramount consideration—Moral and physical welfare—Guardianship of Infants Act, 1925 (c. 45), s. 1.

The Guardianship of Infants Act, 1925, s. 1 provides : " Where in any proceeding before any court . . . the custody or upbringing of an infant . . . is in question, the court, in deciding that question, shall regard the welfare of the infant as the first and paramount consideration . . . "

After a decree of divorce had been granted to a husband on the ground of his wife's adultery an order was made granting to the husband the custody, care and control of the daughter of the marriage, aged 8 years, who, until then, had been in the care and under the control of the mother. Since the decree absolute the mother had married the co-respondent. The judge, in deciding to make the order, regarded the moral welfare of the child as of paramount importance and took the view that the wife, having once committed adultery, was likely to do so again, and that, as the husband was re-married to a wife against whose moral character no charge could be made, he was more fit to have the care of the child. There was little to choose between the accommodation offered by the parties, but it was undisputed that the child was happy with her mother and making good progress at school, and there was medical evidence to the effect that the child's health would suffer if she were separated from her mother. On an appeal by the wife against the order,

HELD : the judge had not applied the proper test, the welfare of the child, both moral and physical, being the paramount consideration, and, therefore, the appeal must be allowed.

[AS TO ORDERS FOR CUSTODY, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 10, pp. 752-755, paras. 1181-1189 ; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 27, pp. 418-420, Nos. 4232-4253.]

APPEAL, by the wife, against an order of WALLINGTON, J., dated May 31, 1948, in so far as it granted to the husband the care and control of the child of the marriage. The appeal was allowed. The facts appear in the judgment of WROTTESELEY, L.J.

H. Forbes for the wife.

Trevor Reeve for the husband.

WROTTESELEY, L.J. : In this case we are not concerned with the custody of the child, which remains with the father, but with its care and control. The parties were married on Sept. 9, 1939, and the only child of the marriage was born on Apr. 17, 1940. The father, who was serving in the Army, went overseas in April, 1941, became a prisoner of war in July, 1942, and returned to England in May, 1945. On his return he discovered that the mother had formed an adulterous association with the co-respondent. He began divorce proceedings, the suit was undefended, and, on May 9, 1947, he obtained a decree nisi on the ground of the adultery of his wife with the co-respondent. No order as to custody was made. After the decree was made absolute the mother married the co-respondent and the father married a widow, who had a son aged six and a stepdaughter aged sixteen. The child has always been with the mother. On May 31, 1948, on the father's application, WALLINGTON, J., ordered that the child of the marriage should remain in the custody and care and control of the father on his undertaking to use tact and understanding in transferring the child to his care. The order would have the effect that the child would be uprooted from the home provided by the mother and transferred to the father where she would have to make a new start.

There is no dispute about the facts. The child is living with her mother at East Ham. There are three rooms, one being used as a bedroom for the mother and her husband, one for the child, and one as a living-room. The father, who is a workman earning about £9 a week, is in occupation of a house consisting of two large bedrooms and one small one, and two living-rooms. One bedroom is occupied by the father and his second wife, one by his step-son, and one by the step-daughter. It is proposed that the child should sleep in the bedroom of the step-daughter. It is not disputed that the child is happy with her mother and making good progress at her school in East Ham. There was the uncontradicted evidence of a doctor that the child's health would be affected adversely if she were transferred to the father and separated from her mother. The child has always lived with her mother, and one has to take into consideration that for some months the father never tried to see the child. There is nothing against the mother except that she formed an adulterous association with the co-respondent while her husband was abroad with the Forces. On the other hand, one has all sympathy with the father who has great affection for the child and could provide for her a good home where his second wife would be a good step-mother.

Counsel for the father told us the reasons for the decision of WALLINGTON, J. The learned judge said that there was little difference in so far as accommodation was concerned. He then considered the other circumstances, which were partly in favour of the child remaining with the mother, and, finally, he dealt with the question how the child's welfare would be influenced by living with her mother, who had committed adultery and was, as he thought, likely to do it again. He adjourned the case to hear evidence as to the moral character of the father and his second wife, and, as nothing disparaging was forthcoming, he made the order which is now before us. Here one has to differ from the learned judge. He obviously regarded the moral welfare of the child of paramount importance, and was of opinion, on the one hand, that a woman who has once committed adultery was likely to do it again, and, on the other, that the father now had a wife who had not committed adultery and was, therefore, more fit to look after the welfare of the child. That was not the proper test to apply. The welfare of the child, both moral and physical, was the paramount consideration. It was impossible to say, because a woman had once committed adultery she was not a fit person, vis-a-vis one who had not, to look after a child. There was no suggestion that the mother was promiscuous, or a bad mother, or a bad housekeeper, or anything which made it undesirable for her to look after the child. All the evidence in the case is strongly in favour of leaving the child with her, and the appeal must be allowed.

EVERSHED, L.J. : This court is always loath to interfere with the discretion of a learned judge, but I agree that here we are compelled to do so. The learned judge seems to have read the word "moral" into s. 1 of the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1925, before "welfare." Further, he has inferred that a woman who has once committed adultery will always repeat it.

Both suppositions are wrong. It would not be right to snatch this female child of eight from her mother and force her to make a new start with her father and a step-mother. The court has sympathy with the father who has been gravely wronged, and, if he wants access to the child, not only on odd days, but for a substantial period during the holidays, he is entitled to have it.

Appeal allowed. No order as to costs, the father holding a poor person's certificate.

WRIGHT v. DEAN.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Wynn-Parry, J.), June 30, July 1, 2, 1948.]

Lease—Option to purchase reversion—Option not registered as land charge—Sale of reversion—Rejection by purchaser of purported exercise of option—Liability of lessor—Measure of damages.

By a lease, dated Jan. 15, 1937, the defendant, thereafter "called the lessor which expression where the context so admits includes the persons deriving title under him," granted to the plaintiff, thereafter "called the tenant which expression where the context so admits includes the persons deriving title under him," certain property for a term of twenty-one years from Dec. 25, 1936, "in consideration of the rent . . . and of the covenants on the part of the tenant." Clause 8 of the lease provided "that if at any time after the expiration of the third year of the said term the tenant shall be desirous of purchasing the reversion in fee simple in the premises hereby demised at the price of £650 and shall at any time after the expiration of the said third year . . . give to the lessor a notice in writing to that effect then and in such case the person giving such notice shall be the purchaser of the said reversion at the said price of £650." That option was capable of registration as an estate contract under the Land Charges Act, 1925, but it was not registered. In April, 1944, the defendant sold the property to B. There was no formal contract, and no reference was made in the conveyance to the lease or to the option. In April, 1947, notice in proper form was given on behalf of the plaintiff to B., purporting to exercise the option, but B. rejected the notice as ineffective on the ground that the option was not registered. In June, 1947, a notice was sent to the defendant purporting to exercise the option, but the defendant refused to recognise that he had any liability. The plaintiff now claimed damages for breach of contract.

HELD: (i) on the construction of the lease, the word "lessor" in cl. 8 meant primarily the defendant and the word "tenant" therein meant primarily the plaintiff, and the defendant did not cease to be within the scope of the word "lessor" merely by parting with the reversion. Furthermore, as the defendant did not effectively assign the burden of the contract, the context forbade the term "lessor" to include anyone but the defendant, who, therefore, remained bound by the contract contained in cl. 8, and liable in damages for its breach.

(ii) at the time the contract in cl. 8 was made it must have been in the contemplation of the parties that should the plaintiff exercise the option he would either have the property conveyed to him or have damages which represented the loss which he suffered by not having it conveyed to him, and, therefore, the damages would not be merely nominal, but would be the value of the property in the open market in June, 1947, less the £650 payable under the option and a sum representing the value of the remainder of the lease.

Per cur.: there was no duty on the plaintiff to mitigate possible damage by registering the option as an estate contract under the Land Charges Act, 1925, and there was no breach of an express or implied term of the contract by the plaintiff's omission so to register the option.

WITNESS ACTION.

The plaintiff claimed specific performance and damages for breach of contract in respect of the non-performance by the defendant of a covenant contained in a lease by the defendant to the plaintiff to convey the freehold reversion of the demised premises to the plaintiff on the exercise by him of the option to purchase contained in the lease. By selling the reversion the defendant had rendered himself unable to comply with this covenant. WYNN-PARRY, J., held the defendant liable in damages.

Milner Holland, K.C., and G. D. Johnston for the plaintiff, the lessee.
Salt, K.C., and J. W. Mills for the defendant, the lessor.

WYNN-PARRY, J. : This is an action in which the plaintiff claims damages from the defendant for breach of a contract contained in a lease by the defendant to the plaintiff whereby an option was conferred on the plaintiff during the lease to purchase the freehold reversion of the premises comprised in the lease, the freehold of which reversion was vested in the defendant. In the action the plaintiff originally claimed specific performance of the contract comprising the option, but that claim is not pursued. I propose to deal with the question whether or not the defendant is liable to the plaintiff in damages, before considering any question of the quantum of damages.

In 1937, the defendant was the owner of the property in question, which consisted of a plot of land on the south side of the road leading from Arundel to Chichester at Fontwell, on which were erected certain premises where the defendant then carried on the business of a cafe proprietor. Early in January, 1937, the defendant sold his business to the plaintiff, and, as part of the transaction, granted to the plaintiff a lease of the land and premises in question. The lease is dated Jan. 15, 1937, and it is expressed to be made between the defendant: "... of Fontwell Cafe, Fontwell, in the county of Sussex, cafe proprietor (hereinafter called the lessor which expression where the context so admits includes the persons deriving title under him) of the first part ..." and the plaintiff, whose address is given, "(hereinafter called the tenant which expression where the context so admits includes the persons deriving title under him) of the second part," and the plaintiff's wife, as surety, of the third part. The document proceeds:

In consideration of the rent hereinafter reserved and of the covenants on the part of the tenant hereinafter contained This deed witnesseth and it is hereby agreed and declared as follows.

There follows the demise in cl. 1 by the defendant to the plaintiff of the property in question for a term of twenty-one years from Dec. 25, 1936, at the yearly rent of £62 payable monthly. Clause 8, which contains the option, opens with these words:

Provided always that if at any time after the expiration of the third year of the said term the tenant shall be desirous of purchasing the reversion in fee simple in the premises hereby demised at the price of £650 and shall at any time after the expiration of the said third year of the said term give to the lessor a notice in writing to that effect then and in such case the person giving such notice shall be the purchaser of the said reversion at the said price of £650 subject to the following conditions namely ...

Then is set out the machinery for carrying the purchase into effect if the tenant should give notice electing to exercise the option. The option, conferring an interest in the land, was capable of registration as an estate contract under the Land Charges Act, 1925, but no step was taken by the plaintiff, or on his behalf, to have the option registered under that Act. In April, 1944, the defendant agreed to sell the equity of redemption in the property (for it was then subject to a mortgage) to a Mr. Broome. No formal contract in writing relating to that arrangement was brought into existence, but the matter was completed by a conveyance dated Apr. 26, 1944, between the defendant, as vendor, and Mr. Broome, as purchaser. I need not refer to the terms of that document in any detail. It is sufficient to say that in it there is no reference whatsoever to the lease between the defendant and the plaintiff and no provision dealing in any way with the option contained in cl. 8 of the lease. In April, 1947, notice in proper form was given on behalf of the plaintiff to Mr. Broome purporting to exercise the option. The purported exercise of the option was rejected on behalf of Mr. Broome as being ineffective in view of the fact that the option had not been registered under the Land Charges Act, 1925. After certain correspondence, to which I need not refer, in June, 1947 a further notice in proper form was sent on behalf of the plaintiff to the defendant's solicitors purporting to exercise the option. After a claim had been made on behalf of the plaintiff that he was entitled to damages in the event of the defendant not fulfilling the bargain contained in the option, which he clearly could not do in the circumstances, the writ in this action was issued on July 29, 1947.

It is admitted that no effective proceedings can be taken against Mr. Broome, and it is further admitted that specific performance of the contract contained in the option cannot be claimed against the defendant. Thus, the only issues which are left in the matter are: (i) whether or not the defendant is liable in damages to the plaintiff for breach of the contract contained in the option, and (ii) if so, the extent of such damages.

The option confers a right to call for a conveyance of the freehold, and, therefore, it creates an interest in land. As appears clearly from London and South Western Railway Co. v. Gomm (1), and also the judgment of WARRINGTON, J., in Worthing Corp'n. v. Heather (2) as the contract creates an interest in land, equity, if properly invoked, will intervene to decree specific performance of the contract. Before Jan. 1, 1926, equity would have intervened against the defendant, or in the case of a transfer of the property against any person to whom the land had been transferred other than a purchaser for value without notice. The position has been altered by the Land Charges Act, 1925, s. 10, and the Law of Property Act, 1925, ss. 198 and 199, the effect of this legislation being to make obligatory a statutory form of notice if protection is sought, and to obviate the necessity which previously existed of establishing notice as a fact. In the present case, as the option was not registered as an estate contract under the Land Charges Act, it is void against Mr. Broome, the purchaser of the property. In the result, the equitable remedy has gone, but it still remains necessary to examine the common law aspect of the matter. On the execution of the lease, the option contained in cl. 8 was a valid contract at common law binding the defendant, and one for the breach of which he would be liable for damages so long as he continued to be bound by it. That is clearly demonstrated by Goffin v. Houlder (3). On the authority of that case, it is clear that if, at the time of the exercise of the option in June, 1947, the defendant was still bound by that contract, he would be liable in damages to the plaintiff because he had put it out of his power to perform the contract, and it is further clear from that authority that the damages for which he would be liable might be substantial.

The question is whether the defendant is still bound by the contract. Prima facie he is still bound, but it was urged on his behalf that, on the true construction of the lease, this is not the case. It was argued that the definition of the words "lessor" and "tenant" at the beginning of the deed include, in each case, the persons deriving title under him. Therefore, the lease contemplates a possible assignment by the tenant of the benefit of the lease and a possible assignment by the lessor of the reversion. So it follows, it is said, that cl. 8 contemplates by the word "tenant" the person then tenant within the definition as being the person who will give the notice exercising the option, and by the word "lessor" the person then within the definition as being the person to whom it will be given and who will be liable to comply with the notice. It is said that on this construction it becomes necessary to imply, as a term of the contract, that the plaintiff, as the first holder of the option, shall register it as an estate contract because in that way alone can protection be obtained against persons other than the defendant for the time being entitled to the reversion. I cannot accept this reasoning. It is true that the definition both of "lessor" and "tenant" includes the words "the persons deriving title under him," but the parties to the lease are the plaintiff and the defendant. For purposes of convenience, the defendant is described as "hereinafter called the lessor," and the plaintiff as "hereinafter called the tenant." Those terms are extended to include in each case the persons deriving title under them, subject, however, to the qualification imported by the words "which expression where the context so admits . . ." In cl. 8 the word "lessor" primarily means the defendant, and the word "tenant" primarily means the plaintiff. The defendant does not by the force of the language of that clause cease to be within the scope of the word "lessor" as defined merely by parting with the reversion. On the contrary, the force of the language requires that he remain within the scope of that word. In my view, it would require much stronger language than is to be found in cl. 8 to bring about the result that, on parting with the reversion, the defendant ceased to be a party bound by the contract, because that is what the argument involves.

As regards a covenant running with the land, it has been held that a lessor is not discharged by an assignment of the lease: see Stuart v. Joy (4). This case appears to me to be a fortiori because the option does not run with the land. It cannot be said that a purchaser of the reversion is to be held to have accepted at law the burden of the contract merely by taking a conveyance of the property with knowledge of the terms of the lease. To bring about such a position would require novation, and novation could not be brought about in those circumstances, but, if the original lessor does not take steps to see that his purchaser is bound at law to perform the contract in his place or pay damages for his default, why should the original lessor be regarded at law as free of his contractual bargain? It appears to me that unless the original lessor effectively assigns the burden of the contract so that the tenant has the obligation of the purchaser of the reversion in substitution for the original lessor's obligation, then the case is one in which the context, not merely does not permit, but forbids, the term "lessor" to include anyone other than the original lessor, in this case the defendant. For these reasons I have come to the conclusion that the defendant remains bound by the contract contained in cl. 8 of the lease and in the circumstances which I have stated, is liable in damages to the plaintiff for his breach of that contract.

With regard to the quantum of damages, it was submitted on behalf of the defendant that the damages should be only nominal, that argument being based on the well-known passage from the judgment in Hadley v. Baxendale (5) (9 Exch. 354):

Now we think the proper rule in such a case as the present is this: Where two parties have made a contract which one of them has broken, the damages which the other party ought to receive in respect of such breach of contract should be such as may fairly and reasonably be considered either arising naturally, i.e., according to the usual course of things, from such breach of contract itself, or such as may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of both parties, at the time they made the contract, as the probable result of the breach of it.

This question concerns a common law contract to which the common law rule as to damages applies. It appears to me that what must have been in the contemplation of each party was that, should the plaintiff exercise the option, he would as a result either have the property conveyed to him or have damages which represented the loss which he suffered by the circumstance that the property was not conveyed to him. It cannot be urged, and it is not sought to be urged, that there was any duty on the plaintiff to mitigate possible damage by registering the option as an estate contract under the Land Charges Act prior to the breaking of the contract. Further, it cannot be said that there was any breach of an express or implied term of the contract by the plaintiff's omission to register the charge. It appears to me that the case is completely covered, as regards this aspect of it, by the decision and the reasoning of EVE, J., in Goffin v. Houlder (3) to which I have already referred. I must, therefore, assess the damages on the basis that the plaintiff is not confined to nominal damages. In my view, the correct approach to this matter is that put forward by counsel for the plaintiff, namely, that one must see, first, what was the value of the property in question in the open market if offered for sale with vacant possession in the summer of 1947. From that sum so arrived at, there must be deducted the amount payable under the option, £650, and a sum representing the value of the remainder of the lease.

HIS LORDSHIP reviewed the evidence of the valuers called by each party and applying the principle stated above, he assessed the damages at £900.

GLYN v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Singleton, J.), July 5, 1948.]

Income Tax—Settlement—Interest of settlor in settled property—Income deemed to be income of settlor—Appointment of trusts by settlor and son jointly—Finance Act, 1938 (c. 46), s. 38 (3), (4).

Section 38 of the Finance Act, 1938 provides: “(3) If and so long as the settlor has an interest in any income arising under or property comprised in a settlement, any income so arising during the life of the settlor in any year of assessment shall, to the extent to which it is not distributed, be treated for all the purposes of the Income Tax Acts as the income of the settlor for that year, and not as the income of any other person . . .

(4) For the purpose of the last foregoing subsection, the settlor shall be deemed to have an interest in income arising under or property comprised in a settlement, if any income or property which may at any time arise under or be comprised in that settlement is, or will or may become, payable to or applicable for the benefit of the settlor or the wife or husband of the settlor in any circumstances whatsoever . . .”

By a settlement of 1907 certain investments and other property were held on trust for the taxpayer for life, and, subject thereto, to the use of his son in tail male. On Dec. 29, 1928, the taxpayer and his son executed a re-settlement disentailing the settled property, including the investments. Under this re-settlement the trustees were to hold the investments on such trusts as the taxpayer and his son should from time to time jointly appoint, and they were directed to accumulate the income from the investments until the happening of one of certain events recited in the deed, with power thereafter to pay or transfer the accumulations of income to the son for his own use and benefit. No material appointment had been made and none of the events bringing the accumulation provisions to an end had occurred. The income from the investments was accumulated by the trustees and no part of it was distributed within the meaning of s. 38 (3) of the Act of 1938.

HELD: on a true construction of sub-ss. (3) and (4) of s. 38, the taxpayer must be deemed to have an interest in the income from the investments within the meaning of the sub-sections, because by arrangement between him and his son the income at any time might become payable for the taxpayer's benefit, and, as none of it had been distributed in the years of assessment, the whole of it must be treated as the income of the taxpayer for the purposes of sur-tax for those years.

CASE STATED by the Special Commissioners of Income Tax, who held that the taxpayer should be deemed to have an interest, within the meaning of s. 38 (3) and (4) of the Finance Act, 1938, in income from investments subject to a settlement, and that, therefore, the income must be treated as his for the purposes of sur-tax. The appeal was dismissed. The facts appear in the judgment.

Uppjohn, K.C., J. H. Stamp and R. P. Hills for the Crown.

SINGLETON, J.: This case arises out of a re-settlement of certain investments which were formerly held under a settlement of the year 1907, with other investments and property, on trust for Sir Richard Glyn, the taxpayer, for life, and, subject to that, to the use of Mr. R. H. Glyn in tail male with divers remainders over. At some date shortly before Dec. 29, 1928, Mr. R. H. Glyn, the eldest son of Sir Richard Glyn, came of age, and the father and the son agreed to execute a re-settlement to disentail all the settled property, including the investments under consideration in this case. The re-settlement or trust instrument is dated Dec. 29, 1928, and is made between Sir Richard Glyn, of the first part, Mr. R. H. Glyn, of the second part, Lady Glyn, Sir Richard's wife, of the third part, and three trustees. The material parts of the re-settlement are in cl. 10 to 15. Clause 10 reads:

Sir Richard Glyn as settlor hereby surrenders unto Mr. Glyn all that the life interest of Sir Richard Glyn in all and singular the investments mentioned in the fifth schedule hereto to the intent that as regards the last mentioned investments the said life interest shall be wholly extinguished.

Those are the investments the income from which gives rise to this question. They were £20,000 Irish 2½ per cent. Guaranteed Land Stock, and £25,000 Great Western and Great Central 3½ per cent. Guaranteed Stock. By cl. 11:

In exercise of the powers for this purpose conferred on him by the disentailing assurance and of all other powers Mr. Glyn hereby appoints to the trustees all and singular the investments mentioned in the fifth schedule hereto to be held by the trustees upon the trusts and subject to the powers and provisions hereinafter declared concerning the same.

Clause 12:

The trustees shall stand possessed of the investments mentioned in the fifth schedule hereto upon such trusts as Sir Richard Glyn and Mr. Glyn shall from time to time by any deed or deeds revocable or irrevocable jointly appoint and in default of and subject to any such joint appointment upon trust that the trustees may either allow the same or any of them or any part or parts thereof respectively to remain as actually invested so long as the trustees shall think fit . . .

or they may change the investments specified in that clause. Clause 13:

The trustees shall until the death of Mr. Glyn or until the date when he attains the age of 31 years if he has prior to attaining that age married with the consent of Sir Richard Glyn or (if Sir Richard Glyn is not living at the date of such marriage) with the consent of the majority of the trustees or if Mr. Glyn marries with such consent as aforesaid after he attains the age of 31 years but before he attains the age of 35 years then until the date of such marriage or if Mr. Glyn does not marry with such consent as aforesaid before he attains the age of 35 years then until the date when he attains the age of 35 years (whichever shall be the earliest) accumulate the income of the investments mentioned in the fifth schedule hereto and of the property for the time being representing the same by investing the same and the resulting income thereof in any of the investments mentioned in or authorised by the last preceding clause and the power to vary or transpose investments hereinbefore contained shall apply to the investments representing such accumulations or any part thereof.

Clause 14:

If Mr. Glyn shall be living at the date (hereinafter called "the said date") when the provisions hereinbefore contained for the accumulation of the said income cease to be operative or to have effect the trustees may at any time or times thereafter during his life and at their absolute discretion pay or transfer the said accumulations of income (all of which are intended to be comprised in the expression "the accumulated fund" hereinafter used) to Mr. Glyn for his own use and benefit.

Clause 15:

The trustees shall as from the said date hold the investments specified in the fifth schedule hereto and the property for the time being representing the same and (subject as aforesaid) the accumulated fund upon the trusts and subject to the powers and provisions upon and subject to which capital money arising under the Settled

Land Act, 1925, from the farm properties or investments representing the same would be held but not so as to increase or multiply charges or powers of charging.

The Case sets out that "no appointment material to this appeal has yet been made by Sir Richard Glyn and Mr. R. H. Glyn pursuant to cl. 12, and in the years material to this appeal the income of the investments specified in the said fifth schedule was accumulated by the trustees pursuant to the provisions of cl. 13, and no part of it was distributed within the meaning of s. 38 (3) of the Finance Act, 1938." The years in question are the tax years 1937-38 and 1938-39 in respect of additional assessments to sur-tax, and the year 1939-40 in respect of a first assessment to sur-tax.

From the terms of the re-settlement three matters appear clear, and, indeed, they are admitted. First, that there was a re-settlement; secondly, that Sir Richard Glyn was the settlor; and, thirdly, with regard to the investments in the fifth schedule the trustees were to hold them on such trusts as Sir Richard Glyn, the settlor, and his son, Mr. Glyn, should from time to time by any deed or deeds revocable or irrevocable jointly appoint. Then, in cl. 13 of the re-settlement the trustees had a duty to accumulate the income from the investments until one of the events mentioned in that clause happened, and in all the years in question they were accumulating income within the meaning of that clause. In other words, the income from those investments was not distributed. The next thing to be observed is that when one of the events happened, that is, at such date as is defined in cl. 13, thereafter the trustees could at their absolute discretion pay or transfer the accumulations to Mr. Glyn for his own use and benefit. That date had not arrived in any of the three years which are dealt with or covered by this appeal. In the circumstances the question was raised by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue as to the position under s. 38 of the Finance Act, 1938, that part of the Act which deals with income arising under certain settlements which may fall to be treated as the income of the settlor. I thought at one time that sub-s. (2) of s. 38 might apply to this case, but both the learned counsel tell me that it does not, and that is stated in the Case as an admission by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue. All I have to consider is sub-ss. (3) and (4) of s. 38.

Sub-section (3) is in these terms :

If and so long as the settlor has an interest in any income arising under or property comprised in a settlement, any income so arising during the life of the settlor in any year of assessment shall, to the extent to which it is not distributed, be treated for all the purposes of the Income Tax Acts as the income of the settlor for that year, and not as the income of any other person . . .

I need not read the provisos, because nothing turns on them. Sub-sect. (4) reads :

For the purpose of the last foregoing sub-section, the settlor shall be deemed to have an interest in income arising under or property comprised in a settlement, if any income or property which may at any time arise under or be comprised in that settlement is, or will or may become, payable to or applicable for the benefit of the settlor or the wife or husband of the settlor in any circumstances whatsoever.

That is, as everyone agrees, a very wide provision.

It is said by the Crown in this case that, in view of the provision in sub-s. (4) that the settlor shall be deemed to have an interest in income arising under a settlement if any income is, or will or may become, payable to the settlor in any circumstances whatsoever, the fact that there is a joint power in the settlor and his son to appoint in regard to the investments in the fifth schedule means that the settlor has an interest in that income, and that the income, not being distributed in the years in question, is all to be treated for the purpose of the Income Tax Acts as the income of the settlor for those years. It seems a little hard that it should be so. On the other hand, one has to remember the purpose of this section. As ROWLATT, J., said in Cape Brandy Syndicate v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1) ([1921] 1 K.B. 64, 71) :

It is urged by Sir William Finlay that in a taxing Act clear words are necessary in order to tax the subject. Too wide and fanciful a construction is often sought to be given to that maxim, which does not mean that words are to be unduly restricted against the Crown, or that there is to be any discrimination against the Crown in those Acts. It simply means that in a taxing Act one has to look merely at what is clearly said. There is no room for any intendment. There is no equity about a tax. There is no presumption as to a tax. Nothing is to be read in, nothing is to be implied. One can only look fairly at the language used.

Those words were repeated by LORD SIMON, L.C., in the House of Lords, in Canadian Eagle Oil Co., Ltd. v. R. (2) ([1945] 2 All E.R. 499, 507), and, in considering the whole matter, one has to remember what is the purpose of this section. It is to make subject to the Income Tax Acts income arising under certain settlements which prior to the passing of that section was not treated as income of the settlor at all.

Counsel for the taxpayer argued that the words at the end of sub-s. (4), "in any circumstances whatsoever," are so wide that some limitation must be placed on them, and, in construing them, the court ought not to include the contingency of a beneficiary disposing of funds in favour of the settlor. Counsel pointed out that the settlor in this case has not, and never had, power to do anything by himself. The power to appoint is joint. I agree, but I think one has to bear in mind that this was a settlement executed by, and brought about by, a joint arrangement between father and son. The father had the life interest in those funds beforehand, and a change was made with the result which I have mentioned. Counsel for the Crown put it in this way. If the power to appoint in respect of these investments had been in the settlor alone, the case would not have been arguable. If, on the other hand, there was power of appointment reserved to the son alone, then the settlor would have had no interest whatever in the fund, but in the circumstances of re-settlement the power is joint, and the exercise of such a power is not merely a disposition by a beneficiary.

The Special Commissioners, in their findings, accept the argument that the words "in any circumstances whatsoever" cannot be read as including a mere voluntary application of income by a beneficiary to the settlor outside the provisions of the settlement itself. They say:

We should be unable to regard an exercise of the power of appointment under cl. 12 in favour of the taxpayer as being of this nature. In our opinion, the effect of cl. 12 is that "income which may at any time arise under . . . that settlement . . . may become payable to . . . the settlor . . . in any circumstances whatsoever" within the meaning of sub-s. (4), with the result that the taxpayer is to be deemed to have an interest in the income of the said investments within the meaning of sub-ss. (3) and (4).

The joint power cannot be exercised unless both father and son are agreed on it. There is no resultant power to one to do anything in regard to the funds if the other has died. The power must be exercised jointly. One cannot exercise it without the other. Counsel for the Crown was rather inclined to argue that this was the sort of thing which is often reserved in a settlement and is equivalent to an arrangement. It may be, he said, that at some time after the date of the settlement the son would want money. In such circumstances the son could not get money from this trust, he being under the age of 31 or 35 as the case may be, without the consent of the father. The father might be in difficulties, or he might marry again. There might be difficulties arising in regard to the estate or estate management, and the farm properties had been made over to the son for his life interest. Difficulties of all kinds might arise, and in those circumstances the father might be approached by the son or the son might be approached by the father. They could jointly appoint the funds embraced in the fifth schedule. They could appoint them wholly to the son or wholly to the father, or half and half. In those circumstances counsel submitted that the natural meaning of the words of sub-s. (4) was that the father, the settlor, should be deemed to have an interest in income arising under the settlement because the income at any time might become payable for his benefit. It could only do so, as far as I can see, by an arrangement between the father and the son, but that is the sort of arrangement which is often made between father and son.

Although I regret having to come to this decision I think that this case does fall within the words of sub-s. (4), and, consequently, of sub-s. (3). I must give the words their ordinary, natural meaning. It follows that the finding of the Special Commissioners is right, and this appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Re HAYNES' WILL TRUSTS. PITT AND ANOTHER
v. HAYNES AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Roxburgh, J.), June 16, July 2, 1948.]

Will—Forfeiture clause—Gift to son of share in residuary estate subject to forfeiture on alienation—Provision in son's marriage settlement for transfer to settlement trustees of part of son's share in testator's residue after payment thereof to him.

By his will the testator gave his residuary estate on trust for all his children equally subject to certain prior trusts, and, in the case of the sons' shares, he declared that each son was to be paid his share for his own absolute use and benefit if at the time of distribution he had not done or suffered anything whereby his share would, if belonging absolutely to him, have become vested in or payable to some other person or persons, "but if such son shall at the said time of distribution . . . have done or suffered anything whereby his said share . . . would through his act or by operation or process of law or otherwise if belonging absolutely to him have become vested in or payable to some other person or persons," then "his said share" was to be held on other trusts. The testator died in 1884, and in 1888 T.H.H., a son of the testator, executed a marriage settlement whereby, after reciting the forfeiture clause of the testator's will, he covenanted that, when the share in the testator's residuary estate "to which he . . . may become entitled at the time of distribution . . . shall have been paid or transferred to him," he would "forthwith pay or transfer one-third part of such share to" the marriage settlement trustees:—

HELD: (i) on its true construction, the marriage settlement was intended to effect an equitable assignment.

Re Gillott's Settlement, Chattock v. Reid ([1934] Ch. 97), applied.

(ii) on the true construction of the will, the words "or any part thereof" ought to be implied after the words "whereby his said share" in the forfeiture clause, and, accordingly, the equitable assignment under the marriage settlement brought the forfeiture clause into operation.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine whether a marriage settlement executed by a son of the testator was intended to effect an equitable assignment of part of his share in the testator's residuary estate with the result that the share was forfeited under a forfeiture clause in the testator's will. ROXBURGH, J., held that an equitable assignment was intended and that the share in question was, accordingly, forfeited. The facts and the relevant provisions of the will and the marriage settlement appear in the judgment.

B. S. Tatham for the plaintiffs (trustees of the testator's will).

R. W. Goff, R. Cozens-Hardy, Horne, E. Blanshard Stamp and Wigan for defendants (a trustee of the son's will and persons claiming thereunder).

ROXBURGH, J.: The testator, William Haynes, made his will on Aug. 11, 1882, and died on Sept. 19, 1884. By his will he declared that his trustees should stand possessed of his residuary estate in trust for all his children living at his death or born in due time afterwards who being sons or a son should attain the age of 21 years or being daughters or a daughter should attain that age or marry, and, if more than one, in equal shares, but so nevertheless that the share of each such child should be held and applied upon the trusts and with and subject to the powers, provisos and declarations thereafter declared of and concerning the same. The trust of residue was subject to certain prior trusts which I need not specifically mention. The testator then directed and declared that his :

. . . said trustees and trustee shall hold the share in my residuary estate of each son of mine upon trust if such son shall not at the failure or expiration of the aforesaid trust for payment of the said mortgages and incumbrances (herein referred to as "the time of distribution") have been or be outlawed or a bankrupt or have done or suffered anything whereby his share in my said residuary estate would through his act or default or by operation or process of law or otherwise if belonging absolutely to him have become vested in or become payable to some other person or persons to pay and transfer the share of such son to him for his own absolute use and benefit but if such son shall at the said time of distribution have been or be outlawed or a bankrupt or have done or suffered anything whereby his said share in my said residuary estate would through his act or by operation or process of law or otherwise if belonging absolutely to him have become vested in or payable to some other person or persons my said trustees and trustee shall stand possessed of his said share in my said residuary estate . . .

William Haynes had a son, Thomas Henry Haynes, who executed a marriage settlement on Apr. 17, 1888. The marriage settlement, after reciting the forfeiture provisions of the testator's will, proceeds as follows :

Now this indenture witnesseth that in pursuance of the said agreement and in consideration of the said intended marriage it is hereby agreed and declared and the said Thomas Henry Haynes doth hereby for himself his executors and administrators covenant with the said Charles Edward Haynes and James Adams Hewitt their executors administrators and assigns that in case the said intended marriage shall take place the said Thomas Henry Haynes his executors or administrators will when the share in the residuary estate of the said William Haynes deceased to which he or they may become entitled at the time of distribution referred to in the said recited will shall have been paid or transferred to him or them forthwith pay or transfer one-third part of such share to . . .

The intended marriage took place, and the question which I have to determine is whether the marriage settlement operated as a forfeiture. It is reasonably plain that it was not intended so to operate, but that cannot conclude the matter. The real question must be whether on its true construction the deed was intended to bring about a state of affairs which is in law regarded as an equitable assignment. Fortunately for me the matter has been fully considered by MAUGHAM, J., in Re Gillott's Settlement, Chattock v. Reid (1), and I find myself unable to distinguish the present case from that case. My attention has been drawn by counsel for the defendants to a number of authorities which run close to that case and yet have been decided in a different manner, but after considerable hesitation I am satisfied that nothing is contained in any of them which would justify me in disregarding Re Gillott's Settlement (1).

That does not, however, conclude the matter, because in the present forfeiture clause there is not the usual phrase "or any part thereof." I regret to find that I have to accept responsibility for introducing some confusion into this problem. In Fraenkel v. Whitty (2), where I was dealing with a forfeiture clause which did contain the words "or some part thereof," I observed ([1947] 2 All E.R. 646, 647) :

If the words "or some part thereof" had been omitted, it would have been as impossible to argue in this case that all the sums of money vested in the Custodian as it was to argue that the income of a trust fund vested in him in Re Wightman (3).

That remark of mine was plainly obiter dictum, because in the case which I had to decide the words "or some part thereof" did occur. When I wrote that judgment, I had before me the transcript of the judgment of ROMER, J., in Re Wightman, Bradbury v. Cambridge University (3), which is much more extensive than the short note of the decision which is appended to the report in Fraenkel v. Whitty (2), and I should have been glad if that transcript had now been available to me, but that has not proved possible. I do, however, remember clearly that Re Dennis's Settlement Trusts, Dennis v. Dennis (4) was not cited either to ROMER, J., or to myself. There is probably no particular reason why it should have been cited to me, but there was every reason why it should have been cited to ROMER, J. In Re Dennis's Settlement Trusts (4), which contained a forfeiture clause indistinguishable, so far as I can see, from the present clause for this purpose, FARWELL, J., said ([1942] 1 All E.R. 520, 523) :

It is not, in my judgment, possible for the court to supply words in a forfeiture clause in an instrument of this kind. That seems to be the effect of the judgment of CHITTY, J., in Re Brewer's Settlement (5). CHITTY, J., said ([1896] 2 Ch. 503, 507) : "In construing clauses of cesser or forfeiture such as that before me, the court is not at liberty to depart from the language of the document. The words 'or cease to be payable to himself' are not in the settlement ; and I find myself unable to say that, by any just method of construction applicable to such clauses, I ought to supply those words." Therefore, in my judgment, I am bound to construe the words which are actually used, and not to extend them or to read into the clause words which in fact are not there. The first point that was taken on behalf of the son was on the words : "... whereby the income of the trust funds would, if belonging to the son absolutely, become vested in or charged in favour of some other person or persons or corporation." It is said that there is not inserted here the words "Whereby the income or any part thereof would if belonging to the son become vested in or charged to some other person," and that the clause must be read as though it only took effect in the event of the whole of the income being vested in or charged in favour of some other person or persons. I am not able to adopt that view. In my judgment, it clearly is intended that the forfeiture is to take effect if any part of the income becomes vested in or charged in favour of some other person or persons.

I find some little difficulty in applying that decision for the following reasons. The words of the forfeiture clause are :

... but if such son shall at the said time of distribution have been or be outlawed or a bankrupt or have done or suffered anything whereby his said share in my residuary estate would through his act or by operation or process of law or otherwise if belonging absolutely to him have become vested in or payable to some other person or persons my said trustees and trustee shall stand possessed of his said share . . .

It is common ground that "his said share," when the phrase is last used, means "the whole of his said share" and I find some difficulty in giving a different meaning to the phrase "his said share" when it occurs a little earlier in the clause, having regard to the principle which was stated by CHITTY, J. ([1896] 2 Ch. 503, 507) in Re Brewer's Settlement (5) and which FARWELL, J., recognised and approved, viz. :

In construing clauses of cesser or forfeiture such as that before me, the court is not at liberty to depart from the language of the document.

It seems to me that the logical manner of arriving at the view that the document was intended to operate when there was an assignment, not only of the share, but of any part thereof, would be to say that the words "or any part thereof" ought to be implied by necessary implication from the tenor of the instrument as a whole, and yet that might appear to be proceeding in a manner not authorised by the principle laid down in Re Brewer's Settlement (5). However that may be, in my judgment, the decision of FARWELL, J., in Re Dennis's Settlement Trusts (4) is indistinguishable. The decision of ROMER, J., in Re Wightman (3) is not fully reported, and the whole text of his judgment is not available. It is certain that the decision of FARWELL, J., in Re Dennis's Settlement Trusts (4) was not cited to him. My own observation in Fraenkel v. Whitty (2) is plainly obiter dictum, and, in those circumstances, I feel that I ought to follow and apply the judgment of FARWELL, J., in Re Dennis's Settlement Trusts (4).

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Roxburgh, J.), June 30, July 1, 1948.]

Family Provision—Time for application—Summons issued before representation taken out—Statement in will of reasons for dispositions—Admissibility of evidence as to reasons—Inheritance (Family Provision) Act, 1938 (c. 45), ss. 1 (7), 2 (1).

The Inheritance (Family Provision) Act, 1938, s. 2 (1) provides: “. . . an order under this Act shall not be made save on an application made within six months from the date on which representation in regard to the testator's estate for general purposes is first taken out.”

The testator died on Oct. 29, 1946, and the summons in an application under the Act of 1938 was issued on Mar. 18, 1947. Representation was not granted until May 6, 1947.

HELD: the application, although made before representation was taken out, was made before Nov. 6, 1947, when the period of six months from the date of the grant expired, and it was, therefore, within the provisions of s. 2 (1).

Quære: whether under R.S.C., Ord. 54F it is permissible to start an application before probate, provided it can be discovered who are named as executors in the will, irrespective of whether they ultimately prove the will or not.

Section 1 (7) of the Act provides: “The court shall also, on any such application, have regard to the testator's reasons, so far as ascertainable, for making the dispositions made by his will, or for not making any provision or any further provision . . . for a dependant, and the court may accept such evidence of those reasons as it considers sufficient, including any statement in writing signed by the testator and dated, so, however, that in estimating the weight, if any, to be attached to any such statement the court shall have regard to all the circumstances from which any inference can reasonably be drawn as to the accuracy or otherwise of the statement.” The testator stated in his will his reason for making no provision for his wife.

HELD: the statement in the will did not, on the construction of s. 1 (7), preclude the taking of evidence of the testator's reasons for excluding his wife, nor were those claiming through the testator estopped by the statement from adducing such evidence.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS by which the plaintiff applied under the Inheritance (Family Provision) Act, 1938, for provision to be made for her support out of her deceased husband's estate, from participation in which she had been excluded by her husband's will for a reason therein stated. The application was dismissed.

B. S. Tatham for the first and second defendants, the executors of the will.

Jennings, K.C., and M. J. Albery for the third and fourth defendants, persons interested under the will.

ROXBURGH, J.: This is a short, but important, point. The Inheritance (Family Provision) Act, 1938, s. 2 provides:

(1) Except as provided by s. 4 of this Act, an order under this Act shall not be made save on an application made within six months from the date on which representation in regard to the testator's estate for general purposes is first taken out.

Section 4 is, for the present purpose, immaterial, and I do not think any other section of the Act is relevant, but R.S.C., Ord. 54F, rr. 1 and 2, are material. They are as follows:

(1) An application to the High Court under s. 1 of the Inheritance (Family Provision) Act, 1938 (in this Order called the Act) shall be made in the Chancery Division by originating summons . . . and shall be intitled in the matter of the estate of the deceased to which the summons relates and in the matter of the Act. (2) (1) On an application under s. 1 of the Act the person applying shall be plaintiff and the executor or other personal representative of the testator's estate shall be defendant.

The testator died on Oct. 29, 1946; the summons was taken out on Mar. 18, 1947; no representation was granted until May 6, 1947; and, therefore, the summons was taken out before probate. Was the application good within s. 2 (1) of the Act? The question of construction is not easy, but I propose to guide myself by two considerations. The first arises from the submission made by counsel that for the purposes of s. 2 (1) time begins to run from the date of the grant of representation, and that, therefore, an application made before the grant must necessarily be made before the commencement of the period of time within which application may be made and so be a nullity. If that construction be correct, as far more than six months have now elapsed since the date of the grant, this blunder, if it be a blunder, would be fatal to the plaintiff's claim. That any blunder of that sort should completely and finally deprive a litigant of recourse to the court would challenge the foundations of natural justice. That is one principle by which I propose to guide myself. The other is that the obvious purpose of this section is to prevent applications from being made too late when parties have altered their position in face of the dispositions made by the testator. It seems to me improbable that Parliament ever thought of applications which might be made too soon.

Bearing those considerations in mind, I propose to construe the section in this way. It is to be noted, first, that s. 2 directs the attention of the court, not to the application, but to the order and it provides: "... an order ... shall not be made save on an application made within six months from the date on which representation ... is first taken out." The time to look at the matter, it seems to me, is the time when the court is about to make an order, and the court must then see what was the application on which the order is sought. For that purpose it looks at the date on which representation was first taken out, in this case May 6, 1947. It then calculates six months from that date which brings one to Nov. 6, 1947. Then it asks: "Was the application made before Nov. 6, 1947?", and, if the answer is "Yes," then, in my judgment, the application was made within six months from the date on which representation in regard to the testator's estate for general purposes was first taken out. I am not sure that I should have been able so to construe these words but for the important considerations to which I have referred. I think, however, that those responsible for drafting the rules applicable to this matter may have had some inkling of what might happen, because r. 2 provides that the executor or other personal representative shall be the defendant and that the matter should be intitled in the matter of the estate of the deceased. I think that the draftsmen of these rules must have had in mind the time when the application could first be made, but the rules do not make the position clear.

Counsel for the plaintiff has strenuously argued that it is permissible under these rules to start an application before probate, provided you can find out who are named as executors in the will, irrespective of whether they ultimately prove the will or not. I am not proposing to decide as a matter of construction whether such a course is permissible under the rules, because it appears to me that, if and so far as the only irregularity is under the rules, it is too late to take the point. It is a point of no substance on the merits because the very persons who were named as defendants and are described as the persons who claim to be the executors of the will, did, in fact, become the executors. I wish to say nothing to encourage the idea that applications of this character should be made before the grant of representation, though, if somebody is bold enough to try the experiment again and objection is taken in due time, it would be for the court which has to hear the objection to decide whether or not the applicant was out of time. Accordingly, I dismiss the preliminary point. I shall make no special order as to costs.

The next point which I have to determine is what evidence is admissible as a matter of law under s. 1 (7) of the Act. It is necessary to determine that point before reading the evidence in this case. Section 1 (7) provides:

The court shall also, on any such application, have regard to the testator's reasons, so far as ascertainable, for making the dispositions made by his will, or for not making any provision or any further provision, as the case may be, for a dependant, and the court may accept such evidence of those reasons as it considers sufficient, including any statement in writing signed by the testator and dated, so, however, that in estimating the weight, if any, to be attached to any such statement the court shall have regard to all the circumstances from which any inference can reasonably be drawn as to the accuracy or otherwise of the statement.

In this will the testator has made a statement of his reasons. For the purpose of this point it is immaterial to read that statement, and as this case is one of some general interest I do not want to encumber it with matters of a personal nature.

The proposition of law advanced by counsel for the plaintiff is that, as the testator has made a statement of his reasons in his will, no evidence can be given as to the reasons he had for not making any provision for his wife. First, counsel bases his submission on the construction of the statute, but it appears to me that every line of the statute indicates the opposite conclusion. The direction to the court is couched in the widest possible language. The court is directed to "have regard to the testator's reasons, so far as ascertainable." That would not lead one to expect that the Act meant "so far as is stated in his will if so stated." The sub-section continues: "and the court may accept such evidence of those reasons as it considers sufficient." That is an invitation to the court to do something which, if counsel's construction is correct, a court has, none the less, no jurisdiction to do. It proceeds: "including any statement in writing signed by the testator and dated." I suppose some wills are not dated, although they usually are, and if there was any such presumption as counsel has suggested, it is strange to find that phrase which while it includes a will, includes innumerable other forms of statements. In my view, that is giving the court power either to accept or reject any statement in, among other things, the will. Then the sub-section says:

... that in estimating the weight, if any, to be attached to any such statement the court shall have regard to all the circumstances from which any inference can reasonably be drawn as to the accuracy or otherwise of the statement.

Counsel, secondly, based his submission on a doctrine of estoppel, his argument being that defendants who claim through a testator are, by a principle of law, estopped by statements in his will. Counsel cited no authority in support of this as a principle for the construction of a statute or in any context comparable with that with which I am now dealing, and I decline to hold that the discretion which, in my judgment, is conferred on the court expressly by s. 1 (7) is so to be curtailed.

Re DIPLOCK'S ESTATE. SIMPSON AND OTHERS v. LILBURN.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Greene, M.R., Wrottesley and Evershed, L.JJ.), July 26, 27, 1948.]

Money—How far money can be followed Money paid to charitable institutions by executors under a mistake as to the construction of a will—Directions in will void for uncertainty—Right of those entitled under an intestacy to trace—Money paid by charity into its "general fund."

A charitable institution had a general banking account into which all money received by it was paid, but it kept a number of separate accounts, with separate balance sheets, relating to the special objects covered by its charitable activities. In addition to the special funds the charity had a general fund which had its own account dealing with any money which was not allocated to a special fund. Pursuant to a direction in a testator's will (which was later declared void for uncertainty) executors paid £1,500 to the charity which, the money not being allocated to any special fund, paid it into its banking account to the account of its general fund. Subsequently, the testator's next of kin challenged the direction in the testator's will, and the executors wrote to the charitable institution informing it of the challenge and calling on it not to deal with the £1,500 until further notice. Before this intimation had been received £500, and after its receipt £1,000, was withdrawn by the charity from its banking account and placed on deposit at the Post Office Savings Bank. In an action by the testator's next of kin to recover the money which had been wrongly paid to the charity:—

HELD: the accounts treated the banking account and the Savings Bank deposit account as a conglomerate mass and attributed slices of them to the various special funds; there was nothing to show that the charity had definitely attributed any particular bank monies to any particular account; and, therefore, it was impossible to treat any item held by the charity as identifiable wholly or in part with the testator's money, the right to trace was non-existent and the rule in Clayton's case (1816) (1 Mer. 529, 572) applied. The claim in rem, accordingly, failed and the next of kin had only their rights under their personal claim.

Case referred to:

(1) Devaynes v. Noble, Clayton's Case, (1816), 1 Mer. 529, 572; 12 Digest 483, 3961.

APPEAL from a judgment of WYNN-PARRY, J., delivered on Mar. 11, 1947, and reported sub nom., Re Diplock's Estate. Diplock and Others v. Wintle and Others (and Associated Actions), [1947] 1 All E.R. 522.

The action was brought by persons entitled to share in such part of an estate as to which the testator died intestate to recover certain sums of money paid to the defendant, a charitable institution, by the executors of the testator's will under a direction which was subsequently declared by the House of Lords to be void for uncertainty; Chichester Diocesan Fund v. Simpson ([1944] 2 All E.R. 60). The action was one of a group of actions and WYNN-PARRY, J., held, inter alia, that the rule that money paid under a mistake of law was irrecoverable was of general application and that the plaintiffs could not maintain a claim for the return of the money as money had and received. On July 9, 1948 (reported ante, p. 318) the Court of Appeal allowed the appeals on the general grounds: (i) that the plaintiffs had a right in personam in equity against the recipients which was not liable to be defeated by the fact that the payment to them had been made under a mistake of law by the executors, and (ii) that the plaintiffs had a right in rem to the money recognised by equity, which would enable them to trace the money, providing only that it was possible to identify or disentangle it where it had been mixed with assets of the recipients. In the case of the money paid to the National Institute for the Deaf, the defendants in the present case, on the facts as then supposed the Court of Appeal held that the plaintiffs had a right in rem to the money on the ground that it had been earmarked, for the purposes of the charity's own accounts, as Diplock money (ante, pp. 363, 364). On it being learned that the facts were not as supposed, the court admitted a new agreed statement of facts, heard argument thereon, and delivered the following supplementary judgment, holding that the rule in Clayton's case (1) applied, that all the plaintiffs could claim against the charity was a personal claim, and that their right to trace was non-existent. The facts appear in the judgment of LORD GREENE, M.R.

*Pascoe Hayward, K.C., J. L. Arnold and Cockle for next of kin.
Neville Gray, K.C., and Dunbar for the charitable institution.*

LORD GREENE, M.R. : The present question arises in the case of the National Institute for the Deaf. In our original judgment, in dealing with that case we took the view that Clayton's case (1) did not, on the facts as then supposed, come into question because the charity had in its own accounts treated a certain Post Office Savings Bank deposit account as representing the £1,500 of Diplock money. The view we took on that basis was as follows (p. 363 ante) :

Here, however, the charity has earmarked the sums withdrawn from its account and deposited at the Post Office Savings Bank. It seems to us that equity cannot disregard this. A volunteer, who mixes what turns out to be trust money with his own, can surely himself "unmix" it subsequently if he thinks fit to do so. And as the operation of equity is directed to preventing the volunteer doing what is unconscionable, surely it would be unconscionable for the volunteer, who, for his own purposes, has earmarked the trust money, to assert that what he has earmarked is not trust money but money which he is entitled to keep as his own.

The facts as they were then supposed to exist amounted to a clear case of what we described as earmarking, and we took the view that the charity, by doing that, had precluded itself from asserting that the specific item round which it had tied a label "Diplock money" was, in fact, their own free charity money. It turns out that the facts as they were stated in the agreed statement of facts were not as supposed. The earmarking of this money as Diplock money was not an earmarking generally, but was done for the sole purpose of precaution over against the possibility which was then contemplated that the Diplock money might have to be repaid. On that basis it is now agreed that that cannot be treated as a specific earmarking of that deposit account as representing Diplock money.

We have given leave to make some consequential amendments in the defence and we have admitted a new agreed statement of facts which now forms the basis of the present discussion. The case as now presented in respect of this deposit account is of a quite different character. It is said : "We do not now find anywhere in the accounts or anywhere else a specific earmarking of that particular account to the Diplock money, but we do find in the charity's accounts an account of its general fund to which this particular Post Office deposit account is attributable." It is admitted that, if that argument does not prevail, the rule in Clayton's case (1) will operate against the plaintiffs, because on the basis of that rule the whole of the Diplock money has been spent and so has disappeared. The present attempt to avoid that result, based on the propositions that we accepted in our original judgment, is founded on the form of the accounts kept by the charity. The charity kept several accounts. I am looking at the year ending March, 1937, when there was an account called the Hospital for Deaf Boys' Fund, an account called Mrs. F. E. Richards' Bequest, and an account for the Bath Homes for Deaf and Dumb Women, and a general account of what is called "General Fund." That system of accounting runs on during the relevant period. Each of those funds has its own separate balance sheet. There is no suggestion that separate bank accounts were kept for those different funds. The charity had one banking account. In each case the capital account for the fund is set out. On the left-hand side of this balance sheet appear assets which are attributed to that fund, and there is a balancing figure, described as "cash at bank," consisting of the attribution to each particular fund of what one may call a slice of the charity's banking account. Turning to the year ending Mar. 31, 1939, the capital account of the general fund starts with the entry on its left-hand side of £21,559 "as per last account." Reference to the account of the general fund as at Mar. 31, 1937, shows that the Diplock £1,500 had in that year gone into the general fund, as is specifically referred to in the balance sheet of that year. The capital account general fund appears to have been an account into which legacies and gifts were carried which were not earmarked or allocated to one of the separate funds. Into it there was carried at the end of the year any excess of income over expenditure. Similarly, in every year in which the balance was the other way and there was an excess of expenditure over income, the deficit was carried to the debit of the capital account general fund. That account, therefore, was obviously a mere residuary account of what was left in the assets and liabilities of the charity after segregating the assets and liabilities attributable to the special funds.

The claim here relates merely to the £1,500. It is said that the plaintiffs can identify the £1,500 deposited at the Post Office Savings Bank and attribute it, or, rather, some rateable proportion of it, to the Diplock money on the basis that that particular deposit has been earmarked, to use the language of our previous judgment, as containing some proportion of the Diplock money. I do not read these accounts or the agreed statement of facts as leading to any such conclusion. This method of accountancy does not appear to me to amount to the sort of earmarking with which we were dealing on the original supposed facts. On the face of it, as I have said, it does nothing more than attribute to each particular fund which is comprised in these accounts, including the general fund, a slice of the charity's banking account. The charity, in point of fact, had money at the Post Office Savings Bank, as we know, and also a large sum of money in its general banking account. The figure described as "cash at bank" attributed to the various funds in these accounts makes no attempt to differentiate between these two accounts. There is nothing to show that the charity has definitely or finally or for some particular purpose attributed any particular bank monies to any particular account. There is nothing, on the face of the accounts, to prevent the charity applying the Savings Bank money for one of the other funds. What the accounts do is to treat the two banking accounts as a conglomerate mass and attribute slices of it to the various funds. That, no doubt, was a very convenient method of accountancy.

I do not find it necessary to go very deeply into an analysis of these various accounts. What I have said is, I think, sufficient to show that, in my opinion, this Savings Bank deposit money cannot be regarded as having been earmarked in the sense in which we used that expression in our earlier judgment. On the facts then before us we thought that there had been a definite clear segregation of a particular investment—a particular investment put away, so to speak, in the drawer as being and representing the Diplock money. I cannot find here that the Savings Bank deposit account has been treated in any comparable way, either in its entirety or in regard to some part of it. In the result, the claim, in my opinion, fails and all that the plaintiffs can claim against the National Institute for the Deaf, Clayton's case (1) having the effect which I have already stated, is a claim under a personal judgment and their right to trace is non-existent.

WROTTESELEY, L.J. : I agree.

EVERSHED, L.J. : I also agree. For the purpose of recording the matter and correcting the judgment, it seems to me that a convenient course would be to treat that part of the judgment (see pp. 363 C-D-364 (top) ante) beginning, "but before the applicability" down to and including the words, "could discuss Clayton's case (1) at all," as struck out and to substitute words to this effect : "On the facts of this case, as appearing from the defence which we have given leave to amend, the statement of admitted facts, and the supplementary statement of admitted facts now before the court, it seems impossible to treat any item held by this defendant as now identifiable wholly or in part with the Diplock money. We see, therefore, no ground for saying that the rule in Clayton's case (1) does not apply, and the plaintiff's claim in rem against this defendant fails accordingly."

LORD GREENE, M.R. : I entirely agree. It would be a very convenient course to treat the judgment as having been revised in the sense my brother has put it.

WROTTESELEY, L.J. : I also entirely agree.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 16. SCOTT, L.J., read the following judgment of the court. On Dec. 28, 1928, the Territorial Association for the County of London, acquired the freehold of a house, No. 75, Devonport Road, Hammersmith. By a written agreement of Feb. 11, 1941, the association let the ground floor and basement to the tenant, Nichols, on a weekly tenancy from Feb. 24, 1941, at 27s. 6d. a week. In October, 1943, the association orally let the first and second floors, also on a weekly tenancy, to the tenant, Parker. In August, 1947, both of the tenants were served by the association with notices to quit, the validity of which, as notices, is not challenged. Neither moved out. The association then sought, and, in the result, obtained from CROOM-JOHNSON, J., orders for possession. The present appeals are from those orders.

The main point raised in the two appeals is identical, but the tenant, Nichols, relies in addition on a ground of appeal, namely, estoppel, which is not open to the tenant, Parker. The main point raises three questions: (a) whether the Crown is or is not bound by the Rent Restrictions Acts, and (b) if it is not, whether the immunity of the Crown extends to entities so related to the Crown as is a territorial association; and if so, (c) whether it so extends for purposes which include the two lettings involved in the present case. If the association had been an ordinary lessor there would have been no ground for making (and, indeed, no jurisdiction to make) an order for possession. The notice to quit would merely have operated to constitute the tenants statutory as opposed to contractual tenants. If, however, the association are "the Crown," or a body invested with the Crown's relevant immunities, and if these exclude the operation of the Rent Restrictions Acts, the notices to quit are effective, the tenants have no answer to the claim, and the judgment a quo must be affirmed.

As regards the first question: "Is the Crown bound by the Rent Restrictions Acts?" we entertain no doubt that the general answer (leaving aside questions as to who or what is to be taken to be "the Crown") is "No." There are five direct authorities on the point all giving the same answer, two of them being decisions of this court and binding on it: Clark v. Dounes (1) in the Divisional Court; Wirral Estates, Ltd. v. Shaw (2) in the Court of Appeal; Wheeler v. Wirral Estates, Ltd. (3) in the Court of Appeal; Rudler v. Franks (4) in the Divisional Court; and Territorial Forces Association v. Philpot (5), a decision of a court of first instance. It is quite true that in the Court of Appeal decisions the point was in some degree assumed, certainly not elaborately contested, but authorities were cited (as appears from the summary of the argument in Wirral Estates, Ltd. v. Shaw (2) ([1932] 2 K.B. 247, 252)), and the court clearly decided that the Crown was not bound. Counsel for the tenants contended, notwithstanding these specific and binding decisions on the actual statutes involved in the present case, that while, in general, the Crown was not bound by a statute except by express provision therein or necessary implication, yet this rule was subject to an exception in the case of all statutes passed "for the public good," and that the Rent Restrictions Acts were of this character. For this proposition he relied on a passage in BACON'S ABRIDGMENT, cited in HALSBURY'S LAWS OF ENGLAND, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 31, pp. 521, 522, footnote (g). We do not know what precise meaning attached to the words "for the public good" when BACON'S ABRIDGMENT was published. Possibly the words had a meaning narrower than would attach to them today. It is difficult to suppose at the present day that any public statute is not, in theory at least, directed to the welfare of the public, and counsel's argument on this point, if accepted, would compel us to say that such statutes as the Income Tax Act, 1842, and the Public Health Acts (neither of which are binding on the Crown) are not for the public benefit. But if the ancient rule ever had, in fact, the wide meaning claimed for it, we can only conclude that it has been eaten away by exceptions. In any case we are precluded from giving effect to that wide meaning in the particular case of the Rent Restrictions Acts by decisions which, as indicated above, bind us.

Accordingly, we have to consider next whether, assuming the Crown is immune from the operation of the Rent Restrictions Acts, the association enjoys that immunity in respect of the tenancies involved in these appeals. Such an inquiry logically falls into two parts: (1) Is the association a sufficiently intimate "emanation" from the Crown to attract the contagion of the Crown's immunity; (2) if so, can it claim that immunity in respect of these particular transactions, namely, leases of property owned by the association to ordinary, non-military tenants. These questions, though logically distinct, in practice tend to coalesce in the sense that the answer to both depends to a great extent on the provisions of the Territorial and Reserve Forces Act, 1907, which not only affect the status of territorial associations, but the specific transactions in which they must, or may lawfully, engage. To these provisions, accordingly, we next advert. The material provisions are, in the main, the following: s. 1 (1), (2), and (3) (b); s. 2 (1) and (2) (a) and (c); s. 3 (1); and s. 4 (1) (b). Under s. 4, which empowers the Army Council to make regulations, a number of regulations were made, of which the most important for the present purpose is reg. 918 of the Territorial Army Regulations, 1936. This reads as follows:

Property vested in or held by an association may be let or sub-let in any manner (political meetings not excluded) consistent with the military requirements of the T.A., and with the terms on which the property is held, provided that—(a) proper guarantees are obtained that any damage caused will be made good by the users; (b) the rent charged for the use of the property is fixed at an amount which is at least sufficient to cover the expenses incidental to the letting, due regard being had to the fact that, if association property is so let or sub-let, it becomes liable to assessment for local rates on the value of the use for other than military purposes.

It seems to us to emerge clearly from a conspectus of these provisions: (1) that the Army Council and the Secretary of State for War, who is its head and mouthpiece, are direct emanations from the Crown, that they share its privilege of immunity from the operation of statutes except in so far as the contrary intention appears expressly or by necessary implication from the terms of the statute or statutes in question, and that the contrary intention does not appear in the Rent Restrictions Acts, and hence a lease granted by the Army Council itself would not be a lease to which those Acts apply; (2) that under the Territorial and Reserve Forces Act, 1907, certain administrative functions of the Crown are transferred to the territorial associations; (3) that these functions are to be exercised by such associations under the strictest control and supervision by the Army Council; (4) that one of such functions is that of holding land and letting it (when not usable or being used for direct military purposes) to ordinary members of the public.

What light do these considerations throw on the two logically distinct, but interlocked, questions which we have formulated above? (A) As regards status, we are of opinion that a territorial association is, like a Minister or organ of the central government, a direct emanation from the Crown, and not in this respect comparable with local government authorities. These last do not, in general, attract the relevant Crown privilege in respect of statutes, though they do so in exceptional cases where they fulfil functions which, though chargeable on the local rates, are of nation-wide scope and import, e.g., the provision of buildings (such as judge's lodgings and assize courts) for the administration of justice. We think that the function of helping to raise a Territorial Army is typically a function of this order (the King is the fountain of justice and the head of the armed forces), and contrasts sharply with functions, semi-commercial and discharged previously by private commercial bodies, such as are vested in public corporations like the Mersey Docks Board, which were held by the House of Lords, accordingly, in Mersey Docks & Harbour Board v. Cameron (6) not to exempt that body from rates. This matter is discussed at length in an article by the late SIR WILLIAM HARRISON MOORE in 23 LAW QUARTERLY REVIEW, p. 12, et seq. The article acknowledges and illustrates the obscurity of the question who, for purposes such as the present, is to be treated as the Crown or as a body "around which the Crown's shield is thrown." We are, however, clearly of opinion that the Territorial Association falls on the "privileged" side of a line which cannot be precisely drawn. (B) If it is a pre-requisite of enjoying the privilege that the body concerned should not only enjoy Crown status but be, in the transaction under review, acting in the pursuit of Crown purposes, we are of opinion that territorial associations attract Crown immunity, not only in so far as they occupy land or buildings by themselves or their military staff or officers, but also in so far as they exercise the powers (granted them by the present statute) of leasing redundant or unused premises to members of the public. This, in our decided view, is a "Crown purpose." The relevant "purpose," in our view, is that of the territorial association as lessor, not that of the unofficial lessee. To the lessee, no doubt, nothing matters except that he is getting somewhere to live. That is his "purpose," and to him it is a matter of indifference why, how, or from whom he comes to obtain his lease. The purpose of the lessor association, on the other hand, is, if and when and so far as premises at its disposal are not needed for the occupation of armed forces, but may in time be needed for that purpose again, to ensure, in pursuance of the powers and duties conferred and imposed on it by the Act, that in the interim such premises do not run to waste unused and unlet, but rather that they shall be economised and exploited for the benefit of the public and the Exchequer. Much confusion is caused in this matter by importing liability to rates as a relevant criterion. In rating, occupation is the test. So long as the Crown occupies premises by its servants, those servants do not themselves occupy, and are, therefore, not rateable, and the Crown itself, on whose behalf they are there, is immune from rates. So soon, however, as the Crown lets to an independent occupier, that occupier becomes rateable because he occupies. Regulation 918 is careful to affirm this position as to rateability when a territorial association lets to a private individual. This circumstance has, in our view, no bearing whatever on the problem presented by the present appeals. To say that, if the association lets premises acquired and held by it for Crown purposes to X and X thereby becomes rateable, it follows that the association ceases to hold the premises for Crown purposes is a non sequitur. Our conclusion, therefore, on this, the main point in the appeal, is that the association is not bound by the Rent Restrictions Acts in respect of the material leases and is not precluded by those Acts from asserting its claim to possession.

[His LORDSHIP added that in the case against Nichols a further point was relied on by the tenant, founded on estoppel. In the amended particulars the point was pleaded as follows :

The plaintiffs are estopped from alleging that the premises are not controlled premises by reason of the representation, express or implied, made by their agents in two rent books to the effect that the premises were controlled premises, on which representation the defendant acted to his detriment by not thereafter seeking other premises to occupy in lieu thereof.

CROOM-JOHNSON, J., in delivering judgment in the case, referred to the well-known passages on the subject of estoppel contained in the judgment of BRETT, J., in Carr v. London & North Western Ry. Co. (7) (L.R. 10 C.P. 307, 316, 317). LORD CRANWORTH, V.-C., expressed himself in similar terms in West v. Jones (8) (1 Sim N.S. 205, 207) as follows :

... where a party has, by words or by conduct, made a representation to another leading him to believe in the existence of a particular fact or state of facts, and that other person has acted on the faith of such representation, then the party who made the representation shall not afterwards be heard to say that the facts were not as he represented them to be.

Apart altogether from the fact that Nichols gave no very clear evidence proving that, but for the statements in the rent book, he would have sought other premises, the court thought that the plea of estoppel must fail. A letter written to Nichols by the landlords' agents on Feb. 10, 1941, must have conveyed to his mind the fact that he could at any time be dispossessed on one week's notice, and representations, in order to operate as estoppels, must be free from ambiguity in their terms. Furthermore the plea of estoppel must fail on the ground that the statements in the rent book, if amounting to a representation at all, constituted a representation of law and not of fact.] In our judgment, both appeals fail and must be dismissed with costs.

Appeals dismissed with costs.

BOYT v. BOYT.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Tucker and Somervell, L.JJ.), July 9, 1948.]

Divorce—Custody—Custody pending suit—Preservation of status quo until trial. Husband and Wife—Proceedings by wife—Injunction—Matrimonial home belonging to wife—Right to exclude husband.

A husband and a wife and their three children occupied as their matrimonial home a house belonging to the wife. On Dec. 16, 1947, the wife left the house, alleging the husband's cruelty as her reason for doing so, and she went to her brother's house, taking with her the two daughters, aged 16 and 12, but leaving behind the son, aged 3, in the care of his nurse. Her solicitors later informed the husband that she could not return to the house while he was there, and, accordingly, he left on Dec. 26, and the wife returned there with her younger daughter. On Mar. 30, 1948, the husband telephoned saying that he would be returning to the house on the following day, and the wife thereupon arranged to go back to her brother's house with the children. She sent the son and the younger daughter in the car with the nurse, but the husband stopped the car and took the daughter back with him to the wife's house. On Apr. 28, the wife filed a petition for divorce on the ground of the husband's cruelty. By his answer the husband denied the wife's allegations and asked for restitution of conjugal rights. On May 1, the husband took the son and the nurse back to the wife's house. The wife applied (a) for the custody of the younger daughter and the son pending suit, and (b) for an injunction to restrain the husband from entering her house:—

HELD: (i) in regard to the custody of children pendente lite, the status quo which it was desirable to preserve, bearing in mind that the interests of the children were the paramount consideration, was the state of affairs which existed on Mar. 29, 1948, and, therefore, the wife was entitled to the custody of the children until the suit was heard. Where there was no allegation against the husband or the wife in regard to his or her conduct as a parent, it was the duty of the court to decide what was best for the child irrespective of any preference which the child might express for one parent or the other.

(ii) where property belonged to the wife, the court had jurisdiction to grant an injunction to restrain the husband from entering the premises, but the jurisdiction was one which would be exercised with care, especially where it involved the breaking up of the matrimonial home. In the circumstances of the case, the wife was entitled to the injunction.

INTERLOCUTORY APPEAL by the wife from an order of BARNARD, J., dated June 18, 1948, refusing her applications for (a) the custody of the children until the hearing of her divorce petition, and (b) an injunction to restrain the husband from entering on premises which had been the matrimonial home but were her property. The Court of Appeal allowed the appeal and granted to the wife the custody of the children pendente lite and the injunction. The facts appear in the judgment of TUCKER, L.J.

Holroyd Pearce, K.C., and J. E. N. Russell for the wife.
Raeburn, K.C., and Ormrod for the husband.

TUCKER, L.J. : This is an appeal from a decision of BARNARD, J., in a divorce suit whereby he refused the wife's application for custody pending suit of two children of the marriage, a son, aged 3 years and 10 months, and a daughter, Suzy, aged 12½. He also refused the application of the wife for an injunction to restrain her husband from entering on the premises known as Enford House, Enford, the property of the wife, the petitioner in the suit.

The husband had been serving in the army, and after leaving the army he returned to what had been the matrimonial home, namely, Enford House, Enford. During the war the wife had been with the children at Shrewsbury at the house of her brother. The petition by the wife is dated Apr. 20, 1948, and is based on allegations of cruelty. By his answer the husband denies these allegations and alleges that on Dec. 16, 1947, the wife withdrew from cohabitation with him and has refused, and continues to refuse, to return and render him conjugal rights, and he asks for an order that she should do so. On Dec. 16, 1947, the wife left Enford and went to her brother's house at Shrewsbury. She left the little boy, Henry, behind in the care of his nurse, but she took the girls with her. There was another girl, called Bula, who is not concerned in the present proceedings because she is over 16. A week or two later the wife's solicitors on her behalf informed the husband that she could not return to Enford while he was there. Accordingly, on Dec. 26 the husband left and the wife went back to Enford with the girl, Suzy. The husband stayed with his brother not far away. On Mar. 30 the husband telephoned saying that he was returning the next day, and, as the wife's attitude, rightly or wrongly, was that she could not be in the house with him because of the state of her health, which, she said, was due to his treatment, she arranged to go back to her brother's. She sent Suzy and Henry with the nurse in the car, but the husband stopped the car, and took Suzy back to Enford with him. On May 1, he also took Henry and the nurse to Enford. On May 28 this summons was issued. What appears to have led up to the telephone conversation of Mar. 30, was that the husband had been suggesting that he should approach the wife's father for financial assistance. The wife was the one who had the means, the house at Enford belonged to her, and, when she left, she paid £500 into her husband's account, but finance seems to have been a difficulty and the husband had been asking for £5,000 with a view to setting up in business, and he suggested approaching the wife's father. The wife resented that very much, and it would appear that, as the immediate result of that difference of opinion, the husband telephoned to say that he was coming back.

One of the matters which has to be taken into consideration is what was the status quo which in cases such as this it is desirable to preserve, always bearing in mind that the interests of the children are, of course, the paramount consideration. I think that really the status quo, or, at any rate, the reasonable state of affairs, which should be preserved until the trial is the state of affairs which existed on Mar. 29. At that time (and it is a matter not to be overlooked) the petition had not been filed. I think the position would have been stronger from the wife's point of view if it had, but it had not. However, with these unfortunate differences existing and with this matrimonial suit looming in the background as a possibility, I should have thought that, other things being equal, the proper and convenient arrangement until the divorce suit was heard would have been that which existed on Mar. 29, namely, the wife in her own house with her children and with a nurse and the husband living somewhere else. It was the husband who disturbed that state of affairs by taking action which was calculated—and, I think, intended—to bring pressure on the wife. The action he took was to announce his return, which he knew would involve his wife's departure, then the interception of Suzy, and the final taking away of Henry. I think those were all acts done with a view to putting pressure on the wife either to give up the divorce proceedings or to return to the matrimonial home.

It is clear from the authorities that this court has jurisdiction in a suitable case to grant an injunction such as is asked for in the present proceedings where the property belongs to the wife. It is a discretionary remedy which will be exercised with care, and especially so where it involves the breaking up of the matrimonial home. Dealing with a matter of this kind in Shipman v. Shipman (1) ATKIN, L.J., said ([1924] 2 Ch. 140, 145, 146) :

The rights given to a wife [under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, s. 12] are much wider. She was intended to have all the rights and all the remedies that every owner of property was intended to have, including a right to exclusive possession, and the question is whether she has those rights in respect of the matrimonial home against her husband. That is a matter of public importance. It is the duty of husband and wife to live together, and if one or other wilfully absents himself, that is a matrimonial offence, and if a wife, without good cause, seeks to exclude her husband from the matrimonial home, she seeks to get the court to enable her to evade a duty. Therefore I should be reluctant to lay down a rule that a wife can treat her husband in the same way as a stranger.

That shows the care which must be taken where a remedy of this kind is being invoked. In Symonds v. Hallett (2) BOWEN, L.J., said (24 Ch.D. 346, 352, 353) :

I think the question we have to decide now resolves itself into this. Here is a husband seeking to enter a house settled to his wife's separate use, and his wife has instituted a suit at the hearing of which will be decided the question whether she has the right to say, "No, you shall not come here," and meanwhile, under the circumstances of the case and until that very important legal matter is decided, what is most convenient and most just to be done to preserve the status quo as far as possible without prejudicing the rights on either side? I think upon the whole that the most convenient, and most just, and most wise course is to let the wife enjoy what it is quite clear she has, the house, and to let the injunction stand which prevents the husband from coming there only until the hearing.

Therefore, it seems to me that this court clearly has jurisdiction, if it thinks right to exercise it in the particular circumstances, to grant an injunction to the wife.

Whether or not that injunction should be granted in this case is very closely connected with the question : To whom should be granted the interim custody of these children? It seems to me that the case really resolves itself into this : What in the circumstances is the best for the children, having regard to the fact that the wife is the owner of this house and prima facie entitled to occupy it and live there? It seems to me that what counsel for the wife said with regard to the little boy, Henry, is really unchallengeable, namely, that it would be wrong to deprive the wife of his custody. He clearly wants the care of a mother, and nothing whatever can be said against this wife as a mother—and nothing can be said against her as a wife unless it eventually turns out that her action in leaving on Dec. 16, 1947, was without reasonable cause. With regard to Suzy, the matter is not so clear. The learned judge saw her and I accept without question what he said as to the view he formed, that she, and her sister Bula too, passionately desired to have both their parents in the matrimonial home. Counsel for the husband has pressed us to see Suzy for ourselves. We did not think that that was desirable. I am quite prepared to accept what BARNARD, J., stated as the result of his interview. As regards a preference which she might express for one parent rather than the other, I think that is a matter as to which it would be very undesirable to question her. She has lately been with her father, and, in any event, it is our duty to decide in all the circumstances where it is best for her to be, irrespective of any preference she may have formed in a case where really nothing serious can be, or is, alleged against either of the parents in regard to their conduct as a father or as a mother. Therefore, I do not think it would really have been right for us to have interviewed Suzy. With regard to her, again, I think a child, especially a girl of 12½, requires the care and attention of a mother, although the case is not so strong as in the case of the little boy. As, however, I think that the little boy should go to the wife, so, I think, should Suzy. I think it is undesirable to break up this family. The proper place pending suit, for the wife to be with these two children is in the house that belongs to her, where she was on Mar. 30. For these reasons, I think that this appeal succeeds.

SOMERVELL, L.J. : I agree and I do not desire to add anything to what has been said by my Lord.

LANGFORD PROPERTY CO., LTD. v. GOLDRICH.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Birkett, J.), April 22, June 11, 1948.]

Rent Restriction—"Dwelling-house"—Two separated flats let together—Date for considering rateable value—Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933 (c. 32), s. 16—Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939 (c. 71), s. 7.

Estoppel—Landlords' assumption of applicability of Rent Acts—Denial four years later.

By an agreement, dated July 1, 1941, two flats, which up to that date had been let separately, were let, together with a garage, to one tenant on a quarterly tenancy commencing on Sept. 1, 1941. The flats were on the same floor, but were separated by other flats. In 1942, the landlords gave notice to the tenant to quit, but said that they would grant him a new tenancy at an increased rent. On Aug. 18, 1943, the landlords' agents wrote to the tenant enclosing a notice to quit on Dec. 1, 1943, and saying: "Your tenancy of this flat having been determined, we are writing to inform you as to the terms on which you are entitled to remain in occupation . . . under the provisions of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Acts." On Sept. 3, 1943, the landlords gave the tenant formal notice of an increase in the rent "in respect of the rates," and there was further correspondence regarding the position under the Rent Acts. On May 27, 1947, the landlords gave the tenant a further notice to quit expiring on Sept. 1, 1947, later pointing out that they had been under a misapprehension with regard to the applicability of the Rent Acts, which they now said did not apply owing to the rateable value of the premises. On Apr. 1, 1939, the rateable value of one flat was £98 and of the other £92. On Mar. 24, 1941, there was an amendment to the valuation list reducing the rateable value to £54 and £52 respectively, taking effect from Apr. 1, 1939. On June 19, 1942, there was a further amendment of the rateable values to £48 and £46 respectively, with effect from Apr. 1, 1941. At no time were the two flats assessed together as one dwelling-house.

HELD: (i) the flats did not constitute a separate dwelling-house within the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, s. 16, nor was each flat let as a separate dwelling, and, therefore, the Rent Acts did not apply.

Sheehan v. Cutler ([1946] K.B. 339) and Selwyn v. Hamill ([1948] 1 All E.R. 70), considered.

(ii) even if the premises were a "separate dwelling," having regard to the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, s. 7, the date for the consideration of their rateable value was Apr. 1, 1939, and on that day the rateable value exceeded £100.

(iii) the landlords were not estopped by their letters, in which they assumed the applicability of the Rent Acts, or by the notice of increase of rent which purported to have been given under those Acts, from pleading that the Acts did not apply.

ACTION by the landlords for possession of two flats which, by an agreement dated July 1, 1941, had together been demised to the tenant on a quarterly tenancy commencing on Sept. 1, 1941. The tenant, who counterclaimed for money paid in excess of the standard rent, contended that (1) the flats together comprised one dwelling-house within the meaning of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, s. 16; (2) although the flats had previously been let separately, they had not before been let together as one dwelling, and, therefore, for the purposes of assessing the rateable value, the "appropriate day" was July 1, 1941; (3) alternatively, the demise amounted to the separate letting of each of two dwellings; and (4) in any event, the landlords were estopped, by a series of letters and a notice of increase of rent in which they had assumed the applicability of the Rent Acts, from now denying that those Acts were applicable to the demised premises. BIRKETT, J., gave judgment for the landlords both on the claim and on the counterclaim.

Safford, K.C., and Heathcote-Williams (with him L. A. Blundell) for the landlords.

Scott Henderson, K.C., and I. H. Jacob for the tenant.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 11. BIRKETT, J., stated the facts and continued: I now turn to the defences which were raised. Paragraph 3 of the defence said:

The two flats and garage referred to in the amended statement of claim were first let together on July 1, 1941, under and by virtue of the said tenancy agreement, and thereby constituted a dwelling-house to which the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Acts, 1920 to 1939, at all material times applied and still apply.

By an amended defence the tenant denied that the rateable value of the premises exceeded the sum of £100 on the appropriate day as was alleged in the statement of claim. He further said:

Or in the alternative each of the two flats, viz., Nos. 13 and 15, West Heath Court, North End Road, Golders Green, comprised in the said tenancy agreement was at all material times and still is a dwelling-house within the meaning and for the purposes of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Acts, 1920 to 1939, and the defendant claims to be entitled to the protection of the said Acts in respect of his possession and occupation of the said flats.

The tenant also raised the defence that the landlords were estopped from alleging that the tenant was not entitled to the protection of the Rent Acts because the notice of the increase of rent by the landlords' agents showed that the landlords intended that the tenant should act on the basis that he was the tenant of the two flats subject to the provisions of the said Acts, and the tenant, induced thereby and not otherwise, did so act on the said date. Then the tenant went on to deny that the landlords were entitled to possession and it was not reasonable to give possession. He was still in possession and claimed he was entitled to be so. The counterclaim having repeated that defence, the tenant thereupon claims that he is entitled to recover the money overpaid beyond the standard rent, on the footing that he is entitled to the benefit of the Rent Acts. The counterclaim itself was for £400, but I was told that, if it succeeded, it should be, on a proper calculation, for £337 10s. 0d.

The Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, s. 3, provides:

(1) Without prejudice to the operation of the two preceding sections in relation to any dwelling-house to which the principal Acts applied immediately before the commencement of this Act, the principal Acts, as amended by the last preceding section, shall, subject to the provisions of this section, apply to every other dwelling-house of which the rateable value on the appropriate day did not exceed (a) in the metropolitan police district or the city of London, £100.

In s. 7 (1), under "Interpretation," these words occur:

... "rateable value on the appropriate day," in relation to any dwelling-house, means (subject to the following provisions of this section) the value shown, with respect to that dwelling-house, on that day in the valuation list then in force, as the rateable value or, where the net annual value differs from the rateable value, as the net annual value.

That section makes it clear that when you are considering the rateable value on the appropriate day you have to look at the value shown in respect of the particular dwelling-house on that day in the valuation list then in force, and, further, s. 7 (1) provides: "'the appropriate day' means, as respects the administrative county of London, Apr. 6, 1939, or, as respects the remainder of England, Apr. 1, 1939." Looking at the rateable value on the appropriate day, Apr. 1, 1939, that rateable value would appear, on the figures I have cited, to be in excess of £100. The Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, s. 16, provides :

"Dwelling-house" has the same meaning as in the principal Acts, that is to say, a house let as a separate dwelling or a part of a house being a part so let.

Counsel for the landlords contended that the premises (i.e., the two flats) which were the subject of the agreement of July 1, 1941, could not possibly come within that definition, and were not a dwelling-house within the meaning of the statute. Counsel for the tenant, on the contrary, said : "I put it in two ways. First of all, the tenant was in occupation of two dwelling-houses, to which these Acts applied, namely, No. 13 and No. 15, and he was entitled to the protection of the Rent Acts because of that fact. Alternatively, if that is not acceptable, the tenant was in occupation of one dwelling-house, that is, two flats regarded as one, and July 1, 1941, is the date which you must look at to ascertain the status of that house," and he referred me to s. 7 (1) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1938, which provides :

If any question arises in any proceedings whether the principal Acts apply to a dwelling-house, it shall be deemed to be a dwelling-house to which those Acts apply unless the contrary is shown.

The conclusion to which I have come is that these premises were not a dwelling-house within the meaning of the Rent Acts, and on that matter there are two cases which I think are rather helpful, although they are not exactly on the point in question. The first is Sheehan v. Cutler (1) which dealt with suitable alternative accommodation under the Act. The headnote reads ([1946] K.B. 339) :

"Suitable alternative accommodation available for the tenant" within the meaning of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, sub-s. 3 (sic.) contemplates accommodation in a single dwelling-house and is not satisfied by the offer of a house with the additional accommodation of one room in a separate house. MORTON, L.J., who dealt rather fully with the matter, said (ibid., 342) :

What this court has to determine is whether accommodation in two separate houses, for which provision is made in the judge's order, is "suitable alternative accommodation" within the meaning of s. 3 (1) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, and that, in turn, depends on whether the proposed accommodation falls within the terms of s. 3 (3). That sub-section applies to the present case, and provides, by sub-cl. (a), that "accommodation shall be deemed to be suitable" if it consists of "a dwelling-house to which the principal Acts apply." It may be pointed out that under the Interpretation Act, 1889, the words "a dwelling-house" would include the plural unless a contrary intention appears. In my opinion, for reasons which I shall mention later, a contrary intention does appear in the present instance. The sub-section goes on to provide by sub-cl. (b) as an alternative, that accommodation shall also be deemed to be suitable if it consists of "premises to be let as a separate dwelling" on terms which will afford to the tenant security of tenure reasonably equivalent to the security afforded by the principal Acts in the case of "a dwelling-house to which these Acts apply." The repeated use of the singular is to be noted. So far, two alternatives have been stated, but there follows a further qualification which the accommodation offered must possess if it is to be deemed to be suitable. It must be "reasonably suitable to the needs of the tenant and his family as regards proximity to place of work." It seems to me that in this sub-section the legislature is regarding the tenant and his family as one unit and is providing that that unit is to be accommodated in one dwelling-house under sub-cl. (a) or in premises to be let as one separate dwelling on terms which answer the description given in sub-cl. (b). The provisions which follow, and in particular the provisions of sub-cl. (ii) in reference to "the needs of the tenant and his family" in regard to the extent and character of the accommodation, point in the same direction. We were referred to the definition of "dwelling-house" in s. 16 of the Act where it is said that "dwelling-house has the same meaning as in the principal Acts, that is to say, a house let as a separate dwelling or a part of a house being a part so let." That perhaps, does not carry the matter much further.

The learned LORD JUSTICE goes on to deal further with those matters and comes to the conclusion, with which the other members of the court agree, that the question of suitable alternative accommodation is not satisfied by the offer of a house with the additional offer of a single room in another house but contemplates similar accommodation to that which he originally had.

In Selwyn v. Hamill (2) the headnote reads ([1948] 1 All E.R. 70):

A landlord, who had become landlord by purchase in 1945, claimed possession of a controlled dwelling-house, offering the tenant alternative accommodation consisting of a living-room, kitchen and bathroom in one dwelling-house and a bedroom in a separate dwelling-house, the two premises, although under the same roof, being divided by a third dwelling-house. HELD: (i) the accommodation offered did not consist "of premises to be let as a separate dwelling" as required by the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, s. 3 (3) (b), and was not, therefore, "suitable" within the meaning of the section. Sheehan v. Cutler (1) applied.

TUCKER, L.J., in the course of that case—Selwyn v. Hamill (2)—said (ibid., 71):

It is said by counsel for the landlord that, this point not having been taken in the court below and the judge's attention not having been drawn to Sheehan v. Cutler (1), we ought to send the case back for a new trial to give the judge an opportunity of considering whether No. 4A alone might not constitute reasonably suitable accommodation. As it appears clear from the judge's note that this point, which is a pure point of law, was never taken in the court below, if there were any possibility that, on a further investigation of the facts, the judge might come to the conclusion that No. 4A was reasonably suitable accommodation, I should certainly have been disposed to send the case back for a new trial because it is most unsatisfactory that cases should be dealt with without the tribunal to which jurisdiction is given under these Acts having had an opportunity of investigating the facts fully and properly. On the facts of this case, however, I am driven to the conclusion that it would be impossible as a matter of law for the judge to find that No. 4A by itself was reasonably suitable accommodation for this family which consists of an elderly invalid lady and two grown-up daughters who are working. The living-room which would have to be used as a bed-sitting room and kitchen could not possibly be said to be accommodation which was reasonably suitable for these ladies. I, therefore, think that it would not be right to order a new trial and we are bound to allow this appeal.

That was a case where the alternative accommodation consisted of premises, which although under the same roof were separate, 4A and 2A being separated by 3A, and it was held that that could not be regarded as a separate dwelling-house. The matter, therefore, on this first point, in my opinion, must be decided in favour of the landlords. The letting in the agreement of July 1, 1941, is not of a dwelling-house within the meaning of the Act.

With regard to the second point which was raised by the landlords' counsel, namely, if these two flats can be regarded as a dwelling-house within the meaning of the Act of Parliament, then, on the appropriate day, Apr. 1, 1939, the rateable value was clearly over £100. There, again, the landlords would be entitled to succeed. Counsel for the tenant said: "I am not disposed to agree that that is the date which has to be taken into account. The rateable value is to be ascertained with regard to July 1, 1941. If one tenant is in No. 13 and another in No. 15 these Acts apply. They are two separate dwellings. The fact that there is one demise makes no difference, the fact that there is one rent for both makes no difference." He referred me to the provision in the Act of 1920, s. 12 (6), that the Act once effective is always effective. That was countered by counsel for the landlords, who referred me to Haldane v. Sinclair (3), and argued that, as the two flats had been let as one demise, the landlords were entitled to rely on that case. Counsel for the tenant further said: "If this is a separate dwelling-house, as I contend it is, it became so for the first time on July 1, 1941, and you must look at s. 7 (2) and (3) of the Act of 1939." There was, he said, no separate assessment of the two flats as a separate dwelling at any time. Of course, that is quite right. The only assessment before me was the assessment on the valuation list of the two flats singly and individually, and "the appropriate day" he, therefore, submitted, could not be before July, 1941, because before then it was not a separate dwelling. There never having been any new assessment, the onus was on the landlords to show that the rateable value was over £100, and he said it was impossible for them to do that because there never was a separate rateable value for those two flats treated as one. The view I take of the facts of this case, having regard to the provisions of s. 7 of the Act of 1939, is that I must look at the rateable value as shown in the valuation list as on Apr. 1, 1939, and if it is conceded that that is the appropriate day, then the rateable value is over £100. I am of the opinion that that is the date to which I ought to look.

The only other point, therefore, with which I ought to deal, is the point raised by counsel for the tenant with regard to estoppel. He cited Griffiths v. Davies (4), which was a case in the Court of Appeal the headnote of which is ([1943] K.B. 618):

In an action by the landlord of a dwelling-house to which the Rent Restrictions Acts applied, in which he claimed possession for non-payment of rent, the tenant did not take the point that the rent was in excess of the standard rent plus the permitted increases and judgment was given for possession, but suspended so long as the current rent and 2s. 6d. a month off the arrears was paid. The tenant paid the current rent and instalments of the arrears, but later he applied to the county court under s. 11 (1) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, to determine the standard rent and the current lawful rent:—HELD, that the tenant was not estopped from pursuing his application by the judgment in the possession action, since the doctrine of estoppel by judgment did not apply where the result would be to compel the court to give a judgment which it was by statute prohibited from giving, namely, in the present case, to determine the standard rent otherwise than in accordance with the provisions of the Rent Restrictions Acts.

LORD GREENE, M.R., in dealing with the point, said (ibid., 619):

It is said that, having regard to the language of the Rent Restrictions Acts, the judgment in the proceedings in 1933, which might, in cases not governed by those Acts, have precluded the tenant from alleging now that the rent was other than £26, do not prevent her from doing so. It is argued that the principles of estoppel or of res judicata do not apply where to give effect to them would be to go counter to some statutory direction or prohibition, and that s. 1 of the Act of 1920 is a statutory direction to the court to abstain from giving a judgment for recovery of rent which is shown to the court to be excessive. It appears to me beyond all question that, if, in proceedings where the point is not taken, judgment for an amount of conventional rent which is excessive is given against a tenant, and, later, an action is brought against the tenant for the conventional rent at the same rate, in which later proceedings it is shown that that rent is excessive, the earlier judgment cannot give to the court a jurisdiction which s. 1 of the Act of 1920 has denied to it. In other words, if two actions are brought in respect of two different rent periods, and in the first action judgment is given for the conventional rent and in the second it is shown that the conventional rent is too high, the court is bound in the second action to give effect to the provisions of s. 1 and to refuse to give judgment for the recovery of the excess rent. Otherwise the court would be doing something which the statute says it is not to do . . . I do not think I need refer at length to authority for the proposition that a statutory prohibition or direction cannot be overridden or defeated by a previous judgment between the parties. If authority for that proposition were required, it is to be found in LORD SHAW's speech in the House of Lords in Bradshaw v. McMullan (5), a statement of the law which is again referred to in the judgment of the Privy Council in Maritime Electric Co., Ltd. v. General Dairies, Ltd. (6). It is a principle which manifestly is right, quite apart from authority.

MACKINNON, L.J., and DU PARCQ, L.J., both agreed. I think, in view of the reasoning in that case, it is not possible for me to accept the point taken here by counsel for the tenant. It is true at one time that the agents for the landlords were under the impression that the premises did come within the scope of the Rent Acts. That matter was put right by them in the correspondence, and I cannot think that this action fails because the landlords are estopped by those facts from proceeding in the manner they have done.

In these circumstances, I must give judgment for the landlords. I hold that this letting of the separated flats with the garage was not the letting of a dwelling-house as a separate dwelling to which the Act of Parliament applies. I further hold that, if the dwelling is to be regarded as a separate entity at the appropriate day, Apr. 1, 1939, the rateable value exceeded the sum of £100. I am further of opinion that the point of estoppel fails. There must be judgment for the landlords on the claim and counterclaim.

Judgment for the landlords with costs.

Re ST. LUKE'S HOSPITAL, CHELSEA. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL v. WAR DAMAGE COMMISSIONERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Vaisey, J.), July 5, 9, 1948.]

War Damage—Temporary works payment—“Works reasonably executed for temporarily meeting the circumstances created by the damage”—Provision of alternative accommodation away from site of damage—Permanent structures—War Damage Act, 1943 (c. 21), s. 6 (2).

In 1941 the S. hospital suffered severe damage by bombing. In 1942 the hospital authorities effected certain works which involved the construction on the site of a former store room, in place of a kitchen and scullery which had been rendered unusable, of a new main kitchen and scullery in the course of which construction it was necessary to take up a timber floor, fill in the cavity with rubble and lay down a thick concrete floor, and the dividing of a former ward on the ground floor into several parts which were converted into a new operating theatre, with a surgeon's dressing room, sterilising room, anaesthetising room, X-ray room, dark room and office, to replace those on the first floor which had virtually been destroyed. Wiring for electricity, the tapping of the electric main in the street, and the laying of heavy cables to the X-ray room had also been effected.

HELD: the works were neither works of temporary repair nor of temporary precaution, but were carried out to provide alternative accommodation at a distance from the area of the damage, and were not “works reasonably executed for temporarily meeting the circumstances created by the damage” within the War Damage Act, 1943, s. 6 (2).

Per VAISEY, J.: The statement of the case by the War Damage Commission seems to place some emphasis on the physical life of the works in question. It is alleged that some of them would last for twenty-five years and others for forty to fifty years. I do not think that that is the test. I do not think that the works have to be “temporary” in the sense that they are likely to decay at an early date. I think that the reference to “temporary works” in ss. 16 and 20 of the Act is somewhat misleading. The works in themselves may be as permanent as possible. The point is: Were they executed for temporarily meeting the circumstances created by the damage?

ORIGINATING NOTICE OF MOTION.

Appeal by the London County Council, owners of St. Luke's Hospital, Chelsea, from a determination of the War Damage Commission that certain works completed by the council were not “works reasonably executed for temporarily meeting the circumstances created by [war] damage.” The respondents, the War Damage Commission, contended that the repairs were adaptations, for the convenience of the council, of the undamaged, or comparatively undamaged, portions of the hospital. VAISEY, J., dismissed the appeal. The facts appear in the judgment.

R. M. Hughes, K.C., and Squibb for the appellants, the London County Council, the owners of St. Luke's Hospital.

Rowe, K.C., and Danckwerts for the respondents, the War Damage Commission.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 9. VAISEY, J., read the following judgment. This is an appeal from a determination by the respondents, the War Damage Commission, of a question as to the making of a temporary works payment in respect of St. Luke's Hospital, Chelsea. The appellants, the London County Council, are the owners of the said property. They say that certain works, which I must presently describe, were (to quote the words of the War Damage Act, 1943, s 6 (2)) “works reasonably executed for temporarily meeting the circumstances created by the damage,” which means, in the context in which it appears, war damage to a hereditament.

The facts of the case are as follows. On May 11, 1941, the hospital was severely damaged by enemy action owing to the effect of a high-explosive bomb which fell in the centre of the building. Parts of the hospital were so seriously damaged as to be totally unusable unless completely rebuilt and re-equipped, including : in the basement of the building, the main kitchen, the scullery and servery, the butcher's shop, the cold stores, and various ancillary offices, including, in particular, the heating-boiler room ; on the ground floor, two receiving wards, with the assistant medical officer's quarters and other ancillary accommodation, and on the first floor the operating theatre, with the sterilising rooms, X-ray room, bath rooms, and the main corridor. The parts of the building which were either not damaged, or damaged to only a slight extent, included twelve wards and other accommodation. After the explosion, the condition of the hospital, as I understand it, was comparable with that of an ocean going liner, of which the decks, the cabins and the state rooms were intact, but which had lost the whole of its engines and operating machinery.

Obviously this was not a case of total loss, as defined in s. 7 (2) of the Act, and in due time a payment on the basis of cost of works would fall to be made under the provisions of the Act in so far as the damage had been or would be made good. The hospital was completely put out of action and had to be evacuated, but the need for hospitals in 1941 and the succeeding years was such that it was obviously desirable once more to put it into use, and that at the earliest possible moment. There were carried out, with the necessary permits and licences, works which were finally completed in August, 1942, some fifteen months after the occurrence of the calamity. Those works included, first, certain works of permanent reinstatement, as to which no question arises ; secondly, certain temporary works, as to which again no question arises ; and, thirdly, the works which have given rise to the present appeal, with which I must now deal.

Those works consisted of the following items : first, in a space in the basement of the building which had formerly been used as a store room, a new main kitchen and scullery were constructed to take the place of the former kitchen and scullery which had been either completely destroyed, or, at any rate, put completely out of action, by the explosion. This operation involved the removal of certain partitions, the taking up of a timber floor, the filling of the cavity with brick rubble, and the laying down of a thick concrete floor, with such incidental matters as the installing of sinks, and of gas, electric and general engineering services. Secondly, in what had previously been known as ward No. 8, which was on the ground floor of the building, a new operating theatre was constructed, with surgeon's dressing room, sterilising room, anaesthetising room, X-ray room, dark room and office, which, as I have said, had previously been on the first floor. That work involved the division of ward 8 by the erection of a number of partitions, constructed of timber covered with wallboard, thus forming separate rooms. Those partitions and the doors thereof had to be painted. The electric light had to be brought into what had previously been ward 8. The electric main in the street had to be tapped for intake, and heavy electric cables had to be laid to the X-ray room.

Now, it is said by the county council that these works, to which I have just been referring, were, within the meaning of the Act, " works reasonably executed for temporarily meeting the circumstances created by the damage " to the hospital. The War Damage Commission, on the other hand, say that these works, having been effected for the purpose of providing alternative accommodation elsewhere than on or in the damaged portions of the hospital, were not " works reasonably executed for temporarily meeting the circumstances created by the damage," but were adaptations, for the convenience of the council, of the undamaged portions, or portions comparatively undamaged, of the hospital.

I now turn to the Act. Section 1 provides for payments being made in respect of war damage to land and to goods. Section 2 defines " war damage." Nothing arises on those definitions. Section 5 may be sufficiently stated by reference to its marginal note which says : " Hereditaments that are to be units for payments in respect of damage to land." There is, I think, no question but that the hospital is a hereditament within the meaning of that section, and, further, that it is what the section defines as a " developed hereditament." I now come to s. 6, which prescribes the nature of the payment which falls to be made in respect of damage to land. It divides those payments into two heads, that is to say :

(a) a payment of cost of works, being a payment of an amount determined by reference to the cost of works executed for making good the damage . . . ; or (b) a value payment . . .

This is what is called by the convenient short description of a cost of works case. Sub-section (2) of s. 6 is the one which is directly relevant to the question now before me, and it reads thus :

Where either a payment of cost of works or a value payment is made in respect of war damage to a hereditament, there shall be made, in addition to that payment, a payment (in this Act referred to as a "temporary works payment") of an amount equal to the proper cost of any works reasonably executed for temporarily meeting the circumstances created by the damage, being—(a) where a payment of cost of works is made, works, other than those taken into account in computing the amount of that payment, executed between the occurrence of the damage and the time when it is made good ; (b) where a value payment is made, works executed between the occurrence of the damage and the time when the Commission's determination to make that payment, and not a payment of cost of works, has been notified to all persons having an interest in the hereditament who have made a request in writing to the Commission to be notified thereof, or, if no such request has been made, the time of the Commission's determination.

Section 8 of the Act defines the amount of the payment of cost of works, and sub-s. (2) is :

If the war damage is made good by reinstating the hereditament in the form in which it existed immediately before the occurrence of the damage, the amount of the payment shall be an amount equal to the proper cost of the works executed for the making good thereof.

There are two references, or apparent references, to this matter in later sections of the Act. First of all, s. 16 (1) (a) relates to such temporary works as are mentioned in s. 6 (2). I pause here to observe that I do not find in s. 6 (2) any mention of temporary works at all. In s. 20 of the Act there is another reference to temporary works as to which the same observation applies.

The War Damage Commission have issued some explanatory pamphlets as to their practice, which, of course, possess no statutory or other force, but which are extremely useful publications and are in the nature of commentaries on the words of the Act. In the first of those pamphlets, which is entitled "Practice Notes—First Series" and has the Stationery Office code number 70,392, there is given, no doubt by way of guidance, the reference to the corresponding section of the earlier Act, and what is suggested is : "In all cases the works must be 'reasonably' executed for temporarily meeting the circumstances created by the damage'." It is further pointed out : "The Commission has to decide whether the works are both 'reasonably executed' and 'for temporarily meeting the circumstances'." Then it is said that in normal cases the War Damage Commission will be prepared to act in accordance with certain principles which are there enumerated :

(a) The works must be executed only to or on the damaged hereditament itself.
(b) In the case of a developed hereditament the works should normally be for the purpose either of temporarily making the damaged building (or buildings) usable for the purpose for which it was used before the damage or for preserving the building (or buildings) from further depreciation or to prevent injury to the public or to other buildings arising from the damaged hereditament.

It is suggested that the fencing of a hole would be allowed. It is emphasised that the works must be of a temporary character, and the reader is reminded that it is not reasonable to use expensive materials where less expensive materials will serve the temporary purpose and are available. There is a final reminder—which is very helpful, perhaps—that the rules to apply are largely common-sense, and the problem to be solved is : "On consideration of all the facts, ought temporary repairs to be executed or permanent repairs ? Are the works, in their nature, both 'temporary' and 'reasonable' ?"

A second edition of the Practice Notes was issued three years later than the first edition. The Stationery Office code number is 70,392,045. There—no doubt with the added experience of the years which had passed—a revised edition of hints is given as to how the words should be construed and how they should be applied in practice. We now find that there is a suggestion that the works must, normally, at any rate, be executed only to the damaged part of the hereditament, and that they should normally be for the purpose either of temporarily making the damaged building (or buildings) usable, and so on, or—following the words of the earlier edition. A somewhat notable point, perhaps, is that there is in the later edition of the pamphlet no reference to common-sense. Admittedly, the words in question are very general indeed, and quite incapable of any definition that is more precise than the words themselves afford. They must obviously be construed in their context and having regard to the scheme and purpose of the whole Act. The form in which they are enacted is rather puzzling. The word “reasonably” is, I think, always rather an alarming word. What standard of reason must be applied? Whose reason has to be interrogated? It is somewhat strange that by re-arranging these words—as, for instance, substituting for “works executed for making good the damage” “works reasonably executed for temporarily meeting the circumstances created by the damage”—much the same result would appear to have been intended. Clearly, reason must be brought into the picture, and so far I do not think that there is any very serious difficulty. The Commission have to apply their standards of reason to the facts of the case, and I have to apply mine to the meaning of the Act.

Next, the works must be intended to meet the circumstances created by the damage. Quite obviously that might include a very large number of arrangements and re-arrangements necessitated by the damage in question. Then such circumstances must be met temporarily, that is to say, they must be met in a make-shift manner, and not in a manner which is going to afford permanent, continuous relief. It is obvious that persons dealing with institutions finding themselves in trouble over war damage have to resort to many shifts and devices to meet the circumstances created thereby, and normally, I should have supposed, the works in question would tend to be works of temporary repair or works of temporary precaution. By “works of temporary repair” I mean works which were intended to be temporary in the sense that they were meant to be superseded by works intended to be permanent, and I may instance such things as the insertion of fabric material in windows to be glazed later on, or the patching up of shrapnel holes in a roof which would ultimately be properly re-slatted. Among works of precaution I would include the shoring up of a dangerous wall, the fencing of a bomb crater (later to be filled in), or the provision of an outside staircase to take the place of an interior one which had become insecure. I ought not, I think, to endeavour to expound the relevant words further than I have already attempted to do.

It is very easy indeed to imagine border-line cases in which it may be very difficult to say whether they are covered by these words or not, but in the present case I feel compelled—though not without hesitation—to hold that the works in question were neither works of temporary repair nor works of temporary precaution. I think that they were works carried out to provide alternative accommodation at a distance from the area of the damage, and I can see no distinction in principle between the present case, where the works in question were done within the walls of the hospital, and a case where they might have been done in some near-by building acquired for the purpose. The Act does not deal with damage to a man's pocket or to his convenience, but only with damage to his tangible property—in this case damage to his buildings. I do not think that these works which have been carried out were temporary in the sense that they were intended to be superseded by permanent works, nor do I think that they can be regarded as works of temporary precaution.

I think that the case is near the line, but I have come to the conclusion that it is on the wrong side of the line from the point of view of the council. I think that the letter from the Commission dated Jan. 27, 1943, sets out—though, perhaps, in rather too narrow a form—the conclusions at which I have arrived in the present case. That letter says that the Commission consider:

... that temporary works are only those executed to or on the damaged building itself and carried out for the purpose either of temporarily making it usable for the purpose for which it was used before the damage, or for preserving it from further depreciation, or to prevent injury to the public or to other buildings. On this basis I am to explain that, although the information given in your typical cases is not necessarily complete, it is not considered likely that a temporary works payment could be made in any of the cases.

The statement of the case by the War Damage Commission seems to place some emphasis on the physical life of the works in question. It is alleged that some of them would last for twenty-five years and others for forty to fifty years. I do not think that that is the test. I do not think that the works have to be "temporary" in the sense that they are likely to decay at an early date. I think that the reference to "temporary works" in ss. 16 and 20 of the Act is somewhat misleading. The works in themselves may be as permanent as possible. The point is: Were they executed for temporarily meeting the circumstances created by the damage? In my judgment, these works represent arrangements made for temporarily meeting the circumstances created by the damage, but not works executed for that purpose. Although I have found the matter very puzzling, I have in this case come to the conclusion which I have already indicated. I think that the appeal fails and must be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

MARTINS BANK, LTD. v. KAVANAGH.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Roxburgh, J.), June 29, July 6, 14, 1948.]

Mortgage—Possession by mortgagee—Originating summons—Parties—Trustee in bankruptcy—R.S.C., Ord. 55, rr. 5A, 5B.

In 1944, the defendant charged her farm by way of legal mortgage with payment of certain moneys to the plaintiffs. In 1947 she was adjudicated bankrupt, but remained in occupation of the farm. The plaintiffs issued an originating summons claiming possession of the farm, and elected before the master not to add as a defendant the trustee in bankruptcy in whom the equity of redemption was vested.

HELD: the application was properly made by originating summons under R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 5A, but, as it involved a step in the enforcement of the security which might prejudice the person entitled to the equity of redemption, the trustee in bankruptcy should have been joined under Ord. 55, r. 5B, and, therefore, the summons was defective.

PROCEDURE SUMMONS.

By an originating summons a mortgagee, Martins Bank, Ltd., sought possession of the farm on which the mortgage was secured from the mortgagor who had been adjudicated bankrupt. The bank did not join the trustee in bankruptcy, and it was objected that the procedure was inappropriate and that the originating summons was defective. The facts appear in the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 14. ROXBURGH, J., read the following judgment. By a mortgage dated Feb. 29, 1944, the defendant charged, by way of legal mortgage, Cross Keld Farm, Fylingdales, Yorkshire, with payment of certain moneys to the plaintiff bank. On Dec. 5, 1947, the defendant was adjudicated bankrupt, but she remained in occupation of the farm. By this originating summons, the plaintiff bank claims delivery of possession of the farm by the defendant, having elected before the master not to add as a defendant to the application the trustee in bankruptcy in whom the equity of redemption is vested.

Two points were taken on behalf of the defendant. The first is that such an application as this cannot be made on an originating summons. The second is that it ought not to proceed in the absence of the trustee in bankruptcy. Order 55, r. 5A, is in the following terms :

Any mortgagee or mortgagor, whether legal or equitable or any person entitled to or having property subject to a legal or equitable charge, or any person having the right to foreclose or redeem any mortgage, whether legal or equitable, may take out as of course an originating summons, returnable in the chambers of a judge of the Chancery Division, for such relief of the nature or kind following as may by the summons be specified, and as the circumstances of the case may require ; that is to say,—Payment of monies secured by the mortgage or charge ; Sale ; Foreclosure ; Delivery of possession (whether before or after foreclosure) to the mortgagee or person entitled to the charge by the mortgagor or person having the property subject to the charge or by any other person in, or alleged to be in possession of the property ; Redemption ; Reconveyance ; Delivery of possession by the mortgagee.

There is no appearance of ambiguity in the words " delivery of possession . . . by the mortgagor . . . or by any other person in, or alleged to be in possession of the property." They appear to warrant just such an application as this, but counsel for the defendant would have me imply the further words " being a person entitled to redeem," and he surveyed the evolution of the present rules with a view to persuading me that those words must necessarily be implied. Counsel for the plaintiffs, on the other hand, drew my attention to the decision of a full Court of Appeal in Temperance Permanent Benefit Building Society v. Nevitt (1) and argued that the words which I have quoted with regard to delivery of possession to the mortgagee (which were introduced into the rule in the same month as that case was heard) were introduced to take just such a case as the present outside the scope of Ord. 13, r. 8 (which deals with judgment for the recovery of land in default of appearance in cases to which r. 17 does not apply), and bring it within the ambit of Ord. 13, r. 17 (which deals with judgment in default of appearance in cases to which Ord. 55, r. 5A, applies). This, he says, was done for the greater protection of mortgagors, though it confers an incidental advantage on mortgagees. I am satisfied that counsel for the plaintiffs is right and that the present application is within the rule, and, indeed, that it was intended to be brought within it.

On the other hand, Ord. 55, r. 5B, provides :

The persons to be served with the summons under the last preceding rule shall be such persons as under the existing practice of the Chancery Division would be the proper defendants to an action for the like relief as that specified by the summons.

The Court of Appeal, in the case to which I have already referred, held that there the mortgagor was a necessary party. The form of order prescribed by Ord. 55, r. 8A, contemplates that the mortgagor will be a party, but, furthermore, the application involves a step in the enforcement of the security which may prejudice the person entitled to the equity of redemption. I am satisfied, therefore, that he ought to be a defendant under the existing practice of the Chancery Division. This is so whether " existing " refers (as I think it does) to the practice at the date of the application or to the practice at the date when applications like the present were first allowed to be made by originating summons, namely, June, 1940. I cannot accept the contention of counsel for the plaintiffs that the word " existing " could refer to a time earlier than that date.

Accordingly, in my judgment, the originating summons is defective for want of a party, and I refer the originating summons back to chambers for amendment and for further evidence on the question of costs.

Order accordingly.

IRELAND v. TAYLOR.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Tucker, Somervell and Cohen, L.JJ.), June 14, 16, 17, 18, July 13, 1948.]

Landlord and Tenant—Goodwill—Letting of premises at higher rent—Compensation—New lease—Premises used for purpose prohibited by head lease—Premises “required” for occupation by landlord—Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927 (c. 36), ss. 4 (1), 5 (1) (2) and (3) (b) (i).

On July 21, 1941, premises were sub-let by A. to the tenant for 3 years, with an option to renew (which was exercised) for a further 3 years, the tenant covenanting to use the premises as a private nursing home and/or guest house only. In fact, the premises were used by the tenant for the business of a home or guest house for old and infirm ladies from the neighbourhood and the home was recommended by local doctors. On Aug. 7, 1945, A. assigned her lease to Mr. and Mrs. T., who intended to reside on the premises when the tenant's lease ran out. On June 14, 1946, the tenant served a notice on Mr. and Mrs. T. claiming compensation for goodwill under s. 4 of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, or, alternatively, a new lease under s. 5. In answer to a summons in respect of this claim Mr. and Mrs. T. alleged, inter alia, under s. 5 (3) (b) (i) of the Act, that they required the premises for their own occupation, Mr. T., then 70 years old and once a portrait painter, requiring the house for the purpose of using the large lounge as a studio for portrait painting, a profession which he intended resuming. Notice of the tenant's application was given by Mr. and Mrs. T. to the freeholders, who drew the attention of Mr. and Mrs. T. to the fact that the tenant had committed a breach of a covenant in the head lease not to use the premises for any purpose other than as a private dwelling house and demanded immediate steps be taken to see that the breach was remedied. No steps were, in fact, taken, and the tenant continued to carry on her business. The referee in his report found that goodwill within the meaning of s. 4 of the Act had been established and assessed a figure, but, as regards the application for a new lease, he construed the word “required” in s. 5 (3) (b) (i) as “needs” or “reasonably requires” and came to the conclusion that Mr. and Mrs. T. did not reasonably require or need the house. The county court judge agreed on the question of adherent goodwill, rejected the referee's construction of “requires,” but construed it as not including a mere whim or fancy and found that in that sense Mr. and Mrs. T. did not require the premises, and, there being nothing in the evidence otherwise to render the grant unreasonable, granted the tenant a new lease. On Appeal:

HELD: (i) on the question of adherent goodwill, the only part of the tenant's goodwill which could be the subject of compensation was the net rental value of what adhered to the premises in the sense of enuring to the benefit of the landlord in the form of increased rental value after the premises had returned into his possession, and, as the referee and the judge had correctly appreciated this, the court would not interfere on that question.

Whiteman Smith Motor Co., Ltd. v. Chaplin ([1934] 2 K.B. 35) and Clift v. Taylor ([1948] 2 All E.R. 113), followed.

(ii) the words in s. 4 (1) “the premises could be let” included letting by all such persons as might be in a position to let at the determination of the tenancy and were apt to cover the case where the letting which was contemplated might require the consent of some person other than the mesne landlord, the only question to be considered being, not whether the landlord could let the premises, but whether the premises could be let.

Per SOMERVELL, L.J.: I should myself hesitate to come to the conclusion that a landlord, apart from any question of estoppel, should have to pay compensation in respect of an increased rental value which he was going to be prevented from realising owing to the existence in a head lease of an enforceable covenant preventing further user of the premises for the trade or business in question. The compensation, as was stated in Whiteman Smith Motor Co., Ltd. v. Chaplin (supra), is limited to the addition to the value of the premises in the hands of the landlord at the end of the tenancy. In the case put the addition would appear to be nil.

(iii) both the referee and the judge had come to an erroneous decision with regard to s. 5 (3) (b) (i); under that paragraph the landlord must be the sole arbiter of his requirements provided he proves that he, in fact, desires possession of the premises and genuinely intends to occupy them; and, therefore, the judge's order should be varied by substituting for the new lease an award of the compensation fixed by the referee.

APPEAL by the landlords from an order of His Honour JUDGE HANCOCK, made at Wandsworth County Court and dated Dec. 11, 1947, granting to the tenant a new lease under the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, s. 5. The appeal was allowed, and the judge's order varied by substituting for the new lease an award of compensation fixed by the referee. The facts appear in the judgment of TUCKER, L.J.

Havers, K.C., and Hawser for the landlords.
Avgherinos for the tenant.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 13. The following judgments were read.

TUCKER, L.J. : This is an appeal by the landlords from the decision of the county court judge granting a new lease to the tenant under s. 5 of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927. In 1883 a lease of the premises in question was granted for 97 years containing a covenant against any user of the premises for any trade or business or for any other purpose than as a private dwelling-house. On July 21, 1941, the then lessee under the head lease, a Mrs. Abney, granted a sub-lease to the tenant for a term of three years with an option, which was exercised, to renew for three years. The lease contained the following covenant by the tenant :

To use the premises as a private nursing home and/or guest house only but with no outside indication of such usage without the consent of the superior landlord.

The premises were, in fact, used by the tenant for the business of a home or guest house for old and infirm ladies. Most of the old ladies came from the neighbourhood, and the home was recommended by local doctors. The house is in Kew Road facing Kew Gardens, and is known as "Heathlands." On Aug. 7, 1945, Mrs. Abney assigned the head lease to the landlords, and there was evidence that the landlords bought the lease in order to be able to live in the house when the tenant's lease expired. On June 14, 1946, the tenant served a notice on the landlords under the Act of 1927 claiming compensation under s. 4 of the Act, and, alternatively, a new lease under s. 5.

Section 4, so far as material, reads as follows :

(1) The tenant of a holding to which this part of this Act applies shall, if a claim for the purpose is made in the prescribed manner—(i) in the case of a tenancy terminated by notice, within one month after the service of the notice on the tenant; and (ii) in any other case, not more than thirty-six nor less than twelve months before the termination of the tenancy; be entitled, at the termination of the tenancy on quitting the holding, to be paid by his landlord compensation for goodwill if he proves to the satisfaction of the tribunal that by reason of the carrying on by him or his predecessors in title at the premises of a trade or business for a period of not less than five years goodwill has become attached to the premises by reason whereof the premises could be let at a higher rent than they would have realised had no such goodwill attached thereto. Provided that . . . (d) the tribunal shall, in determining the amount of compensation for goodwill—(i) have regard to the intentions of the tenant as to carrying on the trade or business elsewhere, and may make it a condition of its award that the tenant shall undertake not to carry on the trade or business within such distance of the premises as may be specified in the award; and (ii) disregard any value which is attributable exclusively to the situation of the premises . . .

Section 5 provides :

(1) Where the tenant alleges that, though he would be entitled to compensation under the last foregoing section, the sum which could be awarded to him under that section would not compensate him for the loss of goodwill he will suffer if he removes to and carries on his trade or business in other premises, he may in lieu of claiming such compensation, at any time within the period allowed for making a claim under the said section, serve on the landlord notice requiring a new lease of the premises at which the trade or business is carried on to be granted to him, (2) Where such a notice is so served, the tribunal . . . may, if it considers that the grant of a new tenancy is in all the circumstances reasonable, order the grant of a new tenancy for such period (being a term of years absolute) not exceeding fourteen years and on such terms as the tribunal may determine to be proper, but if the tribunal is precluded on any of the grounds mentioned in paragraph (b) of the following subsection from making such an order the tribunal may award such compensation as is provided under the last foregoing section . . . (3) Where the tenant is the applicant, the grant of a new lease under this section shall not be deemed to be reasonable (a) unless the tenant proves . . . or (b) if the landlord proves (i) that the premises are required for occupation by himself, or, where the landlord is an individual, for occupation by a son or daughter of his over eighteen years of age . . . (iv) that for any other reason the grant of such a lease of the premises would not be consistent with good estate management, and for this purpose regard shall be had to the development of any other property of the same landlord: Provided that, if the grant of a new lease is refused by the tribunal on any such ground as is mentioned in paragraph (b), the tribunal may make it a condition of refusal that if the landlord fails to carry out his intention within such period as may be allowed by the tribunal, the landlord shall pay to the tenant such compensation as the tribunal may fix not exceeding the amount of the loss which the tenant has suffered by reason of having been deprived of his right to the grant of a new lease under this section . . .

The originating summons in respect of the claim was filed on Oct. 4, 1946, in the Wandsworth County Court. Paragraphs (j) and (k) of the particulars in the summons read as follows :

(j) The applicant claims compensation in the sum of £2,000 for goodwill which has accrued to the premises by reason of the applicant having attracted thereto a permanent clientele of good standing which (sic) has become popular and widely known in the district. (k) Alternatively, the applicant claims a new lease of the premises.

On Dec. 21 the landlords filed their answer. They denied that any goodwill had become attached to the premises. They denied that it would be reasonable to grant a new lease, alleging some matters which are not now material, and relying on the covenant in the head lease. They also alleged that they required the house for their own occupation. On the same day the landlords gave notice of the proceedings to Queen Anne's Bounty, the head lessor. The letter, after setting out the course of events, said :

We shall be obliged if you will inform us whether you will appear before the tribunal or whether you have any suggestions to make with regard to the matter. If you wish to join us in the matter we shall let you know when the hearing before the referee will take place.

On Jan. 8 Queen Anne's Bounty wrote to the landlords as follows :

It has been brought to my notice that a breach of covenant of the lease dated Oct. 30, 1883, has been committed in that the above-mentioned property is being used as a guest house and not as a private dwelling-house as prescribed by the said lease. The governors of Queen Anne's Bounty as freeholders are not prepared to consent to the user of this property for a business and I must ask you to take immediate steps to see that such breach of covenant is remedied.

The business carried on by the tenant continued and Queen Anne's Bounty took no steps to re-enter or obtain an injunction. In accordance with the procedure as laid down the matter was referred to a referee for report. The landlords and the tenant appeared and called evidence. Queen Anne's Bounty, though entitled to, did not appear. The referee, though he heard the matter fully and reported on all issues, expressed the view that a tenant, in order to claim, must have been holding the premises for the five years required by s. 4 under a single title. Here there were two tenancies, the original three years and the further three years by reason of the exercise of the option. This was a point open to the landlords before the county court judge. Counsel for the landlords was invited by the learned judge to address him on the point, but he declined to do so, though, according to the judgment, he said he would like a decision on the point. The county court judge, accordingly, did not deal with the question, and we decided that the point had not been taken below and could not be relied on in this court.

The first question raised by the landlords is that there was no evidence of adherent goodwill. I have come to the conclusion that this contention fails. Both the referee in his report and the learned judge in his judgment seem to me properly to have appreciated the nature of what a tenant is required to establish, namely, that the only part of the tenant's goodwill which can be the subject of compensation is the net rental value of what adheres to the premises in the sense of enuring to the benefit of the landlord in the form of increased rental value after the premises have returned into his possession : see Clift v. Taylor (1). This value can usually only be ascertained as stated by MAUGHAM, L.J., in Whiteman Smith Motor Co. v. Chaplin (2) ([1934] 2 K.B. 35, 51) by an intelligent guess. If the guess is made by a witness considered by the tribunal to be honest and competent and accepted as accurate it is not for this court to disturb the finding even if, as is the fact in this case, some of the evidence appears to have been obtained as a result of questions put by counsel and by the referee which tended by their leading nature somewhat to discount the value of the answers so obtained.

I pass, therefore, to consider what is, in my view, one of the two principal issues in this case, namely, whether the premises "could be let" within the meaning of those words in sub-s. (1) of s. 4. It is to be observed that this question falls to be decided under a section which deals only with compensation. Whether or not the existence of a covenant as to user in a head lease is a matter which should be taken into consideration in determining whether to grant a new lease under s. 5 is an entirely different matter. As was pointed out by the county court judge, the words are not "the landlord could let" but simply "could be let." Section 4 contains no sub-section equivalent to sub-s. (9) of s. 5, which extends the meaning of the word "landlord" in that section to include a superior landlord. Consequently, in s. 4 the word "landlord" has the limited meaning assigned to it by s. 25, namely, the person who under a lease is as between himself and the tenant for the time being entitled to the rents and profits of the demised premises payable under the lease. The use of the word "landlord," with this limited meaning, is, it seems, purposely avoided at the end of sub-s. (1), leaving the words "could be let" to cover and include all such persons as may in fact be in a position to let at the determination of the tenancy, e.g., the head landlord where there is only one day left of the mesne landlord's term at the end of the tenant's lease. If this is so, the words seem to me apt to cover the case where the letting which is contemplated may require the consent of some person other than the mesne landlord. I can see no reason why the tenant should be deprived of compensation for adherent goodwill merely by reason of the fact that the head landlord might not desire to appropriate the goodwill or might prevent the mesne landlord by forfeiture from enjoying it. None of these contingencies appears to me to require consideration under s. 4, which contemplates a letting for the same purpose as that for which the expiring lease has been used. I am not, of course, dealing with cases where the user is "unlawful" in the sense of being in contravention of the law.

A case for compensation under s. 4 was, in my opinion, established, but as the tenant alleged, and as was not disputed, the amount of compensation which could be awarded to her under s. 4 would not compensate her for the loss of her goodwill. She claimed the grant of a new lease under s. 5, which empowers the tribunal, subject to the provisions of that section, to order the grant of a new lease. The first requirement is that the tribunal should consider the grant of a new tenancy in all the circumstances reasonable. If the tribunal, for reasons other than those stated in para. (b) of s. 5 (3), does not consider the grant reasonable, then there is an end to the matter.

It is, I think, at this stage that it may be relevant for the tribunal to consider the attitude and intentions of the head landlord with regard to possible grounds for forfeiture arising out of a grant of a new tenancy. Similar considerations may also arise in connection with estate management under cl. (iv) of para. (b) of sub-s. (3) of s. 5. In the present case the learned judge has found nothing in the evidence to render the grant unreasonable, apart from para. (b) of sub-s. (3) and I think the evidence before him as to the attitude and intentions of Queen Anne's Bounty with regard to the breach of covenant was such that the judge may well have been unimpressed by it. With regard, however, to para. (b) of sub-s. (3), I think the learned judge came to an erroneous decision. The evidence of Mr. Taylor, one of the landlords, was that he required possession of the house so that he might use the large lounge as a studio for portrait painting, for which purpose it was suitable by reason of its size and lighting. He was 70 years of age and desirous of resuming his profession as a portrait painter. No attack appears to have been made on the veracity of Mr. Taylor, but the learned judge described this as a "mere whim." If Mr. Taylor, in fact, desires to get possession of this house and genuinely intends to use it for this purpose I can see no ground for saying that he does not "require" it within the meaning of sub-para. (i) of para. (b) of sub-s. (3) of s. 5, which contains the words "the premises are required for occupation by himself." If he required it for this purpose, then his wife who was living with him clearly also required it apart altogether from the other reasons which she gave in evidence some of which clearly could not be substantiated. The referee had interpreted the word "required" as if it meant "needed," somewhat on the lines of the words "reasonably required" in the Rent Restrictions Acts. The county court judge rightly rejected this construction, but appears to have interposed his own judgment as to the landlord's "requirements," whereas, in my opinion, in this part of the section the landlord must be the sole arbiter of his own requirements, provided he proves that he, in fact, desires possession and genuinely intends to occupy. I think this construction is strongly supported by the use of the word "intention" in the proviso to sub-s. (3), which, it may be observed, provides a means whereby a landlord who goes back on his expressed intention can be penalised. It is also the construction accepted by HALLETT, J., in Nuthall, Ltd. v. Entertainments & General Investment Corp., Ltd. (3) ([1947] 2 All E.R. 384, 392). For this reason I think the learned judge's order should be varied by substituting for the new lease an award of the compensation fixed by the referee.

SOMERVELL, L.J. : It is unnecessary to re-state the sequence of events and the relevant provisions of the statute as these have already been set out in TUCKER, L.J.'s judgment. The case came on before the learned county court judge in November, 1947. We have the advantage of a full judgment in which the learned judge sets out his reasons for his conclusions. Queen Anne's Bounty, who did not appear and argue before the referee, had intervened formally, in order, we were told, to obtain a copy of the report. Counsel on behalf of Queen Anne's Bounty appeared before the learned county court judge, and I deal later in this judgment with the course which Queen Anne's Bounty have taken. The learned judge found that goodwill had attached to the premises within the meaning of s. 4 of the Act. The first issue raised is whether there was any evidence on which he could so find, considering the point irrespective of any argument based on the restrictive covenant in the head lease.

The conception of goodwill under the Act is not an easy one. It was fully dealt with in Whiteman Smith Motor Co., Ltd. v. Chaplin (2) in judgments given by SCRUTTON, L.J., and MAUGHAM, L.J., sitting as a Divisional Court. The matter has been recently considered by this court in Clift v. Taylor (1), in which the judgment of the court was delivered by SCOTT, L.J. I will cite one sentence from the judgment of this court in the latter case approving and summarising what had been said in Whiteman's case (2) ([1948] 2 All E.R. 113, 115):

Those learned judges made it quite clear that the only part of the tenant's goodwill which is the subject of compensation is the net rental value of what "adheres" to the premises in the sense of enuring to the benefit of the landlord in the form of increased rental value after the premises have returned into his possession.

A Mr. Warner, who had practised as a surveyor and estate agent for 20 years, gave evidence that, on the evidence given as to the tenant's building up and carrying on the business, goodwill had attached to the premises, with the result that, in his opinion, a person desiring to carry on the same business would give £220 a year, whereas other persons would give £180 a year. On this the learned

A judge said :

That evidence was in fact the witness's expert opinion on the very question which the court has got to decide, and I can only wish that I personally found the approach to it so simple.

I think that expert evidence of this kind is admissible. It does not, of course, bind the court, and there will often, as there was here, be conflicting evidence.

B It must be carefully scrutinised so as to see whether the expert is directing his mind to the goodwill with which the Act is concerned. Having read Mr. Warner's evidence, I think it constituted some evidence of adherent goodwill. The learned judge then considered the matter on general grounds, and in the light of the tenant's evidence. He said this :

C On this point I was very impressed by the argument of Mr. Hawser, that this being a business carried on with considerable privacy and dependent to a large extent on the personality of Mrs. Ireland could not, by its very nature, be adherent to the premises. In his cross-examination of Mrs. Ireland, Mr. Hawser extracted from her a number of answers which laid emphasis on the site value of the premises, and on the personal connection between herself and her clientele, but in re-examination she said that "Heathlands" as such, as a name, had acquired a reputation. This, it seems to me, is quite consistent with probabilities and ought to be accepted. It does not require any stretch of imagination to visualise someone in search of a home for an elderly and infirm relation being told by a friend or relation of a guest that there is such a home at "Heathlands." There is the introduction, and whether the enquirer knows the name of Mrs. Ireland or not he or she is not likely to ignore the recommendation so long as the home is well run by its new proprietor. It is probably true that recommendations from doctors would be largely personal to Mrs. Ireland, but I see no reason why recommendations from friends and relatives of guests should not be very largely in the name of the house rather than, or at least as well as, in the name of Mrs. Ireland.

E In my opinion, the landlords fail in their submission that there was no evidence to support this finding.

The next point raised was that based on the covenant in the head lease, and is formulated by the judge as follows :

F The landlords say that [the premises] could not be let at a higher rent because by the terms of the head lease the carrying on of this business was a breach of covenant as between the mesne landlords and the head landlord, and now that the head landlord knows of the breach he would not permit it to be perpetuated with a new tenant.

G The learned judge's first reason for not accepting this submission was that the premises having been let by the landlords' predecessors in title with permission to carry on this particular business the landlords were estopped from denying that it was a lawful purpose. In the view I take on this part of the case it is unnecessary to decide it on this basis. The learned judge went on to hold that, apart from the doctrine of estoppel, the argument was not a sound one, and he said this :

H The operative words are "the premises could be let at a higher rent." It seems to me to be quite immaterial that they cannot be so let without the consent of the superior landlord. Apart from that limitation they could be so let, and the mesne landlords might obtain the advantage by getting a consent from their head landlord, or they might surrender the lease to their head landlord who would pay a higher price for the premises with an enhanced value, or they might, and in these days very likely could, get the covenant modified under s. 84 of the Law of Property Act, 1925. These are possibilities to which I refer because the words of the section are "premises could be let" and not "the landlord could let the premises," and I do not think there is anything in the decision of Hudd v. Matthews (4) which is contrary to this interpretation of the section.

I am not sure what the learned judge's view would have been if he had been satisfied on evidence that there was no possibility of the landlord giving his consent, or that the covenant was of a kind which was unlikely to be modified under s. 84 of the Law of Property Act, 1925.

I arrive at the same conclusion as my brethren and the learned judge, but by a somewhat different route. In cases where a new lease is claimed the proceedings under the Act are started before the termination of the lease. The mesne landlord has, under s. 5 (9), to give notice of the claim to his immediate landlord. If that landlord is a mesne landlord he has to notify his immediate landlord, and so on. If no new lease is claimed a mesne landlord who desires at the end of his lease to claim compensation from his landlord under s. 8 must notify that landlord of the claim. In a case, therefore, like the present where a trade has been carried on in breach of a covenant in a head lease unknown to the head lessor, the head lessor will normally receive notice, as happened in the present case. Now, the mere fact that the trade or business is contrary to a covenant in a head lease is consistent with there having been an express or implied consent or a willingness to abstain from enforcing the covenant in futuro. Indeed, the argument as set out by the learned judge was based on the submission that the head landlord would not permit the breach to be perpetuated with a new tenant. It would, of course, on any view be wrong if compensation was refused on the ground of the existence of such a covenant, there being no intention to enforce it now or in futuro.

In the present case no steps were taken by Queen Anne's Bounty when their demand in the letter of Jan. 8, 1947, that the business should be discontinued was disregarded. They could, by taking the appropriate steps, have enforced, or, at any rate, sought to enforce, their covenant. If they had obtained an injunction no goodwill enabling the premises to be let at a higher rent on the termination of the tenancy could, as it seems to me, have attached. At the material date the business would have ceased. If there had been a forfeiture it is, I think, clear that the wording of s. 4 (1) (i) and (ii) excludes the case of a lease terminated by a forfeiture. In the present case the matter does not rest on the mere absence of proceedings. Queen Anne's Bounty did not, as I have stated, appear and argue or call evidence before the referee. A witness, a Mr. Godbold, from their estates management department, was called by the landlords. He gave evidence that it was the general policy of Queen Anne's Bounty not to allow a trade or business to be carried on in Kew Road. The following two questions and answers are, I think, important: Counsel for the landlords asked this question:

To make it quite specific, are Queen Anne's Bounty prepared to allow the premises to be used as a guest house for elderly ladies? (A) I should very much doubt it, if it is to be run on the lines of a business for profit.

Again there is a question by counsel for the tenant:

If they were approached by Mrs. Ireland saying: "I am carrying on this business without any indication outside so that it does not upset the appearance of your estate. I have these old ladies who would otherwise be driven to an infirmary, and I have been carrying on for six years," would your governors say "No"? (A) I cannot answer that.

This was some six months after they had received the notice. On the evidence, therefore, it was not clear whether Queen Anne's Bounty were or were not prepared to allow this very limited breach of the covenant. It is, to my mind, plain that if a covenant like this, not having been enforced or sought to be enforced by legal process after knowledge of the breach, is to be relied on as defeating a claim for compensation the tribunal must be satisfied beyond all reasonable doubt that it is the intention of those entitled to enforce it to take all steps open to them to do so. At this stage, therefore, in my opinion, the landlords had failed to discharge that burden. Before the learned county court judge Queen Anne's Bounty appeared, as I have said, by counsel. It appears from the judgment that they sought to call evidence to show that the grant of a new lease allowing the business to continue would not be consistent with good estate management. The learned judge refused to allow this to be done as Queen Anne's Bounty had neglected to appear before the referee. Queen Anne's Bounty have not appealed either from the learned judge's refusal to allow this evidence or from his order granting a new lease overriding the covenant. This issue, therefore, remains on the evidence as it was before the referee, and on that evidence, for the reasons already given, the point, in my opinion, fails. I am not in any way criticising the line taken by Queen Anne's Bounty. They appear to have been content to leave the matter in the hands of the court and have accepted the decision. They may well feel that in present circumstances it would be undesirable to insist on the letter of their bond against this minor and inconspicuous breach.

A It is, therefore, unnecessary to decide the question whether, in considering the application of the words "could be let," the existence of an enforceable covenant preventing further user for the trade or business in question is wholly immaterial. I should myself hesitate to come to the conclusion that a landlord, apart from any question of estoppel, should have to pay compensation in respect of an increased rental value which he was going to be prevented from realising. The compensation, as was stated in Whiteman Smith Motor Co., Ltd. v. Chaplin (2), is limited to the addition to the value of the premises in the hands of the landlord at the end of the tenancy. In the case put the addition would appear to be nil.

B The next question is whether the learned judge was right in ordering a new lease. On this point I think the appeal succeeds on the ground that the landlords required the premises for occupation by themselves. The referee in his report construed "requires" as meaning "needs," and came to the conclusion that the landlords did not need this large house. It is unnecessary to refer to the evidence in detail, but neither in the referee's findings nor, as far as I can see, in cross-examination was any doubt thrown on the intention of the landlords to go and live in the house if they got the chance. The learned judge did not regard "requires" as meaning "reasonably requires" or "needs," but as a somewhat stronger word than "intends." He again, as I read the judgment, threw no doubt on the landlord's intention. He regarded their desire for this large house, and in particular Mr. Taylor's desire for the large lounge for use as a studio, as a whim or fancy. In Clift v. Taylor (1) it is said that any real ambiguity of language ought to be resolved in favour of maintaining common law rights. I doubt if there is any real ambiguity. "Requires" may, of course, have different senses in different contexts. In its present context it is, I think, satisfied if a landlord establishes, as these landlords did, that he wants and intends to occupy the premises. Apart from the Act that is his common law right. If the legislature had intended to place some burden on him of establishing that he was reasonable or not unreasonable in requiring what was his own, plain words would have been used. Of course, if a court came to the conclusion that the evidence of intention was false and that the landlord did not genuinely intend to occupy the premises, the claim would fail. There is, however, no trace of any finding to this effect. On this view it is unnecessary to consider F the question of "reasonableness." In the result, in my opinion, the appeal must be allowed as to the new lease.

E There then arises the question of compensation. Where a new lease has been applied for the court dealing with that application can under s. 5 (2) only grant compensation if it is precluded from granting a new lease on any of the grounds mentioned in s. 5 (3) (b). I referred to the difficulties that may arise from this provision in Bullins v. Fytche and Another (5) ([1948] 1 All E.R. 737, 740, 741). G They do not arise in the present case as on the view I take the application for a new lease fails under s. 5 (3) (b) (i). The referee fixed the figure for compensation, if awardable, at £371 9s. 4d. and this figure was not challenged before us.

H COHEN, L.J. : The facts have been fully stated by TUCKER, L.J., and I need not repeat them. He has also read all the provisions of the Act to which I desire to refer with the exception of s. 17 (1), which defines the holding to which pt. I of the Act refers. That sub-section reads as follows :

The holdings to which this part of this Act applies are any premises held under a lease, other than a mining lease, made whether before or after the commencement of this Act, and used wholly or partly for carrying on thereat any trade or business, and not being agricultural holdings within the meaning of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923.

The first ground of the landlord's appeal is the contention that the court had no jurisdiction to award compensation or grant a new lease because the tenant had not been tenant of the premises under one lease for a period of 5 years. I agree with my brethren that this point is not open to the landlords in this court.

The next question that arises is whether the tenant can establish the existence of adherent goodwill in the premises arising by reason of the business carried on by her thereon, and thus entitling her to compensation under s. 4. This is a mixed question of fact and law. The learned county court judge answered it in favour of the tenant, and the landlords cannot displace that finding unless they can show, either that the learned county court judge went wrong in principle, or that there was no evidence to support the conclusion which he reached. Counsel for the landlords contends that the learned judge went wrong in principle, in that, in considering whether the premises could be let at a higher rent than they would have realised had no adherent goodwill attached thereto, he ignored the fact that in the head lease there was a provision restricting user to user as a private dwelling-house. Counsel for the tenant, however, said that this was irrelevant and that the only question was whether the premises, i.e., the physical premises, could be let at a higher rent, and that to that question the provision in the head lease was irrelevant. In my opinion, the argument of counsel for the tenant is well founded. What has to be considered is not whether the landlord could let the premises, but whether the premises could be let. The definition of "holdings" in s. 17 of the Act seems to me to support the view that the expression "premises" in s. 4 means the premises in their physical condition, and that there is no reason for importing any restrictive provision in the head lease into the consideration of the question whether the premises "could be let at a higher rent." It was suggested that this conclusion involved a hardship on the mesne landlord. I am unable to agree. The case must be rare in which a trade could be carried on for five years on premises without the mesne landlord being aware of that fact, and, in any event, if it is open to the landlords, mesne and head landlords together, to appropriate the value of the goodwill, I see no reason why the tenant should be deprived of that value, because as between the head landlord and the mesne landlord the head landlord may be in a position to prevent the mesne landlord enjoying that for which he has paid.

I turn now to the question whether there was evidence on which the learned county court judge could properly find that adherent goodwill had attached to the premises. The expert evidence of Mr. Warner, who was called for the tenant, was, as I read it, clearly to the effect that this question must be answered in the affirmative. The learned county court judge so read his evidence, but, as expert evidence must necessarily be based on the facts proved by the other witnesses, he was not prepared to act on the expert evidence without careful scrutiny of the other evidence. In this case the only other relevant evidence was that of the tenant herself. The learned judge deals with her evidence on this point in the passage in his judgment beginning "on this point I was very much impressed," which has already been read by SOMERVELL, L.J. The learned judge concludes his observations on this point by saying:

I have therefore not without difficulty come to the conclusion that the referee's decision that there is an adherent goodwill is the correct one in this case.

It is not for us to say whether we should have arrived at the same conclusion; it is enough to say that it seems to me quite impossible to say that there was no evidence on which this conclusion could be reached.

The tenant had, therefore, laid the foundation for an application under s. 5 for the grant of a new lease, provided she could prove that the compensation which could be awarded to her would not compensate her for the loss of goodwill she would suffer if she removed to or carried on her trade or business in other premises. It was not disputed that the tenant was in a position to prove this fact, but it was argued (i) that the court had not power to grant a new lease since the head landlord could enforce the restrictive provision in the head lease and thus render the new lease nugatory. The learned judge, however, held that any lease granted by him would bind the head landlord, and would be an answer to any action for forfeiture which the head landlord might bring. From this finding the head landlord has not appealed, and I do not think it lies in the mouth of the landlords to raise this objection. (ii) The landlords contended that it was not reasonable, in view of the existence of this restrictive covenant, to grant a lease. I think this is really the same objection in another form, and in any event I do not think that the landlords, having let the premises to the tenant for the specific purpose of carrying on on the premises a private nursing home and/or guest house, can now be heard to say that it is not reasonable for the court to grant a new lease for the same purposes. (iii) A more formidable objection for the grant of a new lease is based on the provision in s. 5 (3) which provides that it shall not be deemed to be reasonable to grant a new lease if the premises are required by the landlord for his own occupation. A The landlords, by para. (7) (d) of their answer, contended that they would require the premises for occupation for themselves and for their son and daughter-in-law. Before turning to the evidence on this point it is necessary to decide what is meant by the word "required." The referee came to the conclusion that this word meant "needed," and that as (a) the landlords' allegation, so far as the son and daughter-in-law was concerned, was unsupported by evidence, and (b), so far as the landlords themselves were concerned, they had another house which they could retain under the provisions of the Rent Restrictions Act, it could not be said that they needed the premises for their own occupation.

Before the learned county court judge counsel for the landlords contended that the referee had wrongly construed the word "required," and he relied on the decision of HALLETT, J., in Nuthall, Ltd. v. Entertainments & General Investment Corporation, Ltd. (3), where the learned judge, referring to s. 5 (3) C (b) of the Act, said ([1947] 2 All E.R. 384, 392):

I . . . think that what the landlord has to prove under (i) is that he intends to use the premises for occupation by himself, just as under (iii) he has to prove that he intends to use the premises to carry out a scheme of re-development.

I respectfully agree with this construction of the sub-section. The learned county court judge purported to accept it, but qualified his acceptance in the D following words:

I do not think I am doing any injustice to that dictum if I say that there is always a danger in interpreting a word in a statute by the ample substitution of another, and I feel that although it is wrong to say that "requires" is the same as "reasonably requires" or "needs," yet it is a somewhat stronger word than "intends" and does not include a mere whim or fancy.

E If by these observations the learned county court judge merely meant that the intention must be a genuine intention, I should not quarrel with him, but if he meant that, although the intention was genuine, the court must consider whether it was reasonable, then I am unable to agree. From the way the learned county court judge dealt with the evidence, I have come to the conclusion that the second interpretation of his language is correct, and that he thought it was open to him to consider the reasonableness of the landlords' contention.

F After referring to the referee's summary of the evidence of the landlords, he says that he had the advantage of reading a shorthand note of Mrs. Taylor's evidence, and was not at all satisfied that she genuinely required the house for her own occupation. He deals with Mr. Taylor's evidence in the following language:

G Mr. Taylor, whose evidence was more frank, is apparently wishful of having the big lounge in the house for resuming, at the age of 70, his profession as a portrait painter, but having regard to all the circumstances, I cannot regard that as more than a whim, when it involves the requirement of an unsuitably large house for the sake of the size and lighting of one room in it.

As I read that observation he is saying that Mr. Taylor's evidence is genuine, but that he does not regard it as reasonable, having regard to the rest of his evidence, that at the age of 70 Mr. Taylor should want the big lounge in the H premises for his professional work.

Now, I think that it was not for the learned county court judge to decide as to the reasonableness of Mr. Taylor's intention. In my opinion, provided that intention was genuine, the landlords were entitled to rely on the proviso to the sub-section. The learned judge did not himself see the witnesses, but the referee did, and the referee seems to have felt no doubt as to the genuineness of Mr. Taylor's evidence. He concludes his observations on this part of the case by saying that he quite realised that the landlords would like to oblige their landlord (i.e., the landlord of the house they were then living in) and that that landlord desired, if they left, to sell the premises. In other words, the landlords' intention was genuine, and it was inspired in part by their desire to oblige their present landlord.

For these reasons, I would allow the appeal on the ground that the landlords have established that the premises are required for occupation by themselves. It is to be observed that, if the tribunal is precluded on the ground I have indicated from making an order for a new lease, it is empowered under sub-s. (2) of s. 5 to award such compensation as is provided under s. 4. The referee assessed compensation that would be payable under that section at £371 9s. 4d. and that figure was adopted by the learned county court judge who stated that it had not been disputed by any party to the application. Accordingly, in allowing this appeal I would direct the payment of £371 9s. 4d. compensation under s. 4.

Appeal allowed. Order of county court judge varied by substituting for the order for a new lease an order for payment of £371 9s. 4d., being compensation assessed by referee. Compensation to be paid on quitting the holding. Tenant to have costs of hearing before the referee and county court judge, on Scale C; landlords to have three-quarters of costs of appeal, to be set off.

BARKWAY v. SOUTH WALES TRANSPORT CO., LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Scott, Bucknill and Asquith, L.JJ.), May 25, 26, 28, 31, June 1, 2, 3, 4, July 9, 1948.]

Negligence—Presumption of negligence—Highway—Skid—Omnibus mounting pavement and falling down embankment—Accident due to tyre-burst—Impact fracture of tyre—No evidence when or how caused—Reasonable system of tyre maintenance by defendants.

At about 6.30 a.m. on Feb. 27, 1943, a motor omnibus belonging to the defendants, and carrying 53 passengers among whom was the plaintiff's husband, was passing through a village when the off-side front tyre burst, the omnibus went over to the off-side of the road, mounted the pavement, crashed into some railings, and fell down an embankment, killing four of the passengers, including the plaintiff's husband, and injuring others. The tyre-burst was caused by an impact fracture of the cord of the outer tyre, but there was no evidence when the fracture occurred. Evidence was given that an impact fracture was caused by a severe blow which could happen without leaving any visible mark on the outer surface of the tyre and might not be visible even if the tyre were removed from the rim and examined. The tyre, while fixed on the rim, had been examined periodically by an expert tyre fitter employed by the defendants, the last examination being 3 days before the accident, and it was the practice of the defendants to have tyres examined internally after every 25,000 miles when they had been running on fairly bad roads. The tyre in question had run about 23,545 miles, and about 21,750 miles since it was last taken off for examination. Before the accident occurred the driver of the omnibus had been driving at an average speed of 32 miles an hour, and was, therefore, guilty of a breach of statutory duty as the maximum speed for an omnibus of that type in the "black-out" (which then existed) was 20 miles an hour. He was, however, not driving at an excessive speed just before the accident occurred and the tyre-burst was not caused by his driving too fast. The plaintiff claimed damages from the defendants on the ground that her husband's death was caused by the negligence of the defendants or their servants.

HELD: (i) the fact that the omnibus left the road and fell down the embankment raised a presumption of negligence against the defendants, requiring them to prove affirmatively that they had exercised all reasonable care; to displace the presumption it was not sufficient for the defendants to show that the immediate cause of the accident was a tyre-burst, since a tyre-burst per se was equally consistent with negligence or due diligence on their part; but it was necessary for the defendants to prove either that the burst itself was due to a specific cause which did not connote negligence, or, if they could point to no such specific cause, that they had used all reasonable care in the management of their tyres.

Laurie v. Raglan Building Co., Ltd. ([1941] 3 All E.R. 332); principle in Scott v. London Dock Co. (1865) (3 H. & C. 596); and Woods v. Duncan, Duncan v. Hambrook, Duncan v. Cammell Laird & Co., Ltd. ([1946] A.C. 401), applied.

(ii) [BUCKNILL, L.J., dissenting] on the facts, the defendants had discharged the burden on them by proving that they had maintained a reasonable system of inspection in regard to their tyres and that they were not guilty of negligence with regard to the maintenance of the tyre in question.

(iii) [BUCKNILL, L.J., dissenting] since the driver of the omnibus was unaware of the defect in the tyre and the burst was not caused by fast driving, the defendants had not failed to discharge the presumption of negligence arising from the fact that the driver of the omnibus exceeded the legal speed limit on the journey before the accident occurred.

Evidence—Admissibility—Document—"Information supplied" to person making statement—"Person interested"—Transcript of evidence given in earlier action brought on same facts, but by different plaintiff—Death of witness before trial in present proceedings—Evidence Act, 1938 (c. 28), s. 1 (1) (i) (b), (3), (4).

Proceedings arising out of the same accident, but brought by a different plaintiff, came to trial in 1943, although instituted after the present proceedings. In the 1943 action and before the trial of the present action evidence was given by J., the defendants' expert tyre fitter, who died in 1945. The defendants sought to give in evidence in the present proceedings the transcript of the evidence given by J. in the 1943 action, on the ground that it was a "statement made by a person in a document," which formed part of a record within the meaning of the Evidence Act, 1938, s. 1 (1) (b), the "person" making the document being either J., or the maker of the typed transcript of the evidence (i.e., the "reporter"). The Evidence Act, 1938, s. 1, provides: "(1) In any civil proceedings where direct oral evidence of a fact would be admissible, any statement made by a person in a document and tending to establish that fact shall, on production of the original document, be admissible . . . (i) if the maker of the statement . . . (b) where the document in question is or forms part of a record purporting to be a continuous record, made the statement (in so far as the matters dealt with thereby are not within his personal knowledge) in the performance of a duty to record information supplied to him by a person who had . . . personal knowledge of those matters . . . (3) Nothing in this section shall render admissible as evidence any statement made by a person interested at a time when proceedings were pending or anticipated involving a dispute as to any fact which the statement might tend to establish. (4) For the purposes of this section, a statement in a document shall not be deemed to have been made by a person unless the document or the material part thereof was written, made or produced by him with his own hand, or was signed or initialled by him or otherwise recognised by him in writing as one for the accuracy of which he is responsible."

HELD: (i) the transcript of the evidence given by J. in the former proceedings was not admissible in the present case under the Evidence Act, 1938, s. 1 (1), as a document made by J., because it had not been signed or initialled by him, or recognised by him in writing, as required by s. 1 (4) of the Act.

(ii) the transcript was not admissible as a document made by the reporter, because J.'s evidence was not "information supplied" to the reporter, within the meaning of s. 1 (1) (i) (b).

Bullock v. Borrett ([1939] 1 All E.R. 505), considered.

(iii) the transcript was inadmissible under s. 1 (3) of the Act, since J. was a "person interested" in the result of the 1943 action and, had he lived, he would have been interested in the result of the present proceedings

APPEAL by the defendants from a judgment of SELLERS, J., at Swansea, dated July 30, 1947.

The plaintiff's husband was killed in an accident while a passenger in a motor omnibus belonging to the defendants, and she sought to recover damages under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, and the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934. Owing to a burst tyre, the omnibus skidded across the road, mounted the opposite pavement and fell down an embankment. SELLERS, J., held that the defendants were guilty of negligence in their system of tyre maintenance and gave judgment for the plaintiff. From this decision the defendants appealed to the Court of Appeal. The defendants' expert tyre fitter at the time of the accident had died in 1945, before the trial of the action, and the defendants applied to the Court of Appeal to admit as additional evidence the transcript of evidence given by him in an action heard in 1943 which arose from the same accident but was brought by a different plaintiff. This application was refused on the ground that the transcript was not admissible as evidence under the Evidence Act, 1938, s. 1. The Court of Appeal held (BUCKNILL, L.J., dissenting) that the defendants had displaced the presumption of negligence raised by the fact of the omnibus mounting the pavement and falling down the embankment by proving that they had exercised all reasonable care in the maintenance of the tyre which had burst and caused the accident. The facts appear in the judgment of BUCKNILL, L.J.

Fox-Andrews, K.C., Gerwyn P. Thomas (with him Sheen) for the defendants.
Edmund Davies, K.C., and Platts Mills for the plaintiff.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 9. The following judgments were read.

SCOTT, L.J.: I will ask BUCKNILL, L.J., to read the first judgment.

BUCKNILL, L.J.: This is an appeal from a judgment of SELLERS, J., awarding £2,000 damages to the plaintiff for the death of her husband on the ground that his death had been caused by the negligence of the defendants or their servants. The appeal before us was concerned solely with the question whether the judge was wrong in finding negligence. On Feb. 27, 1943, the defendants' double deck omnibus, 26ft. long and 7ft. 6ins. wide and weighing 10 tons, with 53 passengers including the plaintiff's husband, was going through the village of Pwll when the off-front tyre burst. The omnibus then went over to the off-side of the road, mounted the pavement, crashed into some railings and fell on its side down an embankment on to some railway trucks, killing four of the passengers and injuring others. Prima facie, the fact of the omnibus leaving the road and mounting the pavement raises a presumption of negligence against the defendants. Laurie v. Raglan Building Co., Ltd. (1) illustrates this proposition. In that case the plaintiff's husband, whilst standing on the public pavement, was killed by a passing lorry which skidded so that part of it swept across the pavement. LORD GREENE, M.R., in his judgment pointed out that the accident raised a prima facie case of negligence against the driver of the lorry and continued ([1941] 3 All E.R. 332, 336) :

A That being the position, the plaintiff gave evidence which showed . . . that the position of the lorry over the pavement was due to a skid, and it is contended on behalf of the respondents that, assuming that a prima facie case of negligence arose, the circumstance establishing that the accident was due to a skid is sufficient to displace that prima facie case. In my opinion, that is not a sound proposition. The skid by itself is neutral. It may or may not be due to negligence. If, in a case where a prima facie case of negligence arises . . . it is shown that the accident is due to a skid, and that the skid happened without fault on the part of the driver, then the prima facie case is clearly displaced, but merely establishing the skid does not appear to me to be sufficient for that purpose.

The accident to this omnibus comes within the rule of evidence stated by ERLE, C.J., in Scott v. London Dock Co. (2) as follows (3 H. & C. 596, 601) :

C . . . where the thing is shown to be under the management of the defendant or his servants, and the accident is such as in the ordinary course of things does not happen if those who have the management use proper care, it affords reasonable evidence, in the absence of explanation by the defendants, that the accident arose from want of care.

D This rule of evidence was considered recently by the House of Lords in Woods v. Duncan (3), better known perhaps as the Thetis case. It is clear from the speeches there delivered that the defendant, in a case where the rule applies, is not liable although he is unable to explain how the accident happened, provided he establishes that he himself was not negligent. Thus LORD SIMONDS said ([1946] A.C. 401, 439) :

The accident may remain inexplicable, or at least no satisfactory explanation other than his negligence may be offered : yet, if the court is satisfied by his evidence that he was not negligent, the plaintiff's case must fail.

E The crucial question, therefore, seems to me to be whether the court is satisfied that the defendants or their agents were not negligent in using this tyre, or in the way in which they used it, in connection with this accident. The tyre which burst was composed of an outer tyre and an inner tube. The outer tyre was constructed in the following form. It had a cord composed of 12 plies of a cotton material, each ply being sheathed in rubber. The plies were joined together to form the cord, which was about one inch thick. The ply nearest F the inner surface of the tyre and in contact with the inner tube is called the crown. Outside the cord there was a layer of rubber called the breaker strip, and outside the breaker strip was another layer of rubber, which, when new, was about .874 inch thick. On the outside of this layer was the pattern. This tyre had run about 23,545 miles and at the time of the accident the pattern had been worn level over 5 inches of the breadth of the tyre. The judge found as a fact, and, I think, rightly on the evidence, that the burst was caused by an impact fracture of the cord of the outer tyre. An impact fracture is also in G itself a neutral fact, because it may be due to negligence or it may not. It is a fracture of the cord of the tyre and is brought about by a blow on the external surface of the tyre. In my opinion, the fracture did not in itself explain the accident in a way which relieved the defendants' prima facie liability for it. It was a neutral event which might, or might not, happen through the negligence of the defendants. I think that the defendants must prove, or the evidence H as a whole must show, that the burst occurred without any negligence on their part. On the other hand, it is sufficient if they establish that they took due care to secure that the tyre was fit for use on this fatal journey. I may here quote from the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber in Readhead v. Midland Ry. Co. (4) (L.R. 4 Q.B. 379, 393) :

"Due care" however undoubtedly means, having reference to the nature of the contract to carry, a high degree of care, and casts on carriers the duty of exercising all vigilance to see that whatever is required for the safe conveyance of their passengers is in fit and proper order.

The evidence established that, if a tyre of this kind receives a blow which is severe and much more than one would expect it to have in the ordinary course of its work, some of the plys may become fractured. This may happen although there is no visible mark on the exterior surface of the tyre. Unless the fracture extends sufficiently deep to affect the plys adjacent to the crown, the fracture may not be capable of detection even if the tyre is removed from the rim, and the crown is looked at and examined by touch. The evidence was that an impact fracture invariably commenced on the outside ply of the cord, and might extend from one to all the plys. The evidence called by the defendants, which I think the judge accepted, was that in about half the number of impact fractures no evidence of the fracture would be detected by an examination of the external surface of the tyre. In these cases there is nothing to indicate that the tyre has developed this dangerous weakness unless it is possible to detect it by taking the tyre off and examining the crown.

The danger of using a tyre which has developed an impact fracture is that the further use of the tyre will cause internal friction and wear in the mass of the plys so that the fracture grows and the tyre weakens, with the ultimate result that the tyre is no longer able to resist the outward pressure exerted on it by the inner tube, and the tyre then bursts. It follows, having regard to this serious risk, that the defendants, as owners of a motor bus used for the conveyance of passengers, owed a duty to them to exercise all due care to see that the tyre had not sustained an impact fracture. The tyre when fixed on the rim was periodically examined and its pressure tested by one Jenkins, an expert tyre fitter in the employ of the defendants. He kept certain sheets relating to his work and it appears from those sheets that he examined this tyre at Llanelly on frequent dates during January and February, 1943, the last occasion being on Feb. 24. On each occasion he also adjusted the pressure. He had also tested the pressure at Llanelly on Feb. 20 and 22. Unfortunately, Jenkins died in Sept., 1945, before the hearing of the case before SELLERS, J. He had given evidence in a previous case heard before LEWIS, J., when the plaintiff was the widow of a man also killed in this accident and the defendants were the same as in this action. Although it appears from the transcript of the evidence in the present case that a transcript of Jenkins' evidence before LEWIS, J., was in the hands of counsel for the plaintiff, and presumably also in the hands of counsel for the defendants, no application was made by either side to SELLERS, J., to admit the transcript of Jenkins' evidence. An application was made to us by counsel for the defendants to admit the transcript as additional evidence, but we ruled that it was inadmissible and said that the court would give the reasons for its decision after the hearing of the appeal had closed. I have had an opportunity of reading the judgment of ASQUITH, L.J., on this point, I agree with it and have nothing to add to his reasons why the evidence was inadmissible. The court, therefore, does not know what evidence Jenkins gave as to the state of the tyre when he examined it on Feb. 24 at Llanelly. The examination was of the tyre on the rim and was, therefore, only of its outer surface. I think it is a reasonable conclusion to draw from the course taken by plaintiff's counsel at the trial that Jenkins in his evidence did not admit that he saw any evidence of a defect in the tyre likely to impair its efficiency. The death of Jenkins put the defendants in a difficulty at the trial through no fault of their own, but it was somewhat lessened by the fact that, when counsel for the plaintiff started to cross-examine Mr. Bourne (the defendants' foreman at the Llanelly garage) as to what Jenkins had said at the previous trial, the counsel for the defendants could have applied to the judge to admit the transcript of Jenkins' evidence, an application which, I think, the plaintiff could then have hardly resisted. They did not do so, and the judge proceeded to deal with the question of Jenkins' negligence without apparently knowing what Jenkins had said when he gave his evidence before LEWIS, J.

In the absence of any evidence as to when the impact fracture was caused which produced the bursting of the tyre, one can fairly say that it may have been caused at a variety of times. It may have been caused by the tyre striking some object immediately before the burst. It may have been caused by one severe blow some days or even weeks before, which fractured some of the plys and the damage gradually extended and produced the burst. It may possibly have been caused by two blows in the same place on the tyre at different times, neither of which were severe or such as were calculated to arouse any serious apprehension in the mind of a reasonable driver. On this aspect of the case the judge said :

I rule out any likelihood of the impact fracture having first occurred in the course of the last journey or at the time of the explosion. No one spoke of an impact and nothing was found in the road with which the wheel could have come into violent contact . . . The impact which caused the fracture must be found to have occurred on some earlier occasion and the defendants had done nothing about it, with the result that the 'bus was making this journey with a very defective tyre and in a dangerous condition as a passenger-carrying vehicle. The continued use of the tyre brought it nearer and nearer to bursting point . . . I think the probabilities are that inspection would have revealed the fracture of the cord in the case of a tyre so worn.

By "inspection," the learned judge presumably meant after removal of the tyre from the rim.

- B I think that the defendants, in order to avoid liability, must prove to the satisfaction of the court that they took all reasonable steps to ascertain that the tyre was fit for use on Feb. 27, and this I think on the evidence they failed to do. It may have been fit or it may not have been fit. The mere external examination of a tyre which had run 21,750 miles since Aug. 1, 1942, part of which was done on bad roads, driven by drivers who had had no instructions to report an unusual and heavy blow to the tyre, and without any examination of its internal surface during the whole of that time, seems to me to leave the defendants with the burden undischarged of satisfying the court that they had taken all reasonable steps to avoid this accident. With tyres of this size, the evidence was that it is very rare to have a burst and I, therefore, conclude that in the absence of any latent defect in this tyre (and this was not suggested), the fracture was caused by a serious and unusual blow, a blow which ought to have been reported by the driver. There is no record of any such report. If the blow had been reported, the tyre should have been examined externally and perhaps taken off the rim for examination of its interior surface. It is possible that two blows at different times may have combined to produce this dangerous condition of the tyre, but I do not think this is a reasonable explanation because the probabilities are so much against it. The judge rejected the idea and I am not prepared to disagree with him. There was a conflict of evidence as to the desirability of taking a tyre off and examining its interior surface after it had run 3,000 to 4,000 miles. The defendants' witnesses said that, unless there was some reason to take the tyre off the rim because of a puncture or suspected serious injury to the tyre or the inner tube, the safest course was to leave the tyre in situ, because of the risk of getting the inner tube pinched when the outer tyre was replaced. The judge came to no conclusion on this issue. I think the defendants were not required to make such an examination, provided the risk of an impact fracture and the necessity of reporting any serious blow to the tyre were impressed on the driver, and there was no external evidence on the tyre of such a blow.

- F The judge found the defendants liable on two heads. He first held Jenkins to blame because he did not cause the tyre to be condemned and replaced or, at any rate, to be removed and examined owing to the presence of a certain puncture or gaping hole in the outer tyre which was visible after the accident. G The defendants' evidence was that the puncture was caused by a nail. They also admitted that the nail which made such a hole would be very unlikely to be removed without some probe to pull it out. The judge based his decision as to Jenkins' negligence on the ground that this puncture appeared to be of old standing and from this he arrived at two decisions : (i) that Jenkins was negligent in not having repaired the puncture and in not causing the tyre to be taken off and examined internally ; (ii) the negligence of Jenkins in this respect H indicated that he might also have been negligent in failing to observe the mark of a severe blow on the exterior surface of the tyre such as might be calculated to produce an impact fracture. When the judge said that the puncture appeared to be of old standing, I think he meant that it appeared to him to be one which was of old standing at the time of the accident on Feb. 27, 1943. It is true that the judge saw the tyre four years afterwards, but the puncture, except for being washed and surveyed and exhibited at the previous trial, was in the same state as to actual size and condition at the date of this trial as it was in February, 1943, except in one respect. On the judge's finding the hole or puncture had not penetrated right through the outer tyre at the time of the burst. I have carefully examined the puncture and do not feel disposed to disagree with this conclusion of the judge as to its age. It is, of course, possible that the hole may have been made on the morning of Feb. 27, or on Feb. 26 or 25. It seems to me that here the burden of proof comes into play and I myself do not think that, having regard to the appearance of the hole, it is reasonable to hold that it was done then. If the matter is left in doubt, the defendants, in my view, fail to satisfy the court that the tyre by reason of this unrepaired condition was fit for use on this omnibus on the morning of Feb. 27. There was clear evidence that the hole rendered the tyre unfit for use, or, at any rate, one which should be examined internally before further use. Mr. Pannell, the defendants' chief engineer admitted that it was a very nasty gash in the tyre, and that a tyre fitter should certainly have put the tyre on one side for further attention. Another of the defendants' witnesses, Mr. Cooks, the service engineer of Goodyear Rubber Tyre Co., who had 400 motor omnibuses under his care in respect of their tyres, said that he would remove a tyre with such a puncture. Mr. Cowley, a tyre fitter employed by the defendants, admitted that a hole such as that now in the tyre should be at once reported, and that, if the hole had been there on Feb. 24, Jenkins should have taken the tyre off and examined it. Mr. Bourne, the defendants' foreman at the Llanelly garage, also agreed that, if the hole had been there on Feb. 24, Jenkins should have taken the tyre off and replaced it. I think that the judge was justified in holding that Jenkins was negligent in not having repaired the puncture. I do not, however, agree with the second conclusion of the judge that Jenkins also probably failed to observe the mark on the exterior surface of the tyre which was probably made at the same time as the impact fracture. The plaintiff at the trial relied on this puncture as being the cause of the impact fracture of the tyre, but during the hearing the outer tyre was cut open in the vicinity of the puncture and it then became apparent that there was no association between the puncture and the fractured cord, and the judge so found in his judgment. On this head of negligence, therefore, it seems to me that, if Jenkins had been careful in his work, he would have removed and examined the tyre before filling in the hole and he might then have detected the fractured plys of the cord. To that extent the defendants have not satisfied me that they through their agents took all reasonable steps to make and keep this tyre fit for use.

The second head on which the judge found that the defendants were negligent was one which formed no part of the plaintiff's case, but was evolved during the hearing because of the evidence as to the hidden danger of impact fractures. The practice suggested by the learned judge to the witnesses as desirable and eventually adopted in his judgment was that the owners should inform each driver of a public motor service vehicle of the nature of impact fractures, and should require them to report any blow to the tyre of such severity that a fracture might be caused. The learned judge considered that such a report would call for a removal of the tyre and an internal examination of the cord by sight and touch. If no weakness was revealed, then the nature of the impact could be more fully considered, and the tyre either passed as sound or another inspection arranged after an interval of use to see if further deterioration had set in. The judge accepted the evidence given by a representative of a large omnibus undertaking that this procedure was practical, but it was admitted that no such steps were taken by the defendants in this case. In the learned judge's view, if this practice had prevailed with the defendants and if, in consequence, Jenkins had been told that the tyre had received a severe impact, Jenkins should have condemned the tyre, having regard to its weakened state. A great weight of evidence, however, from experts and others intimately concerned with the motor omnibus business was given that such a system was impracticable and was not used by any company. I do not think that it would be right to find the defendants negligent because they had not given specific instructions to their drivers as to the risk of impact fracture, or as to the necessity of reporting any blow to a tyre which might reasonably be expected to produce such a fracture. I, therefore, do not agree with the finding of negligence by the learned judge under this head.

There is a further point against the defendants which was pressed on us by counsel for the plaintiff and which requires consideration. This double deck omnibus, fully loaded, was proceeding in the "black-out" along a narrow road (about 22ft. wide) and was rounding a left hand bend with a slight decline with houses on one side and an embankment on the other side. Its off front tyre was well worn, had run about 23,545 miles and was nearing the limit of 25,000 miles when it would go into the workshop for thorough examination. It had not been taken off for examination for nearly 18 months, during which time it had run about 21,750 miles. The driver at the time of the accident was proceeding in the "black-out" through a built-up area where the law required him under a penalty to proceed at a speed not exceeding 20 miles an hour. There is no positive finding by the judge as to what his actual speed was at the time of the burst. The judgment on this part of the case is as follows :

As the journey was undertaken in the black-out hours, the speed limit was 20 miles an hour in the built-up area which composed most of the route, and I feel no doubt that the 'bus travelled in excess of that on the average, and was probably doing more than that at the time of the bursting of the tyre, but probably not more than 25 or 26 miles an hour.

The learned judge in his judgment says that he does not think any accurate calculations of speed are possible but I do not see why this is so in this case. The material data are unusually precise. There was reliable evidence as to the total distance run from the factory to the place of the accident, viz., 5 miles 220 yards. The journey was divided into two distinct sectors. The first was 1½ miles along a private road, while the second, the remaining 3½ miles, was along a public road. There was reliable evidence that the total time taken was not more than 15 minutes. The omnibus left the factory just after 6.15 a.m., according to the driver who heard the factory hooter sound at 6.15 before he started. The result of the accident was that a wire attached to a telegraph pole, and broken by the omnibus in its career along the pavement, rang a fire bell at the fire station, at a time recorded in the official log there as 6.28. There is other reliable evidence that the accident occurred a little before 6.30. The first 1½ miles of the route was along a winding and rough road, about 12ft. wide, in which a local speed limit of 10 miles per hour was imposed by the Ministry of Supply. The driver admitted that it was a dangerous road with many curves and said that he was not doing more than 10 miles an hour along it. After getting on to the main road the omnibus was going through a built-up area except for 3/5ths of a mile. It had a governor which, if in use, cut out at 30 miles per hour and would be difficult to alter. In these circumstances, if one allows 8 minutes for the first 1½ miles along the narrow road, at an average speed of 10 miles and making no allowance for one stop to pick up passengers, that leaves 7 minutes for covering 3½ miles, an average speed of 32 miles an hour, again making no allowance for one stop to put down passengers. The omnibus, which was employed exclusively for the conveyance of workers from the factory and was not plying for hire, did not stop shortly before the accident, and there was only this 3/5ths of a mile in which the driver could go at more than 20 miles an hour without breaking the law. In any case his maximum speed was limited, or should have been limited by the governor, to 30 miles per hour. In these circumstances it seems to me almost inevitable that he was travelling throughout the journey from the time he joined the main road at a speed which was far in excess of that imposed by law on that type of omnibus in the "black-out," a speed which, in my opinion, was negligent. In my view, he was probably going at an excessive and negligent speed at the moment when the tyre burst. It is remarkable that the driver of the omnibus should be anxious to put his speed so low in his evidence, evidence which I think was untrue. I do not believe his evidence that the highest speed he reached on the trip was not more than 20 miles an hour, or that he was driving at a speed of 12 to 15 miles an hour at the time of the accident, or that the accident happened between 6.35 and 6.40 a.m.

The learned judge has not attached importance to the speed of the omnibus, because (i) no one has said that the speed caused the burst ; (ii) there was some evidence that at less speed the vehicle would have gone across the road and over the embankment sooner than it did ; (iii) the omnibus would not have been in any difficulty if the tyre had not burst ; (iv) the driver had no reason to anticipate that a tyre would burst so as to regulate his speed by reference to that possibility. With due respect to the learned judge, I am unable to agree with three of these reasons. As to (i), the expert evidence of the defendants was that, once an impact fracture has started, it tends to spread and that this tendency is increased by fast driving, specially of a heavily laden vehicle. As to (ii) it seems to me unreasonable to say that, if the omnibus had been proceeding at a proper speed, it would have struck the kerb at a broader angle and, therefore, would have fallen over the embankment sooner. If it had done so, it probably would not have fallen over on its side on to the railway trucks. The resistance of the kerb and of the railings would have tended to pull the omnibus up and it would probably not have fallen bodily over the embankment. I do not think that the omnibus would have diverged at a broader angle across the road if it had been going slower. It could only do this on the assumption that the steering wheel was forced more to the right and I see no reason for thinking that a slower speed would bring that about. As to (iv), it seems to me that, if impact fractures are accidents which are definite possibilities and have this characteristic that their presence cannot be detected until they have reached a dangerous state and the plys near the crown are affected, then it follows that the longer a tyre has been in use without careful examination of the crown after removing the tyre from the rim, the more risk there is that it may have developed an impact fracture. There was evidence that a worn tyre with no tread is more liable to get an impact fracture than a tyre with the tread not worn away. In these circumstances the driver of this fully laden double deck omnibus using this tyre ought to have been careful not to drive at an excessive speed. I think that the excessive speed on this journey directly contributed to the bursting of the tyre and it also contributed to the damage sustained by the omnibus and to the consequent death of the plaintiff's husband. It is surely the physical injury sustained by the dead man and not the mere bursting of the tyre which is the cause of action. In any case, I think it is for the defendants to satisfy the court on the evidence as a whole that the speed was not negligent, although it substantially exceeded the statutory speed limit, as I am satisfied that it did. I think that they quite failed to do so.

For these reasons, in my opinion, the defendants have not established that they, through their servants or agents, were not guilty of negligence whereby the plaintiff's husband lost his life, and she is not entitled to recover damages as awarded by the judge. On the contrary, I think that the plaintiff has established negligence against the defendants causing the death of her husband. I am in favour of dismissing this appeal.

SCOTT, L.J.: I have read the judgments of my brethren, and with that of ASQUITH, L.J. (which he will read presently) I entirely agree, including that part of it which deals with the defendants' application to us to allow the shorthand transcription of the evidence of Jenkins, given at the hearing of a previous trial of an action before LEWIS, J., to be put before the court. I have, indeed, read and re-read my brother BUCKNILL, L.J.'s judgment and have given the case the most anxious consideration, but in the end I find myself unable to accept either of his two final conclusions, namely, that the accident was caused by the negligence of the defendants in one or both of two ways: (i) by failure in their duty of tyre maintenance, and (ii) by the excessive speed at which the omnibus was being driven at the moment when the inner tube of the tyre burst and caused the omnibus to cross the road, run over the footway and capsized.

I agree that the mounting of the omnibus on the footpath was a fact which raised the presumption expressed in the phrase res ipsa loquitur. That phrase, however, represents nothing more than a prima facie presumption of fault. It is rebuttable by the same defence as is open to any defendant accused of negligence, against whom the plaintiff's evidence has made out a prima facie case. When the plaintiff has done that, the onus is said to shift to the defendant. In a case where res ipsa loquitur the onus starts on the defendant and requires him to prove affirmatively that he has exercised all reasonable care, but that proof is very greatly facilitated if he can show that the event which caused the plaintiff damage happened through some cause for which no blame can attach to him, even though it cannot be specifically identified, and, if it can be so identified, his task is not only facilitated but achieved. If he thus succeeds in demonstrating positively the probable operation of such cause, whether specifically identifiable or not, the onus is then discharged, and the presumption of fault on his part ceases and the plaintiff is left in the position of having failed to prove his case. Even if he can point to no specific cause, he still discharges it if he can show that he used all reasonable care. In the present appeal, however, there was before the mounting on to the footway an anterior link in the chain of causation, viz., the tyre-burst which diverted the omnibus from its course on the road on to the footway. I will assume with BUCKNILL, L.J., that the presumption of res ipsa loquitur is still applicable, notwithstanding the intervention of the new link in the chain of causation, although I feel by no means convinced that the prevention of a tyre-burst is within the control and management of an omnibus company in any sense or degree comparable with the case of the occupier of an upper floor in a warehouse with an open doorway in its external wall abutting on a public road, on to which a barrel, if not controlled, can roll out and fall. However, the observations which I have just made about the probative burden of the defendant in regard to the first presumption are equally applicable to the second. The precautions taken by them in tyre maintenance were reasonably careful, but a partial rupture of the inner cord (on which the power of resistance to pressure from the inflated tube depends) may happen in spite of all such precautions, and then gradually spread to the crown, without any external indication to sight or touch. The doctrine of res ipsa loquitur then goes out of the picture, and the court has to decide on the balance of proof on each side. In the present case the only positive proof of negligence attempted by the plaintiff was the expert's theory that the puncture caused the burst. That was completely disproved by the defendants and rejected by the judge, and the plaintiff was then left with the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur and nothing else.

I do not read LORD SIMONDS' observation [in Woods v. Duncan (3)] which my brother quotes, as in any way differing from that of ERLE, C.J. [in Scott v. London Dock Co. (2)] also quoted by him, and of the two the earlier and leading statement of the proposition is the more directly apposite to the aspect of the doctrine of proof which I am now discussing. How should the phrase of ERLE, C.J. (3 H. & C. 596, 601), "under the management of the defendant or his servants," be applied to the defendant company? Primarily, the servant "managing" the omnibus was its driver, but against him there can be no complaint unless it be bad driving. As against him there is a serious charge of "excessive" speed, having regard to the character of the road—its surface, gradient and curve—and the defendants would be liable if the driving, being thus bad, thereby caused the burst. That, however, is a totally separate question and to introduce it into the issue whether some other servant of the defendants to whom the duty of tyre maintenance was remitted was guilty of negligence would cause confusion of thought. I, therefore, entirely concur in the separation by BUCKNILL, L.J., of the speed issue from the question of tyre maintenance.

In relation to maintenance there are, in my opinion, only two topics which on the totality of evidence stand out as calling for consideration. One is the contention for the plaintiff that the company was negligent in not instructing all its drivers to report on every occasion when they felt an unusually violent bump by a wheel against something in the road—whether projecting above its surface or a pot-hole in its surface. This must be a matter of degree, and I read the evidence as indicating that the drivers would normally regard it as their duty to report if anything really abnormal occurred. BUCKNILL, L.J., has dealt with that suggestion of a negligent failure to instruct drivers and I agree entirely with him that any effective rule about reporting was wholly impracticable. Tyres cannot be taken on and off like an overcoat. It is obviously not a practical business proposition to call for tyre-removal unless there is some patent reason for suspecting something wrong with the particular tyre, and it was shown conclusively in evidence that an impact fracture to one or even several of the numerous plies which make up the cord may occur without any indication of the internal injury showing externally whilst the tyre remains on the wheel. Indeed, even if it is taken off, there will in all probability be nothing disclosed in the crown then exposed to view, unless the fracture has extended through the many plies to the crown or, at least, to the ply next to it, and even then the indication will not be visible, but only manifest to the sense of touch, by a possible yielding to pressure from the fingers. I agree with the conclusion of BUCKNILL, L.J., that there was nothing negligent in the defendants' system of tyre maintenance.

The second topic for consideration is one which was raised by the puncture or "gaping hole," observed in the tyre on examination after the accident. The plaintiff's case below, as put forward by her expert, was that this puncture was the cause of the burst, but that case was completely disproved and rejected by the learned judge. Nevertheless, my brother BUCKNILL, L.J., treats it as having indirectly caused the burst. His reasoning is based on three steps : A
(i) that its present appearance, as seen by us, is identical with its appearance as seen by the learned judge ; (ii) that it had been caused before Jenkins examined the tyre on Feb. 24, 1943, and then had the same external appearance as when the learned judge saw it ; and finally (iii) that Jenkins was negligent in not forbidding any further use of the tyre, pending removal and examination of it when detached from the wheel—in short, that Jenkins was negligent in (a) failing to see it, B or (b) in failing to remove the tyre from the wheel for inspection, and (c) allowing the tyre to continue in use. I cannot agree with these conclusions, for I think that they really depend on tacit assumptions which are not justified. Two dominant facts about the hole were proved : (i) that on examination of the tyre detached from the wheel, soon after the accident, it was found that the hole did not reach right through the 12 plies of which the cord was composed, but ended somewhere short of the crown—in other words, that it penetrated less than the full inch of the thickness of the cord. Therefore, it may have been a comparatively short nail or other iron or steel thing which penetrated. What it was, must be mere conjecture. The second important fact is that at a later post-accident date, soon after the first examination had definitely ascertained the limited depth of penetration, it was found that the hole had been enlarged in depth and then showed right through the crown, i.e., the innermost ply, which meant that somebody of the various persons, who properly or improperly D may have been examining the hole, had forced a tool right through. That it had never (before removal) reached the crown was certain, because, if it had, there would have been a puncture of the tube lying against the crown or at least a mark on it, and there was none. I, therefore, think that we must infer that the appearance of the external orifice which impressed both the learned judge and BUCKNILL, L.J., was brought about either by the tool, which was improperly so used as to lengthen the hole, or by sheer stupid fiddling with the orifice by somebody interested and, perhaps, merely inquisitively meddling after the accident. These reflections cause me to conclude that there is nothing like a balance of probability that the "appearance" in question was present on Feb. 24 when the last pre-accident examination took place. If I am right, Jenkins missed nothing on Feb. 24. E of probability that the defendants were guilty of negligence in the maintenance of this tyre. As far as I can judge, their system seems to have been in all relevant ways careful and efficient.

On the issue whether excessive speed caused the burst, in spite of the powerful exposition of BUCKNILL, L.J., of the evidential case against the driver in respect of average speed, I cannot agree that his speed at the critical moment is proved to have been excessive. Still less can I accept it as proved that the speed of the omnibus either caused, or contributed to causing the burst. I accept the calculation of BUCKNILL, L.J., and, therefore, assume that the average speed was over 32 miles per hour with the consequence that over the whole distance covered at that average speed the driver was guilty of a statutory breach of duty. But it does not follow that the disaster was caused by that breach. G
Three separate issues are involved in the question of causation. The first is H what the driver's speed was on the particular few yards of road covered by the omnibus in the second or two just before the burst deflected his course from his proper side of the road. The evidence of his passengers who were called was on the balance against the inference that at that moment they noticed any sign of excessive speed. The second is whether that speed, whatever it was at the moment before the burst, was reasonably likely to be the cause, or a contributing cause, of the burst. If the wheel at that very moment had struck some substantial obstacle in the road, the causal nexus might well have been inferred, but immediately after the accident the road was inspected with great care and not the faintest evidence was forthcoming as to any projection or even pot-hole being observed on the surface over which the off-side wheels had run just before reaching the point on the road where the two dark lines began which remained visible on the road and, by common agreement, had been caused by the rims of the wheel or by some part of the omnibus itself after the deflation of the tyre through the sudden bursting of the inner tube had altered the direction of its course. This evidence seems to me to eliminate all possibility of the wheel having run into or against any fixed obstacle, contact with which might, if the speed at that moment was excessive, have produced the burst under the dynamic force of the blow. Accordingly, although the average speed on the mileage covered was excessive, the facts in evidence seem to me inconsistent with any inference that the burst which deflected the omnibus was caused through the driver driving too fast.

The third issue is entirely separate and alternative to the first two. There was a suggestion, that, even if excessive speed did not cause the burst, it may yet have caused the disaster, because, on this theory, the omnibus, if at a lower speed, would have stopped short of the footway, or not plunged over the embankment. My answer to that contention for the plaintiff is that it must be considered in its relation to the finding of this court on the prior issue of negligence in relation to the burst, and, if I am right in my conclusion that the plaintiff fails on that issue, the alternative allegation of negligent speed must be judged wholly apart from the disproved allegation of speed having caused or contributed to the causing of the burst. Let me, therefore, assume that the burst had been the result of some latent defect in the manufacture of the tyre itself, which it was impossible to diagnose—just as if it had been a defect discoverable only by the eye of an X-ray before X-ray vision had been invented. On that hypothesis there was nothing to put the defendants or their driver on guard against the hidden danger, and, equally, there was no relevant act of negligence on the part of the driver in ignoring the risk of a road obstruction (because ex hypothesi there was none). On those premises the burst goes out of the picture altogether. How in such circumstances can he be blamed?

On the question of admissibility of the transcript of certain evidence taken from a shorthand-note at the former trial, to which BUCKNILL, L.J., makes reference, I entirely agree with the statement by ASQUITH, L.J., in his judgment on that matter. In the result, I think that the defendants' appeal should succeed.

ASQUITH, L.J. : The position as to onus of proof in this case seems to me to be fairly summarised in the following short propositions. (i) If the defendants' omnibus leaves the road and falls down an embankment, and this without more is proved, then res ipsa loquitur, there is a presumption that the event is caused by negligence on the part of the defendants, and the plaintiff succeeds unless the defendants can rebut this presumption. (ii) It is no rebuttal for the defendants to show, again without more, that the immediate cause of the omnibus leaving the road is a tyre-burst, since a tyre-burst per se is a neutral event consistent, and equally consistent, with negligence or due diligence on the part of the defendants. When a balance has been tilted one way, you cannot redress it by adding an equal weight to each scale. The depressed scale will remain down. This is the effect of the decision in Laurie v. Raglan Building Co., Ltd. (1), where not a tyre-burst but a skid was involved. (iii) To displace the presumption, the defendants must go further and prove (or it must emerge from the evidence as a whole) either (a) that the burst itself was due to a specific cause which does not connote negligence on their part but points to its absence as more probable, or (b), if they can point to no such specific cause, that they used all reasonable care in and about the management of their tyres: Woods v. Duncan, The Thetis (3). The second limb, (b), of the last proposition is the relevant one for the purposes of this case. I think that this summary accords both with the more detailed analysis in the judgment of BUCKNILL, L.J., and with the views expressed in slightly different language by SCOTT, L.J.

If this is, in truth, the burden on the defendants, I am of opinion, for the reasons which are given at length by SCOTT, L.J., and which I will not restate, that they have discharged it. Out of respect, however, for the judgment of BUCKNILL, L.J., with whom I have the misfortune to differ on this part of the case, I will briefly summarise the grounds of my disagreement. Negatively, I do not think the defendants fail to discharge the onus on them by reason only that it is certain that during the omnibus's last journey the driver on the average materially exceeded the legal speed limit, because there is, in my view, and as SCOTT, L.J., has pointed out, no evidence that this excessive speed caused the burst, or thereby the accident, or that it prevailed immediately before the accident. Nor do I think they so fail by reason of the existence of the puncture as a circumstance, which, while admittedly it did not cause the burst, should have put them on inquiry and caused an internal examination of the cover. Such an examination might, in any event, have revealed nothing, as impact fractures are often symptomless. The puncture may have occurred between Feb. 24 and 27—after Jenkins' last examination of the tyre. I do not see how the learned judge, examining the puncture more than four years after it was caused, (and after it had, admittedly, been teased and probed and deepened by the insertion of instruments), could possibly say in July, 1947, what it looked like just after the accident on Feb. 27, 1943, or how long before the accident on Feb. 27, 1943, it occurred. It may have occurred on the fatal journey itself. Affirmatively, it seems to me that the defendants have discharged the burden on them by proving that they observed a reasonable system of inspection in regard to their tyres. It seems to me to be a reasonable system to examine internally tyres, whose life on good roads extends to 100,000 miles, every 25,000 miles when they have been running on fairly bad roads such as these—unless some special need is proved for examining them internally before 25,000 have been run. None such has, in my view, been proved to have occurred in this case. For these reasons, together with those stated by SCOTT, L.J., I am of opinion that the defendants have discharged the onus on them and that the appeal should be allowed.

I would add a few observations on another point. Counsel for the defendants pressed the court to admit in evidence testimony given by one Jenkins in proceedings arising from the same accident, but with a different plaintiff, and tried before LEWIS, J., in 1943. Jenkins, a tyre tester or fitter employed by the defendants, died in 1945, between that trial and the trial of the present case. Counsel based his application on two grounds, of which the chief was that the testimony was made admissible in the present case by the Evidence Act, 1938, s. 1. Section 1 (1) provides :

In any civil proceedings where direct oral evidence of a fact would be admissible, any statement made by a person in a document and tending to establish that fact shall, on production of the original document, be admissible . . .

Counsel had first to establish that the testimony he sought to have admitted was a "statement made by a person in a document" within s. 1 (1). Who is "the person" and what is the "document" in this case? The "document" can only be the transcript of the evidence. The "person" must be either (a) the dead man, Jenkins, or (b) the maker of the typed transcript of the evidence. I will call him for short "the reporter." Alternative (a) (apart, altogether, from the artificiality of describing a witness whose evidence is taken down and embodied in a transcript as a person "making a statement in a document") is ruled out by the express terms of s. 1 (4), which provides as follows :

For the purposes of this section, a statement in a document shall not be deemed to have been made by a person unless the document or the material part thereof was written, made or produced by him with his own hand, or was signed or initialled by him or otherwise recognised by him in writing as one for the accuracy of which he is responsible.

In the present case none of these conditions was fulfilled. The deceased, Jenkins, was not the maker or producer with his own hand of the transcript, nor is there any evidence that he signed or initialled it, or vouched for its accuracy in writing. (The case might have been otherwise, obviously, if his evidence had been in a signed deposition). Alternative (b) is that the "person" making a "statement" in the "document" is the "reporter"—the maker of the transcript. If this contention is otherwise well founded, it is not barred, like the first alternative, by s. 1 (4), since the transcriber "makes or produces" the transcript "with his own hand." Is it otherwise sound? The defendants say it is, by reason of the terms of s. 1 (1) (i) (b), which is as follows :

(i) if the maker of the statement . . . (b) where the document in question is or forms part of a record purporting to be a continuous record, made the statement (in so far as the matters dealt with thereby are not within his personal knowledge) in the performance of a duty to record information supplied to him by a person who had, or might reasonably be supposed to have, personal knowledge of those matters.

It was argued that within the language of this provision the transcript is a "document" and a document which is a "continuous record," that the transcript writer made a "statement" in this "document," and in so doing was performing a duty to record information supplied to him, viz., Jenkins' evidence, and that Jenkins was "a person who had, or might reasonably be supposed to have, personal knowledge of" the matters dealt with in the statement.

In support of his submission that the facts of this case fall within s. 1 (1) (i) (b) of the Act of 1938, counsel cited Edmonds v. Edmonds (5), a decision of this court and binding on us, and Bullock v. Borrett (6), a decision of FINLAY, L.J., sitting as an additional judge of the King's Bench Division. In Edmonds v. Edmonds (5) a husband was bringing divorce proceedings against his wife in England on the ground of her adultery with the co-respondent in India which the husband alleged had resulted in the birth of an illegitimate child there. In India the wife had brought bastardy proceedings against the co-respondent in respect of the illegitimate child. In the Indian proceedings, a Mrs. Ingles had given evidence which supported the wife's claim and hence the hypothesis of the wife's adultery. This evidence was given on commission and taken down by a commissioner who signed the document. The Court of Appeal held that the document so signed, recording Mrs. Ingles' evidence, was admissible in the English suit for divorce by virtue of s. 1 (1) (i) (b). The Court of Appeal undoubtedly took the view that evidence given before the commissioner in the Indian proceedings could answer the description of "information supplied" to such commissioner within s. 1 (1) (i) (b), for the purpose of its admissibility in the English proceedings. There are, however, it seems to us, two important distinctions between the facts of that case and those of the present. In that case the evidence was held to be "information supplied" to the maker of the document, the maker of the document being the commissioner—the court. To say that evidence given in court is information "supplied to" the court seems to us an entirely different thing from saying, as we are invited to say in this case, that evidence given in court is information supplied to the reporter. If a man dictates a letter giving information to the person to whom he is writing, it is an abuse of language to say that he is engaged in "supplying information" to his shorthand typist. But there is a further ground of distinction. There is no suggestion in the report of Edmonds v. Edmonds (5) that Mrs. Ingles was in any way interested in the result of either the Indian or the English proceedings. It is clear, on the other hand, that Jenkins was a "person interested" in the result of the 1943 action and would, if he had lived, have been interested in the result of the present proceedings, which were instituted before those which came to trial in 1943. His reputation as a tyre-tester was involved, and, apart from that, he was interested as an employee in his employers winning the case: see Plomien Fuel Economiser Co., Ltd. v. National Marketing Co. (7).

Section 1 (3) of the Evidence Act, 1938, is as follows :

Nothing in this section shall render admissible as evidence any statement made by a person interested at a time when proceedings were pending or anticipated involving a dispute as to any fact which the statement might tend to establish.

It was argued in answer to this objection that, where sub-s. (3) speaks of "any statement made by a person," the "person" spoken of is not the person whose evidence is reported (Jenkins), but the person reporting it—in other words, that the word "person" in sub-s. (3) is the same "person" as in sub-s. (1), viz., in this case, "the reporter," and that the reporter is not a "person interested." On consideration, in spite of the similarity of the phrases employed in the two sub-sections, we do not think so narrow a construction can prevail. We think in sub-s. (3) "a person" means any person whatsoever provided he is interested. On the narrower construction the mere accidental interposition of a shorthand writer would let in statements of interested parties whose evidence, because interested, the Act intended to exclude, and sub-s. (3) would be largely stultified. Bullock v. Borrett (6), the other case relied on by counsel for the defendants is easily distinguishable, and, though commanding the respect due to the learned Lord Justice who decided it sitting in the King's Bench Division, is not binding on this court. The construction of the Evidence Act, 1938, is not free from difficulties, but, in our view, the evidence sought to be admitted is not let in by its provisions.

Counsel for the defendants relied as a subsidiary argument on the fact that at the trial of this case there were put to a witness (in one question at least) views which cross-examining counsel suggested Jenkins had expressed in the earlier trial. Counsel for the defendants relied on the rule that, if a part of a document is read by one side, the whole of the text of it must, if the other side insist, also be read. We do not think that the operation of that rule, assuming it otherwise applicable, is attracted in every case in which counsel cites to a witness A statements given by a witness B in previous proceedings, and says to A, "Do you agree?" No objection seems to have been made to these questions at the time, nor, at the time, was any application made to let in the rest of Jenkins' evidence. We are of opinion that on neither ground can the evidence in question be let in.

Appeal allowed with costs.

HAMPS v. DARBY.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Greene, M.R., Wrottesley and Evershed, L.JJ.), July 19, 1948.]

Animal—Pigeon—Homing pigeon—Spoiling crops—Right to kill—Property in pigeon.

The plaintiff, the owner of certain homing and racing pigeons, released them for exercise, and they alighted on the defendant's land and fed on his growing peas. To protect the peas the defendant shot at the birds, killing four and wounding one. In an action by the plaintiff for damages for the destruction of and injury to the pigeons, the defendant contended that there could be no property in homing pigeons, and, even assuming that there could be such a property, the destruction and wounding of the plaintiff's birds was justified.

HELD: (i) so long as the birds retained an animus revertendi the plaintiff could claim a special property in them, the appropriate form of action for him to take in respect of their destruction or wounding being trespass to goods.

Dewell v. Sanders (1618) (Cro. Jac. 490; 2 Roll. Rep. 3), criticised and explained.

(ii) there was evidence to support the finding of the county court judge that the defendant had failed to prove that there were no practicable means other than shooting of stopping the birds doing damage to his crops or that he had acted reasonably in regarding the shooting as necessary to protect the crops, and, therefore, the plaintiff was entitled to succeed.

APPEAL by the defendant from an order of His Honour JUDGE LAWSON CAMPBELL made at Peterborough County Court on Feb. 9, 1948, awarding damages to the plaintiff whose pigeons had been destroyed by the defendant while they were feeding on his (the defendant's) peas. The Court of Appeal, in dismissing the appeal, held that so long as there was evidence of an animus revertendi by the birds the plaintiff retained a property in them and that there was evidence that the defendant had not considered alternative methods of scaring the birds before shooting at them.

July 19. LORD GREENE, M.R. : The judgment which is about to be read is that of EVERSHED, L.J., and myself.

The following judgments were read.

EVERSHED, L.J. : This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment and order of His Honour JUDGE LAWSON CAMPBELL sitting in the Peterborough County Court whereby he awarded a sum of £200 to the plaintiff as damages for the destruction and wounding by the defendant of certain homing pigeons of which the plaintiff claimed the ownership and possession. It appeared that the plaintiff was a breeder of homing pigeons which he kept for the purpose, among other things, of racing. It also appeared that it was the practice of the plaintiff at certain times of the day to release his pigeons from his dovecote for exercise. On May 22, 1947, at about mid-day, the plaintiff, according to his custom, released nine of such pigeons. The pigeons, in the course either of their outward or of their homeward journey, alighted on a field of the defendant and proceeded to feed on his peas. The defendant thereupon shot at the birds. Four of them he killed. A fifth was wounded in the neck, but made its way home. It is a significant point in the case (to which we later refer) that the defendant fired altogether five shots, four, according to an independent witness, in close succession, and the fifth after an interval. As the defendant was using an ordinary double-barrelled sporting gun, it follows that he had been able to reload twice.

Counsel for the defendant has put his case on alternative grounds. First, he says that by the law of England there is no property in homing, racing or tamed pigeons when out of their dovecote or loft such as will entitle the proprietor of the dovecote or loft to maintain an action for trespass or otherwise against him who has shot the birds. Secondly, he says that, assuming such a right of property, the destruction and wounding of the plaintiff's birds by the defendant was, in fact, justified on the principle recently expounded by this court in regard to the shooting of dogs in Cresswell v. Sirl (1).

On the first point, although, as later appears, there can be found several statements in authoritative text-books, no case has been discovered in which the question has been directly the subject of a decision of the court. In these circumstances, counsel for the defendant has strongly relied on the observations contained in Dewell v. Sanders (2). The material part of the report, which is found at the end, following the word "Note," is as follows :

Note, that in the argument of this case, DODERIDGE, J., said, that if pigeons come upon my land I may kill them, and the owner hath not any remedy ; but the owner of the land is to take heed that he take them not by any mean prohibited by the statutes : to which opinion CROKE and HOUGHTON accorded. But MONTAGUE, C.J., held the contrary, and that the party hath jus proprietatis in them, for they are as domestics, and have animus revertendi, and ought not to be killed ; and for the killing of them an action lies ; but the other opinion is the best.

From this note it is made clearly to appear that, in the opinion of three out of four of the judges concerned in the case, tamed or homing pigeons passed out of the property or possession of the proprietor of their dovecote and become nullius in terra as soon as they had, on their release, taken wing, and this effect is ascribed to the case by DR. GLANVILLE-WILLIAMS in his book on ANIMALS, though the author expresses the view that it is incorrect and against the weight of other authority : see p. 252. On the other hand, as counsel for the defendant observes, the opinions attributed to the majority of the judges in CROKE'S REPORT have never been adversely criticised in any case which has, during the period of over 300 years since Dewell v. Sanders (2) was decided, come before the courts. In the circumstances, it has been necessary to examine Dewell v. Sanders (2) somewhat closely.

It may, in the first place, be observed that the observations in the note which we have quoted were obiter. The facts in Dewell v. Sanders (2) were that a court leet had imposed a fine on the proprietor of a dovecote, the freeholder of the manor, on the ground that a common nuisance had been created by its erection, and, the fine not having been paid, distress had been levied on the proprietor's assets. The proprietor proceeded to challenge the validity of the distress, and the real question in Dewell v. Sanders (2) was whether the court leet had any jurisdiction to make the award which it had made. The court answered the question in the negative. In answering that question, it became relevant for the court to consider whether the erection or maintenance of a dovecote could amount either to a public or private nuisance, but, in our opinion, it is clear that the general question whether a man could have any jus proprietatis in flying pigeons was strictly irrelevant to the issue raised. For that reason, no doubt, the observations relied on by the defendant are contained, not in the report of the decision of the court itself, but in a note appended to the decision. In our opinion, it is at the least doubtful whether, in fact, the report in CROKE accurately records the views expressed by the majority of the judges. Counsel for the plaintiff has drawn our attention to the further report (in the Norman French language) of the same case in 2 Roll. Rep. From this report it appears that the observation of DODERIDGE, J., to the effect that the pigeon when away from the dovecote could be lawfully destroyed was subject to the important qualification that it was at the time doing damage, and both DODERIDGE, J., and HOUGHTON, J., refer to the existence in the register of forms of writ appropriate to a claim for damages in respect of tamed pigeons when flying abroad. According to the report in 2 Roll. Rep., CROKE, J., alone—who was the editor of the reports bearing his name—propounded the view that tamed pigeons became nullius bona when away from their dovecote. In our view, therefore, Dewell v. Sanders (2) cannot be regarded as providing reliable, still less convincing, authority for the view that no such right of property can exist in homing pigeons when in flight away from their loft as would support an action for damages for their destruction.

Counsel for the defendant has further prayed in aid the terms of the Larceny Act, 1861, s. 23, and certain decisions on that section. The terms of s. 23 are as follows:

Whosoever shall unlawfully and wilfully kill, wound, or take any house dove or pigeon under such circumstances as shall not amount to larceny at common law, shall, on conviction before a justice of the peace, forfeit and pay, over and above the value of the bird, any sum not exceeding £2.

The first case under the section came before BLACKBURN, J., and MELLOR, J., in Taylor v. Newman (3). In that case CROKE's report of Dewell v. Sanders (2) was cited. For present purposes the main significance of Taylor v. Newman (3) lies in that BLACKBURN, J., after stating that it had been a matter of doubt whether there could be any right of property in homing pigeons on the wing, indicated his acceptance of the opinion ascribed by CROKE to the majority of the judges in Dewell v. Sanders (2). The prosecution in Taylor v. Newman (3), in fact, failed, and in the later cases in which Taylor v. Newman (3) was considered (that is, Hudson v. MacRae (4), Horton v. Gwynne (5), Farey v. Welch (6), and Cotterill v. Penn (7)), there has been considerable discussion of the true grounds of the decision. In the first of them BLACKBURN, J., himself expressed the view that it was based on the proposition that flying pigeons, being ferae naturae, were not the subject of common law larceny, as the carrying off of a dog was not. In the last case, HEWART, C.J., said that the report must be regarded as unsatisfactory, and there is no doubt that since the date when Taylor v. Newman (3) was decided there has been considerable difficulty in determining its true ratio decidendi. As regards BLACKBURN, J.'s exposition of his former decision, we may observe that the terms of s. 23 of the Act of 1861 appear clearly to proceed on the basis that homing pigeons (even when abroad) may be the subject of common law larceny. Had Parliament supposed, on the authority of the note to CROKE's report of Dewell v. Sanders (2) or otherwise, that flying pigeons could in no circumstances be larcenable, we cannot help thinking that the section would have been differently worded. We may further observe that the question whether a bird or an animal is larcenable is wholly distinct from the question whether a right of property may subsist in it for the purposes of maintaining a civil action. In this respect BLACKBURN, J.'s reference, by way of comparison, to the dog was not, perhaps, a happy one. For the dog is certainly not ferae naturae. It is true that it could not be the subject of common law larceny, but that was because it was thought to be of no value for food or for profit. Beyond doubt, the owner of the dog had a right of property in it and could sue in the civil courts in respect of its loss. In our judgment, consideration of the question of liability for larceny is by no means necessarily pertinent to the question of property. If, in the present case, the decisions on the Larceny Act lend any support to the defendant's argument, it must be on the ground, not only that the decision in Taylor v. Newman (3) was rightly explained in the later case by BLACKBURN, J., but that the basis of the decision was the absence of any proprietary interest in pigeons flying abroad, and, if that be the basis, then, as clearly appears from the judgment of BLACKBURN, J., in Taylor v. Newman (3), it rests and depends on the validity of the note to Dewell v. Sanders (2) in CROKE's report. Apart from the doubts which on other grounds have later been cast on the soundness of the decision in Taylor v. Newman (3), its basis (on this view of it) would, in any event, be destroyed if the authority of CROKE's note is successfully challenged. It comes back again, therefore, to the same point with which we have already dealt.

It follows, in our view, that the cases on which counsel for the defendant has relied are of doubtful authority for the proposition for which he has cited them. On the other hand, there is, in my judgment, compelling authority to the opposite effect. In Dewell v. Sanders (2) (2 Roll. Rep.) itself there is a reference to BRACON to the effect that proprietorship in tamed pigeons remains so long as they retain in fact an animus revertendi to the control of the proprietor of their dovecote "columbae nostrae sunt eo habent animos revertendi." The matter is, moreover, treated at length in BLACKSTONE'S COMMENTARIES, Vol. II, at p. 391 :

A qualified property may subsist in animals ferae naturae, per industriam hominis : by a man's reclaiming and making them tame by art, industry, and education ; or by so confining them within his own immediate power, that they cannot escape and use their natural liberty.

and a little later on :

... our law apprehends the most obvious distinction to be, between such animals as we generally see tame, and are therefore seldom, if ever, found wandering at large, which it calls domitae naturae ; and such creatures as are usually found at liberty, which are therefore supposed to be more emphatically ferae naturae, though it may happen that the latter shall be sometimes tamed and confined by the art and industry of man. Such as are deer in a park, hares or rabbits in an enclosed warren, doves in a dovehouse, pheasants or partridges in a mew, hawks that are fed and commanded by their owner, and fish in a private pond or in trunks. These are no longer the property of a man, than while they continue in his keeping or actual possession : but, if at any time they regain their natural liberty, his property instantly ceases, unless they have animus revertendi, which is only to be known by their usual custom of returning . . . The law therefore extends this possession farther than the mere manual occupation ; for my tame hawk that is pursuing his quarry in my presence, though he is at liberty to go where he pleases, is nevertheless my property ; for he hath animus revertendi. So are my pigeons, that are flying at a distance from their home (especially those of the carrier kind) and likewise the deer that is chased out of my park or forest, and is instantly pursued by the keeper or forester ; all which remain still in my possession, and I still preserve my qualified property in them, but if they stray without my knowledge, and do not return in the usual manner, it is then lawful for any stranger to take them.

Then, again, a little later :

In all these creatures, reclaimed from the wildness of their nature, the property is not absolute, but defeasible ; a property, that may be destroyed if they resume their ancient wildness, and are found at large. For if the pheasants escape from the mew, or the fishes from the trunk, and are seen wandering at large in their proper element, they become ferae naturae again ; and are free and open to the first occupant that has ability to seize them. But while they thus continue my qualified or defeasible property, they are as much under the protection of the law, as if they were absolutely and indefeasibly mine : and an action will lie against any man that detains them from me, or unlawfully destroys them.

Reference may also be made to SIR WILLIAM HOLDSWORTH'S HISTORY OF ENGLISH LAW, vol. 7, p. 489 :

But it is clear from an early date (perhaps under the influence of Roman Law) it was recognised that property could exist in animals ferae naturae which had been tamed. and later on the same page the learned author observes :

BROOKE, J., pointed out (in the Year Book, 12 H. VIII, Trin. Pl. 3) that the fact that such animals were not the subject of larceny did not prevent them from being the subject of private ownership, if they were in any way useful to mankind.

And after a reference to our first father Adam, the citation proceeds :

. . . and when I have taken fowls and by my industry have made them tame through the restraint on their liberty, now I have a special property in them, because they are made obedient to me by my labour, and then it is not lawful for anyone to take them . . . For if I have a singing bird, though it be not pecuniarily profitable, yet it refreshes my spirits and gives me good health, which is a greater treasure than great riches. So if any-one takes it from me he does me much damage for which I shall have an action.

But, if it is established that there may be a special property in tamed or reclaimed pigeons, there remains the question, what form of action may be maintained in respect of them ? In the report at 2 Roll. Rep. of Dewell v. Sanders (2), reference is made to the forms of action, to be found in the register, available to the proprietor of tamed pigeons, and these are mentioned by DR. GLANVILLE WILLIAMS in note (2) on p. 248 of his book. From these references, it is, in our judgment, clear that the proper form of action in such a case as the present is that of trespass to goods, for, so long as the bird, in fact, retains its animus revertendi to the proprietor's dovecote, it is deemed to be in the proprietor's possession. The point is clearly and concisely stated in POLLOCK & WRIGHT ON POSSESSION IN THE COMMON LAW, at p. 231, in the following terms :

The animal once tame or reclaimed may continue in a man's possession although it fly or run abroad at its will if it is in the habit of returning regularly to a place where it is under his complete control. Such habit is commonly called animus revertendi.

It follows, therefore, in our judgment, that the owner of tamed or reclaimed pigeons continues to have property in and possession of his birds after they have flown from his dovecote, so long as the birds retain in fact an animus revertendi to his control. In the present case it was, in our judgment, clearly proved—and the learned county court judge held—that such animus revertendi subsisted in the pigeons which the defendant shot. The plaintiff is, therefore, in our view, entitled prima facie to maintain his action in respect of their destruction and wounding. The first ground relied on by the defendant, therefore, fails.

There remains, however, the second question, whether the defendant, though prima facie liable for the destruction of and damage to the plaintiff's property, can justify the action which he took. If we are right in our conclusion on the first point, it is conceded that the test to be applied is the same as that applicable to the destruction of other animals in the possession and proprietorship of another—the test recently laid down by this court in the case of a dog in Cresswell v. Sirl (1). The learned county court judge quoted the relevant passage in the judgment of this court which formulates the test, and it is convenient to quote it again in this judgment. SCOTT, L.J., said ([1947] 2 All E.R. 730, 733) :

We think the relevant rules of law may be thus stated : (1) The onus of proof is on the defendant to justify the preventive measure of shooting the attacking dogs. (2) He has by proof to establish two propositions, but each proposition may be established in either of two ways : Proposition No. 1 : That at the time of shooting, the dog was either (a) actually (in the above sense) attacking the animals in question, or (b) if left at large, would renew the attack so that the animals would be left presently subject to real and imminent danger unless renewal was prevented. Proposition No. 2 : That either (a) there was, in fact, no practicable means, other than shooting, of stopping the present attack or preventing such renewal, or (b) that the defendant, having regard to all the circumstances in which he found himself, acted reasonably in regarding the shooting as necessary for the protection of the animals against attack or renewed attack.

His Honour's judgment then proceeded as follows :

A Can the defendant in the present case sustain this onus which lies on him ? I do not think he can. It is true that at the moment of shooting the pigeons were on the ground and feeding on the crop so that the defendant establishes proposition (i), but I think he fails to establish either limb of proposition (ii). The view I formed, not only from the evidence given by the defendant but from the way he gave it, was that he never directed his mind at all to the question whether the pigeons were tame or wild or whether there was any practicable way of getting them off the crops other than shooting them. He had seen pigeons on this field before and realised there would result some damage to his crops, and he shot without further consideration. He has, in my view, entirely failed to establish shooting as the only practicable means and I think a reasonably careful man would have made at least some examination to discover whether the birds were wild or not and would, unless clearly satisfied they were wild, have tried the effect of a scaring shot before killing the birds as an ultimate resort. I was informed, and accept, that there is no great difficulty in distinguishing between wild and homing pigeons in a good light and at fairly close range, both of which advantages the defendant had.

B There can be no doubt that prima facie the questions which the learned judge posed and answered are questions of fact, and prima facie his findings cannot be challenged in this court, but counsel for the defendant has sought to persuade us to depart from the general rule on one or both of the grounds which are open to him in this court, namely, that the judge misdirected himself as a matter of law and that there was no evidence on which his conclusions could be supported. He summarised his argument in the course of his reply as follows : First, that there was no evidence that the defendant had not directed his mind to the question whether there was any other practicable way of protecting his property ; secondly, that the uncontradicted evidence of the defendant as to his having shouted at the birds was not found by the judge to be untrue and there was no evidence that any other form of noise—particularly a scaring shot—was likely to have been more effective to drive the birds away ; and, thirdly, that the finding of unreasonable conduct on the defendant's part was vitiated by the introduction of the irrelevant question : Had the defendant been unreasonable in not trying first to observe whether the birds were wild or tame ? On one or other of these grounds counsel for the defendant contended that the case ought to be remitted to the county court for re-hearing.

E Now, at the time when the action was heard, the decision of this court in Cresswell v. Sirl (1) had not been given. A full report of the case and of the judgment had, however, been published (in the ALL ENGLAND LAW REPORTS) before the county court judge gave his judgment in the present case, and, as appears from his judgment, there is no doubt that he considered and purported to apply the tests which Cresswell v. Sirl (1) laid down. Counsel for the defendant has, nevertheless, argued that, since Cresswell v. Sirl (1) had not been decided at the date of the trial, it cannot fairly be said that the evidence and arguments were properly directed at the trial to what have since been shown to be the real questions for determination. We do not think this criticism can be sustained. There is no doubt from the pleadings and the judge's notes that on this part of the case both evidence and argument were directed to the general question whether the defendant could justify what he had done, and this general question necessarily involved consideration of practicable alternatives and reasonableness on the defendant's part. When the learned judge came to deliver his judgment and had before him the precise tests to be applied, he was, in our view, both justified and entitled to reach the appropriate conclusions on the basis of the evidence he had heard. There is no hint or suggestion in his judgment that the decision in Cresswell v. Sirl (1) had raised questions not covered by the evidence at the trial. An examination of the notes of the evidence shows equally, in our view, that all the relevant matters of fact were fully canvassed.

H We next observe that the onus of proving justification for the shooting lay on the defendant. The judge stated in plain terms that in his view the defendant had failed to discharge the onus : “ . . . I think he fails to establish either limb of proposition (ii). ” The first head of complaint of counsel for the defendant appears to us to fail to appreciate that the onus lay on his client. The question was not whether the negative was shown, that the defendant had not directed his mind to practicable alternatives, but whether the defendant, in order to make good the second limb of proposition (ii), had shown that he had. The second head of complaint of counsel for the defendant is, we think, open to the same objection. Nor is that all. The defendant, in his evidence in chief, had, indeed, said that when he saw the birds he "walked across field and made noise to scare them. They didn't go so I got gun," but from his cross-examination it appears that when the defendant first saw the birds he was on the far side of the field from them and that when he made a noise they got up, though (apparently) they again settled, and that, having got the gun, he then approached the birds from the other side of the field nearest to them. It is true that there is no express reference in the judgment to this evidence, but it cannot, in our judgment, be said that the county court judge is bound to deal in his judgment with every piece of evidence given and state whether or not he accepted it. On both the first and second heads of the complaint of counsel for the defendant the question which the judge was putting to himself was not whether a scaring shot would have driven the birds away, but whether, in the absence of such a shot, the defendant could discharge the onus of shewing either (a) that there were no practicable means of protecting his property other than by shooting to kill, or (b) that the defendant reasonably thought that there were no other such practicable means. In our opinion, so far from this being a misdirection, it was a perfectly correct way of approaching the question. The judge is not, in our view, finding by implication that a scaring shot would have been successful. It was quite unnecessary for him so to find. We understand his judgment as meaning merely that, so far as (a) is concerned, killing was not shown to be the only practicable means of defence in the absence of demonstration that scaring was or would have been ineffective, and, so far as (b) is concerned, a reasonable man would not have proceeded to kill before trying the effect of a scaring shot. The absence of evidence as to whether a scaring shot would or would not have been effective is accordingly, in our view, irrelevant. Evidence was not, we think, necessary before the judge would be entitled to take the commonsense view that the every-day expedient of a scaring shot ought to have been tried. The third head of complaint of counsel for the defendant may be said to raise a matter of law, namely, whether consideration of the question: Ought the defendant to have attempted first to discover whether the birds were wild or tame? amounted to a misdirection. In our judgment, it cannot be said that in this respect the learned judge in any way misdirected himself. In our judgment, in approaching the second limb of the second proposition in Cresswell v. Sirl (1) (namely, whether the defendant reasonably thought that there were no practicable means, other than shooting to kill, of protecting his property), it was in the circumstances relevant to consider whether the defendant had applied his mind at all to the character of the birds. We agree that the question whether the birds were valuable or not was beside the point, and there is nothing in the judgment to suggest that the judge concerned himself with value, but it seems to us impossible to hold that, in deciding whether or not the defendant had discharged the onus on him, the judge was not properly entitled to consider whether the defendant, in making up his mind what steps he should take, thought at all whether the birds were wild birds (which he was entitled to shoot at sight) or tame birds (which prima facie he was not), and all the more since on this point there was obviously some inconsistency in the defendant's own evidence.

Counsel for the defendant concentrated in his argument primarily on the second limb of the relevant proposition, but he also contended that on the evidence there was shown to be no practicable alternative in fact to shooting the birds for the protection of the defendant's property—or, at least, that there was no evidence to the contrary effect. On this part of the case counsel for the defendant particularly relied on the circumstance, already noticed, that the defendant had, apparently, had time to reload twice and to fire, in all, five shots at the birds. We were, accordingly, asked to infer, necessarily, that a scaring shot would not, in fact, have been effective to drive the birds away. It is, no doubt, true that the operation of firing five shots and reloading twice takes an appreciable period of time. On the other hand, it cannot, we think, be assumed that the effect of shots fired to kill is necessarily the same as that of scaring shots. Much, obviously, might depend on the number of birds, in fact, hit by the first shot or shots. However that may be, the judge found as a fact that the defendant had "entirely failed to establish shooting as the only practicable means," and it seems to us impossible to say that such a conclusion was one at which, on the evidence, including the evidence of the number of shots fired, the judge could not properly arrive.

A It follows, therefore, in our judgment, that it is impossible to disturb the conclusions of the judge that the defendant had failed to discharge the onus laid on him. It is hardly necessary to add that we are concerned only with the facts of this particular case and with the judge's conclusion in this case on those facts. We must not be taken to be laying down any general rule (apart from the proposition enunciated in Cresswell v. Sirl (1)) which will be decisive of other cases in which farmers may shoot pigeons feeding on their crops. On the evidence as recorded in this case we can well understand that another judge might have reached a different conclusion, but that circumstance does not justify our interference with the judge's finding, and we do not forget that we have not had the advantage, afforded to the judge, of seeing the defendant B in the witness box—a matter which, as we read the judgment, was of no little importance in the present case. The result is that, in our judgment, this appeal fails, and, as there is no question of the quantum of the damages awarded, the judgment of the county court should be affirmed accordingly.

C WROTTESLEY, L.J. : On the question whether the plaintiff had such property in the pigeons which were killed while feeding on the defendant's peas as to entitle him to bring an action for trespass to goods against the killer, I have had the advantage of reading the judgment of LORD GREENE, M.R., and EVERSHERD, L.J., and I am in agreement with it and cannot usefully add anything to it.

D As to the question whether the defendant was justified in shooting these pigeons in order to protect his young peas, the relevant facts appear to me to be as follows. The plaintiff breeds and races racing pigeons for a hobby at his home in the town of Peterborough. He had 20 birds. From the evidence called on his behalf, it appears that, when they are well fed at home, these pigeons do not feed when out on exercise. It also appears that when let out for exercise E they should be away only 15 or 20 minutes, but, of course, if they do feed on the neighbouring farms they are later in returning. The nine birds let out on this occasion (May 22) would appear not to have been properly fed, for they did not return and an hour after they were let out were still devouring the defendant's peas, 1½ miles away. The defendant is by trade a farmer in partnership with his mother, and at the end of April had drilled, among other fields, a five-acre field with peas. He had seen pigeons attacking this particular field before, and, to use the judge's own words, "realised there would be some damage to his crop." I have no reason to suppose the judge did not accept the defendant's evidence that they were there every day, nor that on this particular day he saw F these very pigeons on this field and made a noise to scare them. But they did not go, so he got his gun. For that would square with the plaintiff's evidence that these pigeons stayed out from 12 noon to 1 p.m. instead of returning at 12.20 p.m. or thereabouts to their loft. The defendant appears to have walked up to the pigeons, who did not go away. He fired five shots at them, and hit five birds. Four were killed and one was wounded, but was able to fly back G to the loft. I cannot find any trace in the note of a suggestion at the trial that the defendant's duty was first of all to fire a scaring or warning shot, and there is reason to think this was not put to the defendant when he was in the box.

H When the county court judge delivered his judgment, he based himself on the decision of this court in Cresswell v. Sirl (1) and held that the duty of the defendant was, first, to direct his mind to the question whether the birds were tame or wild, or whether there was any practicable way of getting the birds off his crop other than shooting them. The county court judge went on to hold that, in his view, the defendant had "entirely failed to establish shooting as the only practicable means," and that he thought "a reasonable man would have made at least some examination to discover whether the birds were wild or not and would, unless clearly satisfied they were wild, have tried the effect of a scaring shot before killing the birds as an ultimate resort." The gist of this decision appears to me to be that the defendant ought to have fired a warning shot, and that that by itself would have scared the pigeons so that they would have gone and not returned, and, as he did not, he had no justification for firing at and killing and wounding the pigeons, and so must pay £200 to the owner of the marauding pigeons. I should have been more readily satisfied of this but for the fact that after four shots from a double-barrelled 12-bore gun, including at least two periods for reloading, which, apparently, killed or wounded four birds, there were still some of the plaintiff's pigeons for the defendant to shoot at, that is to say, within 40 or 50 yards. We are not, I suppose, as judges forbidden to know something of the range at which birds like pigeons are likely to be killed or wounded with shot guns. Moreover, we know from one of the plaintiff's own witnesses that after the first four shots there was such a pause as to be noticed by that witness. Yet still the pigeons appeared to have lingered within shot of the defendant. This rather remarkable phenomenon may be regarded as throwing, at any rate, some doubt on the suggestion that after one scaring shot these birds would have flown away and left the defendant's peas alone. For what actually transpired when the defendant did fire a shot seems to show that shooting to kill was the only practicable, and certainly the only efficacious, way of getting rid of the birds. For this purpose, a shot fired to kill was just as much a scaring shot as a shot fired in the air. More than one such shot I cannot believe that a busy farmer can be expected to fire. He has, of course, his living to earn and plenty to do without chasing marauding pigeons, however valuable, from one end of his field to the other, or paying for labour to scare tame pigeons which are not properly fed at home.

On the other hand, this is an appeal from a county court, in which the judge is the final judge of all questions of fact, unless it can be said that no reasonable man could have come to the conclusion at which the judge arrived on the material before him. I am not prepared to go as far as this. Even though the matter of the scaring shot was not put to the defendant, which was unfortunate, it is an act sufficiently obvious (in the light of the decision in Cresswell v. Sirl (1)) to justify the county court judge in considering it as a means of saving the crop, even though no evidence was called to deal with the point specifically. Nor can I say that the county court judge misunderstood the test which he applied, namely, the law as laid down in Cresswell v. Sirl (1), but those propositions must, I think, be applied reasonably, especially bearing in mind where the burden of proof is laid. For instance, the burden of establishing the negative proposition that there was no practicable means of saving the stock or crop under attack except by shooting (that is, to kill) may become a very difficult or even impossible burden to discharge. Strictly, all the farmer can say usually is: "I could not think on the spur of the moment of any alternative that was likely to be effective." Beyond that, all is likely to be surmise. Farmers cannot, I think, be called on to stand and watch their stocks or crops being destroyed while they endeavour to calculate the possibilities which may be put to them at a trial on behalf of the owner of the marauding dog or pigeon.

ALEXANDER MOUNTAIN & CO. v. RUMERE, LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Scott and Cohen, L.JJ.), July 12, 1948.]

Practice—Parties—Misnomer—Substitution of plaintiff—Action begun in name of firm—Sole proprietor of firm dead—Substitution of proprietor's executrix as plaintiff—R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 2.

By R.S.C., Ord. 48A, r. 1, an action can be brought in a firm's name only where there are two or more partners. A.M. was the sole proprietor of a business which he carried on in the name of "A.M. & Co." After his death his executrix, who continued to carry on the business under the same trading name, brought an action in the name of "A.M. & Co. (trading as a firm)," the action being in respect of a contract made by A.M. during his lifetime. On an application to amend the writ by substituting the executrix as plaintiff, HELD : while the action did not fall within R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 2, as having been "commenced in the name of the wrong person as plaintiff," the case might properly be treated as one of misnomer and the writ amended by substituting the executrix as plaintiff.

Decision of LORD GODDARD, C.J. ([1948] 2 All E.R. 144), reversed.

C APPEAL by the executrix of the sole proprietor of the plaintiff firm from an order of LORD GODDARD, C.J., dated June 8, 1948, and reported [1948] 2 All E.R. 144, refusing leave to amend the writ by the substitution of herself as plaintiff. The appeal was allowed. The facts appear in the judgment of COHEN, L.J.

C. H. Duveen for the plaintiff.

Gardiner, K.C., and W. Gumbel for the defendants.

SCOTT, L.J. : I will ask COHEN, L.J., to deliver the first judgment.

D COHEN, L.J. : This is an appeal from a decision of LORD GODDARD, C.J., refusing an application by the executrix of Mr. Alexander Mountain that the writ in this action should be amended by substituting for the description of the plaintiff, "Alexander Mountain & Co," the words "Doris Mountain, widow, executrix of Alexander Mountain, deceased." The late Alexander Mountain carried on business in the name of Alexander Mountain

E & Co., and in the course of that business he deposited a quantity of steel tubing with the defendants. He demanded back this tubing, but difficulties arose and this action was begun for damages for detainee, or, alternatively, conversion.

F Under R.S.C., Ord. 48A, r. 1, an action can be brought in a firm name only where there are two or more partners. In this case it was ascertained shortly before the trial that the business of Alexander Mountain & Co. had been the sole property of Mr. Alexander Mountain. At the issue of the writ Mr. Mountain was, to the knowledge of everyone, dead, and there is no suggestion that anyone thought that the writ was being issued on behalf of a living person. As soon as they discovered the fact that the business had been carried on by Mr. Alexander Mountain without any partners, the solicitors for the firm informed the defendants of the position and notified them that they would apply, when the action came on, for leave to amend the proceedings in the manner I have indicated.

G When the case came before the LORD CHIEF JUSTICE his Lordship, with considerable reluctance, expressed the view that he had no jurisdiction to make the amendment. Before him the matter was argued mainly on the basis that he had jurisdiction to make the order under R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 2, which provides :

H Where an action has been commenced in the name of the wrong person as plaintiff, or where it is doubtful whether it has been commenced in the name of the right plaintiff, the court or a judge may, if satisfied that it has been so commenced through a bona fide mistake, and that it is necessary for the determination of the real matter in dispute so to do, order any other person to be substituted or added as plaintiff upon such terms as may be just.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE, basing himself in the main on a decision of RUSSELL, J., in Tetlow v. Orela, Ltd. (1) came to the conclusion that he had no jurisdiction to make in the writ the alteration which the executrix sought to make. In Tetlow v. Orela, Ltd. (1) the action had been commenced in the name of Joseph Tetlow, and the writ had been issued in the name of Joseph Tetlow in the mistaken belief that Joseph Tetlow was alive. Joseph Tetlow's executrix, who since her appointment had carried on the business, applied to have her name substituted as plaintiff. Basing himself on the decision in Clay v. Oxford (2), RUSSELL, J., held that he had no jurisdiction to make the order which was sought. In Clay's case (2) the action was commenced in the name of John Clay as plaintiff. Afterwards it was discovered that John Clay had died before the issue of the writ, and the Court of Exchequer reversed an order for the substitution of John Clay's executrix and executors as plaintiffs. Tetlow v. Orela, Ltd. (1) is not binding on us, but the decision in Clay v. Oxford (2) is, and, if the facts in the present case were indistinguishable, I should unhesitatingly follow that decision, but in both those cases the writ was issued on behalf of a dead man, in the mistaken belief that he was alive. In the present case there was no such misapprehension, and, in my opinion, this case is distinguishable from the cases to which I have referred.

Alexander Mountain died in July, 1947, and his widow was the sole executrix and beneficiary under his will. In a joint affidavit filed by her and her brother-in-law, she said that after her husband's death she continued to carry on her husband's business in the name of Alexander Mountain & Co., with the assistance of her brother-in-law, Mr. Haron. What Mr. Haron did in relation to the company he did with her authority and as her agent, and in that capacity he gave instructions with regard to the present proceedings to Messrs. Forsyte, Kerman & Phillips, the company's solicitors. Unfortunately, he did not tell them the true position, which was that the executrix was the sole person entitled to carry on the business. The solicitors were under the impression that Mr. Haron was a partner. Mr. Watts, the managing clerk, said in his affidavit that when he issued the writ he had no knowledge that Mr. Alexander Mountain had been carrying on business in his own name under the style of Alexander Mountain & Co. and that after his death Mrs. Doris Mountain was continuing to carry on the business herself in the same name. It is plain that Mr. Watts knew that Mr. Mountain was dead, and the true view on the evidence is that the solicitors, acting through Mr. Watts, intended to issue this writ on behalf of the person entitled to the business of Alexander Mountain & Co. Under a misapprehension the writ was issued in the name of Alexander Mountain & Co., which was an improper proceeding, because R.S.C., Ord. 48A, r. 1, does not entitle a single person to sue in the name of the firm. But although R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 2, does not apply, the case, in my opinion, is really one of misnomer, which is referred to in the ANNUAL PRACTICE, 1946-47, p. 10, in these terms: "Misnomer of plaintiff—See an article in Law Journal of May 9, 1942, at p. 150." In that article the learned author lays down thus what he conceives to be the rule as to misnomer:

In D. Glanville & Co., Ltd. v. Lyne (3), it is said that the only matter calling for report is the form of order for costs, but it appears, on a perusal of the very short report of the case, that a point of some general importance is involved. A writ had been issued in the name of "D. Glanville & Co., Ltd.", the claim being for damages for breach of contract . . . At the trial it appeared that "D. Glanville & Co., Ltd." was a misnomer, the real name of the company being "Dudley Glanville & Co., Ltd." It also appeared that the contract was ultra vires the company, so that (on the merits) there would in any case have to be judgment for the defendant. In these circumstances, says the report ([1942] W.N. 65), the judge "refused the plaintiffs leave to amend by substituting the name of Dudley Glanville & Co., Ltd., in order to make them liable for costs instead of the solicitors. The defendant intimating her willingness to accept party and party costs only, he made an order in this form (a representative of the original solicitors being present and waiving notice of the application for costs): Judgment for the defendant on ground of non-existence of plaintiffs. Defendant's costs to be paid by the plaintiff's solicitors."

With all due deference to the learned judge, it is submitted that there never was a time, not even in the days before the rigour of the procedure at common law had been modified by statute, when such a judgment on the trial of an action could have been appropriate in a mere case of misnomer. It may be doubted whether it would have occurred to anyone in the above case to suggest a judgment in this form if the plaintiff had been an individual, one of whose names had been omitted, or wrongly abbreviated, instead of a corporation. There is, however, no magic in the name of a corporation. It is true that a corporation, whether a limited company or otherwise, can sue only in its corporate name, but, equally, an individual can sue only in his proper name. A glance at the history of procedure in regard to this point, a point of considerable importance when the number of actions commenced by corporations is considered, appears to put the true position beyond doubt. If reference is made to the index either of the YEARLY PRACTICE or the ANNUAL PRACTICE it will be seen that there is no heading "misnomer" at all. Why? If any old practice books are referred to there will be references enough. The reason is this. "A mistake in the name of a party to the suit is ground for a plea in abatement only, and cannot be objected as a variance at the trial" (STEPHEN, PRINCIPLES OF PLEADING, 1st ed. (1824), p. 320: see, also, TIDD, NEW PRACTICE (1837), pp. 67, 320). That is to say, if the plaintiff's name did not correctly appear in the writ, the defendant could formerly plead this in order to defeat the action in the particular form in which it was originally brought, but this did not prevent the plaintiff bringing another action in proper form, and pleas in abatement had normally to be pleaded within four days of the delivery of the declaration. If the defendant, therefore, did not at once take advantage of a misnomer in this way it was not open to him to take advantage of it at all. "At no time," says CHITTY, PLEADINGS, 7th ed., 1844, vol. I, p. 266, "even in the case of a corporation, was misnomer of a plaintiff pleadable in bar. [It] is not, and never was, a ground for setting aside the proceedings, or for a motion in arrest of judgment, or of non-suit at the trial, at least if it appeared that the defendant was aware that the action was brought by the person who actually sues." Thus in Stafford Corpn. v. Bolton (4) the plaintiffs sued as the "mayor and burgesses of the borough of Stafford," whereas their corporate name was "the mayor and burgesses of the borough of Stafford in the county of Stafford." The trial judge nonsuited the plaintiffs on this ground, but this was set aside because the error, if material at all (which was doubted), should have been pleaded by way of abatement: see also National Bank of St. Charles v. De Bernaldes (5), when the plaintiffs name as given by the charter was "The Bank of St. Charles," and 1 WMS. SAUNDERS (1871 Ed.), p. 614 et seq.

This was the position up to the passing of the Civil Procedure Act, 1833, s. 11 of which abolished pleas in abatement for misnomer altogether. It gave the defendant the right, instead of pleading in abatement, "to cause the declaration to be amended, at the cost of the plaintiff, by inserting the right name, upon a judge's summons founded on an affidavit of the right name." This Act is now itself repealed, and all pleas in abatement are finally abolished by R.S.C., Ord. 21, r. 1. A plaintiff, whether an individual or a corporation, is, of course, still required to bring his action in his proper name. There does not appear to be any specific rule of court dealing with the matter, nor do the rules of court deal with misnomer in any way. It, therefore, appears that R.S.C., Ord. 72, r. 2, applies; i.e., "the present procedure and practice" (i.e., the practice in force when the rules of 1883 were framed) remains in force, and the defendant by summons, supported by affidavit, could compel the plaintiff to amend. If he does not do so, and the matter proceeds to trial, it is submitted that the misnomer can then be amended, and that in no circumstances could the misnomer affect the substantive judgment which the court is called upon to pronounce.

That statement of law, with which I respectfully agree, was not brought to the attention of the LORD CHIEF JUSTICE, and I cannot help thinking that, if it had been, a different result might have ensued. Having regard to the affidavits, I think we can properly treat this case as one of misnomer, and allow the writ to be amended by substituting the executrix as plaintiff. In my opinion, the appeal should be allowed.

SCOTT, L.J.: I entirely agree with what my Lord has said, and I would only add one point. In Tellow v. Orela, Ltd. (1) RUSSELL, J., referring to R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 2, says this ([1920] 2 Ch. 24, 26):

In my opinion that rule means that, where an action has been commenced between two living parties by a living plaintiff, and the living plaintiff afterwards turns out to be the wrong person, an application may be made to the court, and the court can substitute another person for the living plaintiff or may add another person as co-plaintiff as the case may be.

This writ was issued on behalf of a living person wrongly described. The living person was Mr. Haron or the widow. It is a case of misnomer and that passage in the judgment of RUSSELL, J., shows that he was not addressing his mind to the question which arises in this case.

Appeal allowed, with costs of appeal in any event.

MOATE v. MOATE.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Jenkins, J.), July 5, 1948.]

Husband and Wife—Summary proceedings as to property—Presumption of advancement—Purchase by intended husband in name of intended wife—Subsequent marriage.

On Nov. 13, 1930, while he was engaged to marry W., H. purchased in the name of W. a dwelling-house subject to a mortgage of £1,042, paying some £207. W. entered into a covenant with the mortgagees to repay the mortgage money and to observe all covenants and conditions in the mortgage. On Dec. 7, 1930, H. and W. were married, and H. thereafter paid the instalments due under the mortgage. The relationship of H. and W. deteriorated, but H. continued to make the mortgage repayments. In June, 1946, W. ceased to render H. any conjugal rights. On Sept. 19, 1946, H. made the final mortgage repayment of £487, and the receipt indorsed on the mortgage stated that repayment had been made by W.

HELD: (i) there was no practical distinction for the present purpose between a purchase by an intending husband in the name of an intending wife and a purchase by a husband in the name of a wife; a presumption of advancement arose in both cases; and, in the absence of a rebuttal by H. of that presumption, W. was beneficially entitled to the house.

(ii) even if there were a presumption of a resulting trust, on the facts there was a gift of the house and the mortgage repayments to W.

[AS TO PRESUMPTION OF ADVANCEMENT, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 33, pp. 149-153, paras. 249-254; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 25, pp. 510-517, Nos. 67-123.]

ADJOURNED SUMMONS under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, to decide the beneficial ownership of a dwelling-house which had been purchased by an intending husband in the name of the intending wife, the marriage taking place soon afterwards. JENKINS, J., held that there was a presumption of advancement in favour of the wife. The facts appear in the judgment.

T. R. Waters for the husband.

Bassett for the wife.

JENKINS, J.: This is a summons under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, in which the plaintiff is Mr. Harold Stanley Moate and the defendant is his wife, Elizabeth Nellie Moate. The question which I have to decide is, in substance, whether the house known as "The Limes," 72, Lampton Road, Hounslow, is the beneficial property of the wife, or whether it is held by her on some trust for the husband, or for herself and the husband, or for herself and the husband and the children. There is a further question whether, on the assumption that the house belongs to the wife, the husband has any claim against the property in respect of payments which he made after the acquisition of the house in discharge of a certain mortgage subject to which the house was purchased.

The parties were married on Dec. 7, 1930, after an engagement which had lasted for some eighteen months. The house, No. 72, Lampton Road, was purchased, that is to say, the purchase was completed by conveyance, on Nov. 13, 1930, during the months preceding the marriage, but many months after the beginning of the engagement. The conveyance of Nov. 13, shows that the house was purchased subject to a mortgage on which a sum of £1,042 was then outstanding. The price, subject to the mortgage, was £207 odd. The husband paid the £207, but the conveyance was, at his request, made to the wife. It is a conveyance by the then owner with the concurrence of the mortgagees, the urban district council of Heston and Isleworth, to the wife subject to the mortgage, and the wife entered into a covenant with the mortgagee council to pay the outstanding balance of the mortgage and to observe and perform all the covenants, stipulations and conditions contained in the mortgage. The mortgage principal was repayable by monthly instalments. From the date of purchase onwards the husband in fact paid the instalments. There were five children of the marriage and, apparently, the marriage was a successful one for A a considerable time. For 13 years or so the parties lived together in amity, the husband paying the instalments of the mortgage. Their relations seem to have deteriorated round about the fourteenth year, for I am told in the evidence that the parties ceased to share a room and to live together in June, 1944. By 1946, the wife had ceased to render any conjugal rights at all to the husband. Notwithstanding the deterioration in their relationship, which had become as serious as it could be by June, 1946, the husband went on paying off the instalments of the mortgage. Finally, having been put in a position so to do by the realisation of some other property in which he was interested, he paid off the balance of some £437 remaining due on the mortgage on Sept. 19, 1946, and that payment was acknowledged by a receipt indorsed on the mortgage signed and sealed on behalf of the mortgagees council, the receipt stating the payment to have been made by the wife, she, of course, so far as the mortgagees council was concerned, being the mortgagor. There was no improvement in the relationship between the parties, and in 1947 the wife began proceedings against her husband for divorce on the ground of cruelty. Those proceedings are being contested and are still pending.

B The first thing I propose to consider is what presumption one way or the other should the court collect from these facts. It will be observed that the whole of the purchase money for the house, i.e., both the £207 originally paid, and the total required to discharge the mortgage subject to which the house was C purchased was found by the husband. On the other hand, the purchase was in the name of the wife. So far as the conveyancing of the matter is concerned, she, and no-one else, appears as the owner and she incurred the contractual liability with the mortgagees council for the payment of the mortgage debt. Apart from incurring that obligation, the whole of the money was found by the husband, and that obligation he ultimately discharged out of his own money. D The husband provided the money but the relation of the parties was that of husband and wife so it was a case of a purchase by the husband of property in the name of his wife. There one must pause and point out another circumstance which will have been already apparent, namely, that at the date of the actual purchase of the property the parties were not actually husband and wife, but they were engaged to be married. The property was purchased by the E intending husband in the name of the intended wife, and she in due course after the purchase did become his wife. Unless this must be treated as something different from the ordinary case of a purchase by a husband in the name of his wife, there is no doubt that the presumption on the facts I have stated is that the husband purchased the property and paid off the mortgage on it by way of gift to his wife, so that the presumption of resulting trust which arises in the case of a purchase of property by one in the name of another who is a stranger F to him is rebutted by the relationship, and one is left with the presumption of advancement which ordinarily obtains in transactions of this kind between a husband and a wife. Is that presumption prevented from arising by the fact that this property was purchased when the marriage was in contemplation G but had not yet been solemnised? I was pressed by counsel for the husband to hold that a transfer by an intended husband to an intended wife is for this purpose no more than a transfer from one stranger to another. It seems to me that that view of the matter, if I may say so with respect, is entirely contrary to commonsense. I can see no practical distinction for this purpose between a transfer by an intending husband to an intending wife and a transfer as between a husband and a wife. The reason for presuming advancement is stronger where the gift is made in contemplation of the marriage before it is actually solemnised than it is where the transaction is post-nuptial. It seems to me the presumption would be, in the former case, that the intending husband is making a gift to H the lady in consideration of the marriage, a gift by way of wedding present which he intends to take effect in her favour beneficially provided the marriage is duly solemnised. I, therefore, hold that the presumption in this case is that the husband intended this to be a provision by way of gift to his wife provided the marriage was duly solemnised.

If that view is right, I am clearly of opinion that the husband, on whom the onus lies of rebutting that presumption, has entirely failed to rebut it. He found himself unable to claim that he intended his wife to be a trustee for him. His LORDSHIP referred in detail to the evidence, observing that in a claim made to the War Damage Commission, and in letters written by the husband to the wife, the wife had been treated as the owner of the house and continued:—) How does the matter stand supposing counsel for the husband is right in saying that where the purchase under consideration by a husband in the name of his wife was made when they were simply engaged and not actually married, the presumption is the ordinary one of a resulting trust. That would shift the onus, but the question of resulting trust or gift would still be a question of fact. The only difference would be that it would be for the wife to show that there was a gift as opposed to it being for the husband to show that there was not a gift. Supposing that the matter ought more properly to be dealt with in that way, the conclusion to which I have come is still that on the evidence in this case there was in fact a gift of the house to the wife. Her evidence, which I see no reason to doubt in any material respect, was clearly to the effect that before they were married, at a time when the actual date of their marriage had not been fixed, the husband took her to show her this house which he had found and told her, in effect, that he was buying it as a wedding present for her. The most probable explanation of the transaction is what the lady says in evidence, and I see no reason to doubt it. On that footing the payments made in discharge of the mortgage would simply be gifts to the wife, as it were supplementary gifts, if I may so describe them, completing the wedding gift which the husband had promised to make before they were married.

If the position had been that the wife was a trustee of the house for the husband, the discharge of the mortgage debt would automatically have ensured for his benefit, but the position being, as I have held it to be, that the wife took the house beneficially, the payments of the mortgage, in order to ensure for her benefit, would have to be what I have described as supplementary gifts. Whatever may be said of the period of engagement and the position as regards transfers of property to the intended wife during that period, no question arises, or can arise, with regard to the payment in or towards the discharge of the mortgage made during the marriage, but those payments were presumptively by way of gift or advancement to the wife, and the onus would be clearly on the husband to show that they were not gifts. In my judgment, he has clearly, as regards the matter of the mortgage repayments, failed to discharge that onus. It does not seem to me that the fact, on which some reliance was placed on his behalf, that the payments were continued after the relations between the parties had deteriorated really tells in his favour. I should have thought if anything it told against him, because, if it was not his intention when making these payments to add to and complete the provision he had made for his wife, it seems to me to be really incredible that he should have gone on making the payments in the same way without any precaution to avoid benefiting his wife, which he did in fact do. He simply went on paying the instalments and finally paid this substantial sum of £480 after the relations between the parties were admittedly very bad indeed, and he allowed that to be done and to be acknowledged by means of a receipt which stated the wife to be the payer of the money. In my judgment, there is nothing in that circumstance or in any of the evidence to rebut the ordinary presumption as regards the mortgage payments. In the result, I am of opinion that the husband's claim to this property fails and must be dismissed with costs.

Application dismissed with costs.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Wallington, J.), May 27, 1948.]

Evidence—Admissibility—Statement in document—"Person interested"—Proof of deceased solicitor's clerk—Probate action anticipated—Partner of firm propounding will—Evidence Act, 1938 (c. 28), s. 1 (3).

- A In anticipation of probate proceedings in respect of the validity of a will, which was propounded, as one of the executors, by a partner in a firm of solicitors, a clerk employed by the firm prepared a statement of the evidence he would be able to give at the trial, but before the action was commenced he died. The statement was tendered in evidence under s. 1 of the Evidence Act, 1938.

- B HELD: the clerk was not a "person interested" within the meaning of s. 1 (3) of the Act, and, therefore, the statement was admissible in evidence.

- D PRELIMINARY POINT as to the admissibility of evidence in a probate action in which the defendants, one of whom was a partner in a firm of solicitors, were propounding a will. A clerk in the employment of the firm of solicitors, in anticipation of proceedings in relation to the validity of that and another will, prepared a statement of the evidence he proposed to give at the trial of the action, but before the action was brought the clerk died. The statement was tendered in evidence under s. 1 of the Evidence Act, 1938, and admitted, E the court holding that the clerk was not "a person interested" within the meaning of s. 1 (3) of the Act. The facts appear in the judgment.

Cartwright Sharp, K.C., and Victor Russell for the plaintiff.
Karminski, K.C., and Marshall-Reynolds for the defendants.

- F WALLINGTON, J.: The point in this case is in a very small compass. As counsel for the defendants has very fairly agreed, there is no doubt that when this document came into existence, although no proceeding was then pending, it was anticipated that there would be proceedings in relation to the validity of one or other or both of the two wills dealt with by the pleadings. The preliminary matters of proof have been satisfactorily dealt with. It has been proved that Mr. Symonds (whose statement is tendered as evidence) is dead and that the document tendered is one which he was responsible for producing, and it has been authenticated, as required by the Evidence Act, 1938, s. 1 (4), as being written by him.

- G The question remains whether or not Mr. Symonds was "a person interested"—which must mean either interested in the transaction, or in the pending or anticipated proceedings, or both—within the meaning of s. 1 (3) of the Act. If Mr. Symonds was "interested" within the meaning of that sub-section, H then this statement is not admissible as evidence. If he was not, then it is admissible.

On the question what is meant by the word "interested" two authorities have been cited. One is the decision of MORTON, J., in Plomien Fuel Economiser Co., Ltd. v. National Marketing Co. (1). I need not go through the facts of that case. The issue was whether a tester employed by a company to test certain apparatus sold by them who had signed a proof relating to relevant facts in a passing-off action was "a person interested" within the meaning of this sub-section. MORTON, J., says ([1941] 1 All E.R. 311, 313):

In my view, "a person interested" within the meaning of this section must, in the context, mean a person interested in the result of the proceedings "pending or anticipated." It seems to me that a useful test, though perhaps not the only test, is whether it was better for Petrie that the plaintiff company should succeed in the present action or whether it was a matter of indifference to him?

Pausing there, the test as there laid down by the learned judge would seem to be satisfied if it could be shown that in any way, financially or otherwise, it would have been better for the tester, Petrie, for his employers to succeed in the action. The learned judge proceeds:

Applying that test, was Petrie a person interested? . . . I do not know whether Petrie was paid a salary quite irrespective of the number of tests which in fact he carried out for the plaintiff company . . . but it seems to me that it must be to the advantage of the plaintiffs' tester if the plaintiff company wins this action instead of losing it.

That would seem to indicate that the learned judge, in using the words "to the advantage of the plaintiffs' tester," was thinking of a possible advantageous change in the amount of his salary. He goes on:

The object of the action is to prevent the plaintiffs' trade being damaged by what they say are unfair acts on the part of the defendants, and it seems to me that one whose employment consists of testing the Plomien fuel economiser must be benefited the more the plaintiff company prospers and the more the fuel economisers are sold by that company and tested by him . . . The amount of his work is increased, and I suppose that it is reasonable to infer that his importance to the company is increased, and possibly in time, if not immediately, his remuneration might be increased. I think, therefore, that in this particular case Petrie must be held to be a "person interested," within the meaning of the sub-section.

That appears to me to indicate that the view of the learned judge was that in some way, directly or indirectly, the financial position of the plaintiffs' tester would or might depend on the result of the proceedings, and in that sense he would be "a person interested" in the result of the proceedings. The learned judge goes further, and says:

In the case of a limited company, it would seem clear that every shareholder is a person interested in the success of proceedings brought by the company, and I should think, every director. Whether every servant of the company in every set of circumstances is necessarily "a person interested" is not a matter on which I have formed any concluded judgment. It may be that there are circumstances in which it might be said that a servant of the company was not a person interested. As to that, I express no opinion. However, I think that the general intention of the section is that, if a statement is put in as evidence, to which, of course, no cross-examination can be directed, it should be either a statement made at a time when proceedings are not pending or anticipated involving a dispute as to any fact which the statement might tend to establish or a statement made by what I may perhaps conveniently describe as an independent person.

By the words "independent person," I understand the learned judge to mean a person who is not interested in the result of the proceedings.

It is plain that the learned judge was able to decide that particular case on the basis of an obvious possibility that Petrie's financial position would, or might, sooner or later be changed, and that whether the change would be to his advantage or disadvantage would depend on the result of the proceedings. It is important to observe that in his observations MORTON, J., indicates that the particular "proceeding" was an action based on alleged passing off and alleged breach of contract in respect of the economisers which it was the duty of the tester to test, implying that, in forming his view, he had regard to the direct relation that thus existed between the tester and the subject-matter of the "proceeding." It follows, as it seems to me, that in every case to decide the question of admissibility the facts must be ascertained both as to the person whose statement it is sought to put in evidence, as to the character and subject-matter of the "proceeding," and as to the relation of the person to the subject-matter of the proceeding. It may, indeed, in some cases be necessary to enter on an even more extended inquiry. In making these observations, I desire only to make it clear that, in my opinion, it would be wrong to suppose that a servant of a company must be treated in every case as "a person interested." MORTON, J., expressly excludes any such implication from his judgment. If I may respectfully say so, I would add that I entirely agree both with MORTON, J.'s conclusion and the reasons given for it.

The other case which has been cited is Holton v. Holton (2). In that case the question whether a statement was admissible or inadmissible depended on whether the person who made it, who was the mother of the petitioner, was interested or not within the meaning of this sub-section. The view formed by BARNARD, J., was that she was not, within the words of the sub-section, "a person interested."

A It was not suggested that she had any possible financial or other material interest in the result of the proceedings. It is plain that she had only what was described by one of the learned counsel who argued the case as an emotional or spiritual or sympathetic interest in the result of the proceedings, and the learned judge held that that interest was not one that was hit by the terms of the sub-section. It was part of the argument of counsel for the plaintiff in the present case that judges would be reluctant to admit a proof of even an independent proposed or possible witness, as distinct from a statement made at the time (which I understand to mean at the time when there took place the transaction with which he deals in his proof or draft proof), and counsel argues that the effect of the judgment in the Plomien Fuel Economiser Co. case (1) is that the employee of a party whose employment is concerned with the subject-matter of the dispute is "a person interested," and that his statement cannot, therefore, be received in evidence.

C I have come to the conclusion that it would not be right to say that to make the statement inadmissible in every case there must be a probability or possibility of financial advantage or disadvantage resulting to the person whose statement is tendered. That is clearly not the sole test. It is not impossible to imagine a number of circumstances, varying in different cases, in which there would or might be an interest in the result of the proceedings which was not directly or indirectly a financial interest. Therefore, anything I say in this

D case must not be taken as indicating the view—because it certainly is not my view—that, unless there is no financial interest, direct or indirect, a statement of this kind, when tendered, is admissible. There is no doubt that Mr. Symonds, if he had looked forward to the anticipated proceedings and had contemplated the end of them, would have preferred that his clients should succeed rather than that they should fail. Counsel for the defendants

E rightly says that Mr. Symonds had been for many years conveyancing clerk in the service of Messrs. Haslewood, Hare & Co., and he would not be likely, therefore, in that capacity, to come into contact with litigious matters, except, perhaps, in cases raising questions of title in the Chancery Division, but it is plain that he was closely connected with the present matter. He had taken a direct professional interest in the matters relating to one of the wills. He had been concerned with the family quarrels that appear to have taken place.

F He had been concerned with the power of attorney and he was obviously preparing the statement, now tendered as evidence, and looking forward to the time when he might appear as a witness in proceedings as to the effectiveness of one or other of these testamentary documents. There is no doubt that Messrs. Haslewood, Hare & Co., acting for the defendants, were interested at the time when this statement came into existence in the sense that it would

G be their wish that everything proper should be done to secure the victory of their clients in any proceedings that were then anticipated, and I suppose that Mr. Herbert Dering Haslewood, a partner in that firm, one of the two defendants, and one of the executors of the will which is propounded by the defendants, would wish the proceedings to result in the success of the endeavours which were being made to support the will for which he and his fellow executor were responsible. I suppose that in every case, where servants

H of a firm are loyal and industrious, they always do all they can to secure the best results on behalf of their firm, but I have to ask myself, whether that interest—a very natural and proper interest—is of the character intended to be included in the provisions of this sub-section. I do not find myself able so to hold. I think that it is an interest of a kind that none of those persons could ever regard as likely to make any difference to their financial situation or otherwise to affect their position. It could never lead to any improvement in the reputation, prestige, or financial stability of Messrs. Haslewood, Hare & Co., or that of either of the two defendants in the case. For these reasons,

I come to the conclusion that this is a statement made in circumstances that, if Mr. Symonds was not interested, would come within the provisions of this sub-section of the Act, that Mr. Symonds was not "a person interested," and that, therefore, this statement is admissible in evidence and I admit it.

Will—Construction—Gift of dwelling-house—Uncertainty—Condition subsequent—"If in the opinion of my trustees she shall have ceased permanently to reside therein"—"Residence."

By cl. 5 of his will, dated Sept. 4, 1940, a testator, who died on Apr. 7, 1946, bequeathed to his wife "all the furniture plate plated goods linen glass china books . . . manuscripts pictures statuary musical instruments articles of vertu motor cars and all other articles of domestic or household or garden use or ornament and all wines liquors and consumable stores and provisions which at the time of my death shall be in and about or belonging to or ordered for any dwelling-home and/or flat in which I may reside at my decease or the outbuildings or garden thereof." Included among the testator's possessions was a gold chain of value and fine workmanship presented to the testator on his election as sheriff of the city of London, and the testator had ordered a motor car which had not been paid for at the date of his death (no particular car having been appropriated to him) and which was not delivered until a year after that date. D

HELD: (i) any type of article which a connoisseur or virtuoso might collect for its artistic merit or the beauty of its workmanship fell within the description "article of vertu," and the sheriff's chain was such an article. E

(ii) the motor car passed under cl. 5, and was not charged in the hands of the wife with payment of the purchase money by the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, s. 35, because, the property in the car not having passed to the testator at the date of his death, he was not "possessed of or entitled to" the motor car subject to a charge within the section. F

By cl. 17 of his will the testator provided: "My trustees shall stand possessed of the trust fund and the income thereof in trust to pay or make over the same to the Court of Aldermen for the City of London . . . upon trust out of the income of the trust fund to apply once a year a sum not exceeding the sum of £100 . . . to provide a dinner to the Court of Aldermen when they shall meet to decide the business of this trust and to pay to each member of the committee hereinafter mentioned who shall attend during the whole time of any committee meeting the sum of £1 1s. 0d. for his attendance at such meeting and to apply the balance of such income for the benefit of . . . the orthopaedic hospitals of England and other hospitals or charitable institutions carrying on similar work . . . in such shares and proportions as the said committee shall from time to time think fit." He further directed that the committee should consist of six aldermen, and that his trustees should, three years after his death G H or so soon as convenient thereafter, retire from the trusts and appoint the Court of Aldermen of the City of London in their place. It was contended (a) that cl. 17 must fail quoad the trust to provide an annual dinner and the trust to pay £1 1s. 0d. to each member of the committee for his attendance, because the fund was directed to be applied primarily to non-charitable objects and only as to the balance to charitable purposes; and (b) that, as the trust to pay fees for attendance could not be quantified, the whole of cl. 17 must fail. The trust fund amounted to more than £200,000.

HELD: (i) the trusts for the annual dinner and attendance fees were declared in favour of the Court of Aldermen and the members of the committee virtute officii, and, although preceding in order the charitable trust for hospitals, they were essentially ancillary thereto, and, therefore, even if they were invalid, the whole income would be applicable to the charitable purpose.

(ii) the trusts objected to were capable of furthering the charitable purpose by promoting efficient management, and, therefore, they were themselves charitable.

By cl. 2 of a codicil dated Aug. 14, 1941, the testator provided: "I devise my messuage land and hereditaments known as Wildwood Seal . . . to my trustees in fee simple upon trust that my trustees shall permit my dear wife Kathleen Alice to reside therein rent free during her life or for so long as she shall desire to reside therein and I declare that from and after her death or if in the opinion of my trustees she shall have ceased permanently to reside therein (whichever shall first happen) my trustees shall stand possessed of the said premises" on the trusts of his residuary trust fund. It was contended on behalf of the wife that the condition subsequent as to residence was void for uncertainty.

HELD: in its context the word "reside" clearly referred to personal residence, and the word "permanently" meant that the cesser of personal residence must be permanent in the sense that the wife must have no "animus revertendi," and the condition, as so construed, was prescribed with sufficient certainty and precision.

Per cur.: although in this case the fact that the testator had made the opinion of the trustees the criterion for the operation of the condition had avoided certain difficulties which might otherwise have arisen, the application of such a criterion would not of itself save a condition from invalidity on the ground of uncertainty.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine the construction of a will. The facts appear in the judgment.

J. Monckton for the plaintiffs (the executors).

Christie, K.C., and J. G. Strangman for the first defendant (the widow).

Pascoe Hayward, K.C., and Lindner for the second defendant (one of the persons entitled on intestacy), and the third, fourth and fifth defendants (persons formerly in the testator's employ).

Ungoed-Thomas, K.C., and Wilfrid Hunt for the sixth defendant (the Court of the Mayor and Aldermen of the City of London).

Danckwerts (A. W. L. Franklin with him) for the Attorney-General.

JENKINS, J. : By cl. 5 of his will, the testator bequeathed to his wife :

... all the furniture plate plated goods linen glass china books (except books of account) manuscripts pictures statuary musical instruments articles of vertu motor cars and all other articles of domestic or household or garden use or ornament and all wines liquors and consumable stores and provisions which at the time of my death shall be in and about or belonging to or ordered for any dwelling-house and/or flat in which I may reside at my decease or the outbuildings or garden thereof.

It appears that at the time of his death the testator's possessions included some masonic regalia, a chain of office which is described in the originating summons as the Lord Mayor's chain of office, but which appears in fact to be a chain presented to the testator on his election as sheriff of the city of London, some jewellery, some wearing apparel, some wine stored on the premises of Richard Mathews & Company, Ltd., at the date of the testator's death, and in addition an order had been placed for the testator by the testator's wife on his behalf for a Lanchester motor car which was not delivered until, I think, a year or thereabouts after the testator's death. The question that I have now to decide is whether certain of these articles which I have enumerated pass under the gift contained in cl. 5 of the will which I have read. No dispute arises about the masonic regalia, the jewellery, the wearing apparel, or the wine. That leaves the sheriff's chain of office and the Lanchester motor car.

As to the chain of office, that is described in an affidavit of Lady Coxen, who explains that it was, in fact, the chain presented to her late husband on his election as sheriff in the city of London, as an article of beautiful workmanship. That is all the evidence I have about it—the occasion of its presentation, and the fact that it was of beautiful workmanship. Returning to cl. 5 of the will, it is, I think, common ground that the only words under which the chain can pass are the words "and articles of vertu." The question, therefore, is whether the chain presented to the testator on his election as sheriff can properly be brought within that description. "Articles of vertu" is an expression of no very closely defined meaning. It has been discussed in two cases to which I was referred in the course of the argument. The first case is Re Baroness Zouche (1), where certain dictionary definitions of the word were adduced in argument. In the course of argument, counsel referred to some definitions ([1919] 2 Ch. 182): "The expression 'an article of vertu' or 'vertu' is not used in French or Italian in the same sense as in English and means 'an object of art, antiquity or curiosity'." That definition is taken from the IMPERIAL DICTIONARY, vol. 4, p. 558. "In the OXFORD ENGLISH DICTIONARY, Vol. 10, p. 237 (c), it is defined as 'a curio, antique or other product of the fine arts'." Counsel submitted (ibid.) that it included :

... books and MSS. collected, not for their literary excellence, but because of some quality such as artistic excellence, or antiquity, or rarity, or curious lettering, or because they are interesting as curiosities.

The items in question in that case were certain rare books and manuscripts. P. O. LAWRENCE, J., in his judgment, said (ibid., 185) :

I think an article, in order to be an "article of vertu," must have some artistic merit; there may be articles which are very rare and which are of great interest to men of taste and education which could not be properly described as "articles of vertu." I think the term connotes that there is an artistic element in the article, and for that reason I have come to the conclusion that if the present case had rested on "articles of vertu" alone, further evidence would be required in order to bring, for instance, the Mazarin Bible within the description of "articles of vertu."

A I have also been referred to Re Tomline's Will Trusts (2) which was decided by MAUGHAM, J., and which concerned the Paston Letters. The gift in the will included "all the pictures prints statues sculptures articles of vertu books furniture and plate." The learned judge in that case dealt with the meaning of the expression "articles of vertu" and said ([1931] 1 Ch. 525):

B Apart from that consideration to which, it may be, not very much weight ought to be attached, what is the meaning of the phrase "articles of vertu books furniture and plate in my mansion houses at Orwell Park and Riby Grove"? Do the three volumes in question, according to the ordinary meaning in the English language of "articles of vertu," fall within that description or within the term "books"? On that, by the industry of counsel, I have been referred to probably all the material cases which have been decided in the last hundred years. First, I wish to express my opinion with regard to the phrase "articles of vertu," a phrase which I have always thought a somewhat unhappy one, because it is often used without a very exact knowledge of what it includes.

C The learned judge then refers to the decision of P. O. LAWRENCE, J., to which I have already made reference and he gives the substance of what that learned judge said. MAUGHAM, J., goes on to say (ibid., 526):

D I may be allowed to add that there must be many objects of antiquity or curiosity which are not, ordinarily speaking, articles of vertu. I have suggested two, a prehistoric axe-head and an Egyptian mummy. I do not think that anybody in ordinary parlance would describe either of those things as an article of vertu. For my part I, like P. O. LAWRENCE, J., think that an article of vertu must be in some sense a product of the fine arts; and the phrase connotes, if not artistic merit, a certain effort on the part of the person who originally produced it, in the direction of what he conceived to be the fine arts.

E Those passages from those two cases, together with the dictionary definitions referred to in them, seem to comprise all the assistance available to me in deciding this question about the sheriff's chain. It seems to me that the expression "articles of vertu" embraces a very large potential class of articles, and the only common factor possessed by this class is artistic merit of some form or another. Any type of article which a connoisseur or virtuoso might collect for its artistic merit, or the beauty of its workmanship, falls I think within the category. Therefore, in view of the fact that this sheriff's chain is admittedly a valuable article, and what Lady Coxen describes as an article of beautiful workmanship, I think I am justified in holding that it falls within the category of articles of vertu within the meaning of cl. 5 of the testator's will. If the testator had in the course of his will disposed of articles under other generic descriptions than those which occur in cl. 5 of the will—for instance, if he had left to someone else "all my articles of personal adornment" or had used some other expression capable of including this chain, and perhaps more specifically apt to property such as this chain than the expression "articles of vertu," a difficult question might have arisen. But in this will, so far as F I understand it, the only expression which could comprehend this chain is the expression "articles of vertu," and for the reasons I have stated I think that expression is capable of including the chain, and I see no sufficient reason, therefore, why I should not construe it as including the chain. So I will hold that the chain passes to Lady Coxen under cl. 5 of the will.

G H The next question is as regards the Lanchester motor car. Inasmuch as it appears from the evidence that the motor car had been ordered by Lady Coxen on behalf of the testator in his lifetime, it seems to me to be reasonably plain that it was, within the meaning of cl. 5, a motor car ordered for any dwelling-house and/or flat in which the testator might reside at his decease. Those words are, perhaps, not remarkably apt to the case of a motor car because one generally orders a motor car for oneself and not for one's dwelling-house, but it is clear that the relevant clause extending the gift to things ordered for a dwelling-house, and so on, does qualify the whole enumeration which precedes it, because that enumeration is simply introduced by the definite article "the," and that clearly refers forward to the relative clause which shows what articles of the various descriptions the testator intends to include in his gift. Therefore, it appears to me reasonably plain that on the true construction of cl. 5 the motor car passes under it.

That does not entirely conclude the question of the motor car for it had been ordered but not paid for, and further questions are raised as to whether Lady Coxen—who, as I have decided, is entitled to the motor car—is entitled to it subject to the obligation of paying for it. It is urged on behalf of those interested in residue, though tentatively urged, that Lady Coxen has that liability cast on her by virtue of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, s. 35, which provides :

- (1) Where a person dies possessed of, or entitled to, or, under a general power of appointment (including the statutory power to dispose of entailed interests) by his will disposes of, an interest in property, which at the time of his death is charged with the payment of money, whether by way of legal mortgage, equitable charge or otherwise (including a lien for unpaid purchase money), and the deceased has not by will deed or other document signified a contrary or other intention, the interest so charged, shall as between the different persons claiming through the deceased, be primarily liable for the payment of the charge ; and every part of the said interest, according to its value, shall bear a proportionate part of the charge on the whole thereof.
- (2) Such contrary or other intention shall not be deemed to be signified—(a) by a general direction for the payment of debts or of all the debts of the testator out of his personal estate, or his residuary real and personal estate, or his residuary real estate ; or (b) by a charge of debts upon any such estate ; unless such intention is further signified by words expressly or by necessary implication referring to all or some part of the charge.

It is contended that the motor car was, within the meaning of that section, subject to a charge for its purchase price, so that, accordingly, Lady Coxen takes the motor car subject to the obligation to pay for it. In my judgment, that submission is misconceived. The section applies only to a testator who, at the time of his death, is "possessed of or entitled to" property subject to a charge. It is not impossible that a testator might die entitled to a motor car which had been sold to him and which had become his property for which he had not paid, but was still held for his account by a vendor subject to a lien for unpaid purchase money. That is not an impossible state of affairs, but that state of affairs can, surely, only arise where the property in the chattel, namely, the motor car, has passed to the testator, and he has not paid the purchase money. In this case it is not shown (and I think it is reasonably clear on the evidence that it is not the case) that any particular motor car had been at the time of the testator's death appropriated to the performance of this particular contract, or in any other way that property in any particular motor car had passed to the testator under the contract. It seems to me, therefore, that the essential condition for the operation of s. 35 of the Act—namely, that the testator should be entitled to the motor car subject to a charge for payment of money—was not fulfilled. In my judgment, in such a case the effect of cl. 5 of the will, so far as goods ordered are concerned—at all events where the goods were in the situation in which this particular motor car was, that is to say, in the state of not having been appropriated to meet the contract under which they were ordered—is that the testator's executors have to complete the contract so that the particular item is delivered. When it is delivered they must make it over to Lady Coxen as falling within the specific gift to her contained in cl. 5, and no question of Lady Coxen paying the purchase price arises at all either under the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, s. 35, or otherwise.

[HIS LORDSHIP took time to consider his judgment on further questions raised by the summons.]

July 19. JENKINS, J., read the following judgment. The testator in this case, Sir William George Coxen, a former Lord Mayor of London, died on Apr. 7, 1946, leaving his widow, Dame Kathleen Alice Coxen, and one brother him surviving, and his will dated Sept. 4, 1940, with one codicil thereto dated Aug. 14, 1941, was proved on Aug. 24, 1946, in the Principal Probate Registry.

The first of the two questions which I now have to deal with concerns the validity of the trusts declared by cl. 17 of the will concerning the testator's residuary trust fund. The trusts in question (declared subject to the payment of certain annuities as to which no question arises and in the event which happened of the testator having no children) are in the following terms :

- A My trustees shall stand possessed of the trust fund and the income thereof in trust to pay or make over the same to the Court of Aldermen for the City of London to be called "The Sir William Coxen Trust Fund" upon trust out of the income of the trust fund to apply once a year a sum not exceeding the sum of £100 per annum to provide a dinner to the Court of Aldermen when they shall meet to decide the business of this trust and to pay to each member of the committee hereinafter mentioned who shall attend during the whole time of any committee meeting the sum of £1 1s. for his attendance at such meeting and to apply the balance of such income for the benefit of or to pay over the same to all or any of the orthopaedic hospitals of England and other hospitals or charitable institutions carrying on similar work (it being my desire that a preference shall be given to the Royal National Orthopaedic Hospital of Great Portland Street, London), in such shares and proportions as the said committee shall from time to time think fit it being my feeling that young children up to the age of 14 years should be periodically examined to see that they are growing into healthy men and women and that correction in any faults in them that may arise should be made from time to time and it is my desire that the said Court of Aldermen should from time to time appoint a committee of six aldermen of the City of London four who have passed the Chair and two who have not passed the Chair to administer the trust fund And I declare that the receipt of the person who professes to be the treasurer or other proper officer for the time being of any such hospital or institution shall be a sufficient discharge to the said committee.

I should also refer to cl. 20 of the will which is in these terms :

- D I desire that all the persons who are then my trustees shall at the expiration of three years after my death or so soon thereafter as they may in their discretion deem it convenient so to do retire from the trusts of this my will and appoint as trustees in their place the said Court of Aldermen or such persons as the said court shall nominate for this purpose to the intent that the trusts of this my will shall thereafter be carried into execution by or under the direction of the said court.

- E It is not, and clearly could not be, disputed that the purposes for which the balance of the income of the trust fund is expressed to be applicable under the provisions of cl. 17 are perfectly good charitable purposes. It is, however, contended on behalf of the testator's brother (who, subject to Lady Coxen's interest, would be entitled under the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, to any interest in the testator's estate not disposed of by the will and codicil) that the trusts to be satisfied before such balance is arrived at, that is to say, the trusts

- F out of the income of the trust fund to apply once a year a sum not exceeding the sum of £100 per annum to provide a dinner to the Court of Aldermen when they shall meet to decide the business of this trust and to pay to each member of the committee hereinafter mentioned who shall attend during the whole time of any committee meeting the sum of £1 1s. 0d. for his attendance at such meeting

- G are not charitable trusts, and not being charitable are void as infringing the rule against perpetuities. The case is, therefore, said to be one of the type in which a fund or the income thereof is directed to be applied primarily to purposes which are not charitable and as to the balance or residue to purposes which are charitable.

- H I was referred to a number of cases in which the effect of dispositions of this type has been considered, and the result of the authorities appears to be :— (a) that where the amount applicable to the non-charitable purpose can be quantified, the trusts fail quoad that amount, but take effect in favour of the charitable purpose as regards the remainder; (b) that where the amount applicable to the non-charitable purpose cannot be quantified, the trusts, both charitable and non-charitable, wholly fail because it cannot in such a case be held that any ascertainable part of the fund or the income thereof is devoted to charity; (c) that there is an exception to the general rule in what are commonly known as the "tomb cases," i.e., cases in which there is a primary trust to apply the income of a fund in perpetuity in the repair of a tomb not in a church, followed by a charitable trust in terms extending only to the balance or residue of such income, the established rule in cases of this particular class being to ignore the invalid trust for the repair of the tomb and treat the whole income as devoted to the charitable purpose; and (d) that there is an exception of a more general character where as a matter of construction the gift to charity is a gift of the entire fund or income subject to the payments thereout required to give effect to the non-charitable purpose, in which case the amount set free by the failure of the non-charitable gift is caught by and passes under the charitable gift: see (for example) Chapman v. Brown (3), Re Birkett (4), Re Taylor (5) Re Porter (6), Re Dalziel (7), Re Parnell (8). See also TUDOR ON CHARITIES, 5th ed., pp. 61 and 62, and cases there cited.

It is argued that, neither of the above mentioned exceptions being applicable, there must, at all events, be a failure of the trusts of cl. 17 quoad the trust to provide an annual dinner and the trust to pay one guinea to each member of the committee for his attendance at any committee meeting. It is argued further that, although the income applicable to the dinner trust can be quantified by reference to the maximum of £100 per annum set by the will, there is no means of quantifying the income applicable to the payment of guineas to members of the committee, because this depends on the number of committee meetings held and the number of members attending during the whole of each meeting. It is suggested that by meeting daily, or, perhaps, several times a day, the members of the committee might entitle themselves to claim a wholly unpredictable number of guineas on which no limit can be placed by the court. It is, therefore, claimed that the case is one of those in which the amount applicable to charitable purposes cannot be ascertained, with the result that the whole of the trusts of cl. 17 (apart, of course, from the provision for the annuities) must fail as (for instance) in Re Porter (6). I find this suggestion repugnant to common sense. The fund here in question is, I understand, something over £200,000. Suppose the committee met as often as once a week throughout the year (an obviously extravagant estimate) and every committee man attended during the whole of each meeting so as to qualify for his guinea, that would only absorb 312 guineas or £327 12s. per annum, which, being added to the maximum of £100 per annum applicable to the dinner, would make a total of only £427 12s., an insignificant fraction of the total income of the fund. Assuming that the two trusts now under consideration were, indeed, invalid, and assuming the effect of such invalidity to be to produce an intestacy with respect to the income to which they extend, as opposed to augmenting the income applicable to the charitable purposes, I cannot but think that the court would find means to quantify the income applicable to the invalid trusts rather than divert from purposes admittedly charitable (say) eleven-twelfths of the income of a fund because a part of such income, incapable of exact quantification but incapable also on any reasonable estimate of exceeding (say) one-twelfth, is directed to be held on invalid trusts. On this aspect of the case I think the observations of SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., in Re Birkett (4) (9 Ch.D. 578, 579) are much in point. It seems to me that he clearly would have found no difficulty in ascertaining a figure which the trust for paying guineas for attendances at committee meetings could "under no conceivable estimate" exceed, in confining any intestacy due to the invalidity of that trust and the dinner trust to the figure of annual income arrived at by adding his estimate for the former to the maximum set by the will for the latter, and in holding that the charitable trust took effect with respect to the remainder of the income.

I do not, however, think that the argument for the testator's brother should succeed even to this limited extent. It seems to me to ignore the important circumstance that the two disputed trusts are declared in favour of the Court of Aldermen and the members of the committee virtute officii and on the assumption that the Court of Aldermen will accept the trust, and will duly appoint a committee of six aldermen to administer the fund. The testator, no doubt, regarded the provision of an annual dinner on the occasion of the court meeting on the business of the trust as conducive to the attainment of his charitable purpose by encouraging acceptance of the trust by the court and stimulating a good attendance at the annual meeting and a benevolent interest among the aldermen in the affairs of the fund, and, no doubt, also regarded the trust for payment of guineas to members of the committee as similarly conducive by promoting willing service on the committee and punctual and regular attendance at its meetings. Both trusts, though preceding in order the charitable trusts, therefore, seem to me to be essentially ancillary to the charitable trust, and they can clearly only take effect as ancillary to it, because, unless the court accepts the charitable trust and constitutes the committee to administer the fund, there can be no question of providing an annual dinner or of paying guineas to members of the committee. It, therefore, seems to me that, even if the two disputed trusts must be held invalid as being for purposes neither charitable in themselves nor incidental to the attainment of the charitable purpose, the result must simply be that the entire income of the fund is applicable to the charitable purpose on the ground that the

A testator has devoted the whole income to the charitable purpose but has subjected a part of it to trusts designed to promote that purpose by particular means to which effect cannot legally be given. This conclusion can be tested by considering the position which would arise if the Court of Aldermen declined to accept the trust. In such event the two disputed trusts (assuming them to be otherwise valid) would clearly fail for want of qualified objects; yet it

B seems to me it would be perfectly plain that the whole income of the fund would be applicable to the charitable purpose without any question of intestacy as to the amount which would have been required to provide the dinners and the guineas if the trusts for those purposes had not failed. I see no ground for holding that a different result should ensue from the failure of those ancillary trusts for the reasons urged on behalf of the next-of-kin.

It remains to consider whether the trusts in question are, indeed, invalid.

C In my judgment, they are not. It is, no doubt, perfectly true that a trust simply to provide an annual dinner for the Court of Aldermen of the City of London is not charitable, any more than the trust to provide dinners for the Painters Stainers' Company in Re Barnett (9) was charitable. It is also, no doubt, perfectly true that a trust simply to pay periodical guineas to selected aldermen of the City of London is not charitable, but the trusts here in question

D are of a different character. The annual dinner is to be provided for the Court of Aldermen as trustees of the charitable trust when they meet on the business of the trust, and the guineas are payable only to aldermen who are members of the committee administering the charity when they meet for that purpose and subject to the express condition that a member in order to qualify for his guinea must be present during the whole of a given committee meeting. The annual dinner and the guinea attendance fees can, therefore, fairly be regarded

E as in the nature of remuneration in kind or in cash to the trustees and committee of management for their services in administering the affairs of the trust, and, as I have already said, the testator, no doubt, thought that these concrete expressions of his appreciation of the time and trouble involved would be conducive, in the ways mentioned above, to the attainment of his charitable purpose. In other words, his motive and object in providing for the annual dinner and the guinea attendance fees was, I think, clearly to benefit the

F charity and not the members for the time being of the Court of Aldermen or the members for the time being of the committee appointed by them. It cannot be said that these particular modes of furthering his charitable purpose are, in fact, incapable of furthering it. On the contrary, I think there is every reason to suppose that it will be furthered thereby, and of this I think the testator was the best possible judge. Himself a former alderman, sheriff and

G Lord Mayor, no one could know the Court of Aldermen better than he did, or be more capable than he was of devising the most effective method of enlisting their interest in, and sympathy and support for, a charitable project which, after all, has no particular connection with the City of London.

As regards the annual dinner in particular, I find some support for the view I have formed in the decision of EVE, J., in Re Charlesworth (10), where he held that a trust to apply the income of a fund in payment of the expenses

H of the dinners consumed by members of a charitable religious society when attending the meetings of the society was charitable as increasing the usefulness and efficiency of the society, and thus producing effects which were for the advancement of religion. I was also referred to an order of the Vice-Chancellor dated Nov. 26, 1828, which approved a scheme supported by the Attorney-General for the administration of Lawrance Atwill's Charity, of which the Skinners Company were trustees, which included a provision increasing the allowance to be made for an annual dinner for the Skinners Company out of the income of the endowment from £20 (the sum specified by the testator) to £100, owing to the decrease in the value of money in 1828 as compared with 1588, the year of the testator's will. But I have only the order before me, without the arguments or reasons for the decision, and, accordingly, cannot extract any general principle from it.

It was suggested on behalf of the testator's brother that a trust for the payment of remuneration in perpetuity to the trustees for the time being of a charitable trust for their time and trouble in acting as such trustees is void as infringing the rule against perpetuities because such a trust involves a gift in perpetuity which is not per se charitable. No authority was cited to me for the proposition, which I decline to accept. Such a trust is, in my view, a charitable trust not because the recipients of the remuneration are objects of charity, but because the provision of the remuneration promotes the efficient management of the trust. The remuneration is, in effect, an expense of administration. If this were not so, grave difficulties would, as it seems to me, often arise in the administration of charitable trusts. It is, of course, possible to imagine a case in which, owing to the smallness of the funds available, trusts similar to those declared by cl. 17 of the present will might result in the bulk of the income being absorbed in the provision of the annual dinner and the attendance fees, but I think a case of that sort would have to be dealt with by way of scheme, though conceivably the true conclusion might be that there was in the events which happened no effective charitable trust. Be this as it may, I do not think hypothetical difficulties of this type should affect the decision in the present case, in which the size of the fund makes it abundantly plain that only an insignificant proportion of the total income available will be required to provide the annual dinner and attendance fees, even if the maximum is spent on the dinner and the committee meets more often than committees of this type usually do. For these reasons I propose to answer the relevant question by a declaration to the effect that all the trusts of the "Sir William Coxen Trust Fund" declared by cl. 17 of the will are valid charitable trusts.

The other outstanding question is of an entirely different character, and concerns the disposition of the testator's property known as "Wildwood Seal" contained in cl. 2 of his codicil which is in the following terms:

I devise my messuage land and hereditaments known as Wildwood Seal in the county of Kent to my trustees in fee simple upon trust that my trustees shall permit my dear wife Kathleen Alice to reside therein rent free during her life or for so long as she shall desire to reside therein and I declare that from and after her death or if in the opinion of my trustees she shall have ceased permanently to reside therein (whichever shall first happen) my trustees shall stand possessed of the said premises upon the trusts and with and subject to the powers and provision in my said will declared and contained of and concerning my residuary estate (therein referred to as "the trust fund") and I direct that during her life or for such time as she shall reside therein my said wife shall at her own expense pay the usual outgoings and keep the said messuage and premises in good repair and condition and insured against fire to the full value thereof in some office of repute.

It is contended on behalf of Lady Coxen that the provision under which "Wildwood Seal" is to become subject to the trusts affecting the testator's residuary estate "if in the opinion of my trustees she shall have ceased permanently to reside therein" is void for uncertainty because it is a condition subsequent determining her interest in events which are not defined with sufficient precision to make it possible to decide in all conceivable circumstances whether her interest has or has not determined by reason of the provision in question. In support of this contention reliance is placed on Fillingham v. Bromley (11) where there was a gift over in the event of the devisee failing "to live and reside" on a certain estate, and it was held that it was too uncertain what the testator meant by the words "live and reside" for the court to determine that there had been a forfeiture, and on Sifton v. Sifton (12) where it was held by the Privy Council that a stipulation in a will to the effect that certain payments to be made to the testator's daughter should be made only so long as she should continue to reside in Canada was a condition subsequent which was void for uncertainty. On the other hand, in Re Wright (13) where a testator gave a house to his trustees on trust to permit his niece to hold and occupy the same free of rent subject (inter alia) "to her residing upon the

A said premises during her lifetime," KEKEWICH, J., found himself able to hold on the facts that the niece did not reside there within the meaning of the will, and, accordingly, that there would have been a forfeiture under the condition but for the fact that (as he went on to hold for reasons which are not material for the present purpose) the condition had ceased to apply on her marriage. In Re Wilkinson (14), TOMLIN, J., held with respect to a gift by a testatrix to a niece (to whom she had also given a dwelling-house) of the income of a fund "for and during the term of her natural life or until she shall voluntarily cease to make the said dwelling-house her permanent home" that the event prescribed by the words "until she shall voluntarily cease to make the said dwelling-house her permanent home" was not too uncertain to be ascertained. It is true that he held the provision in question to be a limitation and not a condition subsequent, and that his decision is, therefore, not directly in point, but I think the following passage from his judgment ([1926] Ch. 849) has an undoubted bearing on the question I have to decide :

B I confess I do not feel any difficulty in giving a rational meaning to the words "to make the dwelling-house her permanent home"; I think it is reasonably plain what that means; it seems to me it means, to keep it up as what may be colloquially called her headquarters. I do not think there is any particular difficulty in attaching a reasonable meaning to the phrase. I do not propose, and I do not think it necessary for me today to define precisely what I understand the phrase to mean. I am satisfied that it bears a sufficiently definite meaning to enable me to say that there is no case of uncertainty which renders the gift in any way bad, or defective. The fact that the language of the will is not uncertain has, of course, no necessary bearing upon the question whether when particular events have happened there may not be some difficulty in saying whether or not they fall within that which is contemplated by the will; but that is not a matter with which I have anything to do.

D Lastly in Re Talbot-Ponsonby's Estate (15) CROSSMAN, J., held with respect to a devise of an estate to the testator's son "upon condition that he made the same his home" that the condition was not void for uncertainty. In the course of his judgment he said ([1937] 4 All E.R. 312) :

Whether in particular circumstances the devisee has ceased to make the estate his home or not may be difficult to determine, but I am not prepared to hold that it is an impossibility to determine it. I do not hold the condition void for uncertainty.

E Reverting to Sifton v. Sifton (12) I find in the judgment of the Committee (delivered by LORD ROMER) the following passage ([1938] 3 All E.R. 445) :

F Their Lordships' attention was called during the arguments to numerous authorities in which the court has been called upon to consider the meaning of the words "reside" and "residence" and the like. These authorities, however, give their Lordships no assistance in construing the present will. The meaning of such words obviously depends upon the context in which the words are used. A condition, for instance, attached to the devise of a house that the devisee should reside in the house for at least six weeks in a year can present no difficulty. In some contexts, the word "reside" may clearly denote what is sometimes called "being in residence" at a particular house. In other contexts, it may mean merely maintaining a house in a fit state for residence. It is plain, however, that in the present case the word "reside" means something different from either being in residence or merely maintaining a residence. No one can suppose that the testator intended either that his daughter should never leave Canada, or that, so long as she maintained a residence in Canada, she might spend the whole of her time abroad. He must have intended that, though Canada was to be her home in general, yet she was to be at liberty to leave Canada for some purposes and for some periods of time. Unfortunately, he omitted to define either the purposes or the periods.

G This passage, I think, shows (a) that the meaning (whether definite or uncertain) of the words "reside" and "residence" in a will depends on the context in which the words are used, (b) that in some contexts a perfectly definite meaning can be attached to such words, and (c) that the words "reside" and "residence" have different (and less readily ascertainable) implications when used in relation to residence in a particular country from those which they have when used in relation to residence in a particular house. There is, therefore, nothing in Sifton v. Sifton (12) which precludes me from holding the condition here in question to be a valid condition provided I am able to attach a sufficiently definite meaning to it in the context afforded by the codicil, and (as shown by Re Wilkinson (14) and Re Talbot-Ponsonby's Estate (15)) in deciding whether I am able to do so or not I must keep in mind the distinction between uncertainty as to the events prescribed by the testator as those in which the condition is to operate (which is, generally speaking, fatal to the validity of such a condition) and difficulty in ascertaining whether those events (sufficiently prescribed by the testator as a matter of definition) have happened or not, which is not necessarily fatal to such validity. Returning to cl. 2 of the codicil, I have no doubt as to the meaning of the word "reside" in the context which it affords. The trustees are to permit Lady Coxen "to reside" in the house "rent free during her life or for so long as she shall desire to reside therein." I think this quite clearly means personal residence. I think it follows that personal residence is also meant in the words of the disputed condition "if she shall have ceased permanently to reside therein."

It remains to consider what is meant by the word "permanently." This occasions some difficulty as the word is so placed as to be grammatically capable of qualifying either "ceased" (so as to give the meaning "permanently ceased to reside") or "reside" (so as to give the meaning "ceased to reside permanently," or, splitting the infinitive, "ceased to permanently reside"). I think it is reasonably plain that the former (that is "permanently ceased to reside") is what is meant. Therefore, the condition is, as a matter of definition, to operate in the double event of (a) Lady Coxen ceasing personal residence in the house and (b) such cesser being permanent. The latter event involves intention. Lady Coxen must have given up all intention of ever again resuming personal residence in the house, or in other words, must have no "animus revertendi." To put it objectively, she must have given up personal residence once and for all. It seems to me that so far as definition goes the double event involved in the condition as I have construed it is prescribed with sufficient certainty and precision. I see no reason why a judge of fact should not on any given state of facts be perfectly capable of deciding whether it has or has not happened. Indeed, the problem is no more insoluble than the question whether a given individual has in a given state of facts abandoned his domicile of origin and acquired a domicile of choice, which the court has never regarded as incapable of decision. The circumstance that it may be difficult in this or that state of facts to determine whether the double event has happened or not, does not, in my judgment, make the condition bad: see Re Wilkinson (14) and Re Talbot-Ponsonby's Estate (15). I do not see why it should ever be impossible to do so.

I have so far treated the condition as if it was simply in the terms "if she shall have ceased permanently to reside," whereas its actual terms are "if in the opinion of my trustees she shall have ceased permanently to reside." That I think makes a very material difference. The opinion of the trustees that the double event has happened, and not simply the happening of the double event, is what brings about the cesser of Lady Coxen's interest. If the testator had insufficiently defined the state of affairs on which the trustees were to form their opinion, he would not, I think, have saved the condition from invalidity on the ground of uncertainty merely by making their opinion the criterion, although the declaration by the trustees of this or that opinion would be an event about which in itself there could be no uncertainty, but, as I have already indicated, I think the relevant double event is sufficiently defined to make it perfectly possible for the trustees (as the judges of fact for this purpose) to decide whether it has happened or not, and, in my view, the testator, by making the trustees' opinion the criterion, has removed the difficulties which might otherwise have ensued from a gift over in a double event the happening of which, though in itself sufficiently defined, may necessarily be a matter of inference involving nice questions of fact and degree. For these reasons I hold that the provision in question is valid.

Declaration accordingly. Costs of all parties as between solicitor and client to be raised and paid in due course of administration out of the testator's estate.

Re SOUTH NEWINGTON (KINGSTON-UPON-HULL)
MUNICIPAL ELECTION PETITION. LEWIS v. SHEPPERDSON.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Birkett and Slade, JJ.), July 13, 14, 1948.]

Election—Municipal election—Ballot papers—Validity—Papers insufficiently marked with official stamp—Initials written on papers—Mark near name of candidate—Local Government Act, 1933 (c. 51), s. 29, sched. II, pt. III, paras. 18, 34 (a), (c), (d).

A By the Local Government Act, 1933, s. 29: "Subject to the provisions of this Act, an election of councillors of a borough shall be conducted in accordance with the provisions of sched. II to this Act." By sched. II, pt. III, para. 18: "A ballot paper shall be delivered to an elector who applies therefor, and immediately before delivery—(a) the ballot paper shall be marked with the official mark, either embossed or perforated . . ."

B By sched. II, pt. III, para. 34: "Any ballot paper—(a) which does not bear the official mark; or . . . (c) on which anything is written or marked by which the elector can be identified except the printed number on the back; or (d) which is . . . void for uncertainty; shall not be counted . . ."

C At a municipal election, the official mark for the ballot paper was ten perforated holes. A paper was rejected on which there was only one perforated hole and in two places marks where the holes should have been, but the perforation had not gone through the paper. A ballot paper on which the official mark was visible, but the stamp had failed to perforate the paper, was allowed:—

D HELD: where a voter, who had expressed his intention of voting for a particular candidate, was in no way to blame and the only defect in the ballot paper was on the part of the official machinery by which the election was conducted, special consideration should be given so that the voter should not be disfranchised; the intention to apply the official mark was clearly indicated; and the fact that the official stamp had been imperfectly applied did not invalidate the votes.

Gloucester (County) Cirencester Division Case, Lawson v. Chester-Master (1893) (4 O'M. & H. 194), and Birmingham Case, Woodward v. Sarsons (1875) (L.R. 10 C.P. 733), applied.

E Some ballot papers had initials written underneath the cross against the name of the candidate chosen:—

HELD: ballot papers on which initials had been written were void under the Local Government Act, 1933, sched. II, pt. III, r. 34 (c), as the voters could be identified, and they should, therefore, have been rejected.

F A ballot paper which was counted had some pencil marks over the cross against the name of one of the candidates:—

HELD: there was nothing appearing on the ballot paper to invalidate the vote, and it was properly counted.

H SPECIAL CASE, stated, pursuant to an order of BIRKETT, J., dated Mar. 19, 1948, and made under the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, s. 93 (7), on a municipal election petition brought by an unsuccessful candidate under s. 87 (d) of the Act. The petitioner questioned the election on the ground that the respondent "was not duly elected by a majority of lawful votes." The rejection by the returning officer of certain ballot papers, and the admission of others, was challenged. The Divisional Court now held that the respondent was duly elected by a majority of two votes and dismissed the petition. The facts appear in the judgment of the court delivered by BIRKETT, J.

H. R. B. Shepherd and P. Malcolm Wright for the petitioner.
Collard for the respondent.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 14. BIRKETT, J., read the following judgment of the court. This is a petition which arises out of an election for the ward of South Newington in the county borough of Kingston-upon-Hull, for a councillor for that borough. The election took place on Nov. 1, 1947. Mr. Clifford Lewis, the petitioner in this case, was a candidate at that election, and Mrs. Tally Shepperdson, the respondent, was also a candidate—in fact, the petitioner and the respondent were the only two candidates at the election. When the poll was concluded, the returning officer counted 4,114 votes on the ballot papers. Of those votes 2,058 were for Mrs. Tally Shepperdson, the respondent, and 2,056 were for Mr. Clifford Lewis, the petitioner. Thereupon, the respondent was duly declared elected to the office of councillor for the said borough. The matter with which we are now dealing comes before us by way of a Special Case which was ordered in March, 1948, and the facts on which we are asked to come to a decision are the facts which are set out in the Special Case. I say that because a point was raised, with which I will deal hereafter, which was outside the Special Case.

It appears that the returning officer for the election rejected 17 ballot papers, and we are informed in the facts in the Case that the parties agreed that 13 of those 17 votes were properly and correctly rejected. Four, therefore, of the 17 were challenged, and came by way of Special Case to this court. Of those four one was a ballot paper purporting to be a vote for the petitioner on which it was said that there was one perforated hole. The Case informs us that the official mark for the ballot paper was ten perforated holes, and on this particular paper, which is described as having one perforated hole, there are, in addition to the one perforated hole, two holes which are embossed, i.e., the perforation has not gone through the paper, but they were intended manifestly to be perforated holes. The petitioner contends that this is a good and a valid vote and ought to have been counted, while the respondent says that the vote was properly rejected on the ground that there was a want of the official mark. With regard to Nos. 2 and 3 of that category of four, one was a vote marked with a cross for the respondent on which the word "Attan" had been written, and the other was a paper with a cross against the name of the petitioner, on which the name "Moore" had been written. With regard to those two votes, counsel agreed that the court could disregard them, inasmuch as the parties had come to an agreement that they cancelled each other out. Therefore, the court has been no longer troubled with Nos. 2 and 3. The fourth vote in that first category of votes was a vote for the petitioner, and it was challenged on the ground that the initials "F.G." were written on the paper. The petitioner claimed that that was a good and a valid vote, and the respondent said that it was not. Therefore, out of that first category of four votes, two votes remain in issue, both of which on the face of them are votes for the petitioner.

On Dec. 18, 1947, by order of the county court, a scrutiny of the ballot papers which had been counted at the election was held, and on that scrutiny seven further papers, in addition to the four, were challenged and contested. Of these seven, the first (viz., No. 5) was a vote purporting to be for the respondent, and the mark was there on the voting paper, but the perforation had not been made. The respondent thereupon contends that that vote is a good vote and was properly counted, whereas the petitioner says that the vote ought not to have been counted, because the official mark was wanting. The second one (viz., No. 6) is a vote purporting to be for the petitioner, and that ballot paper has, in addition to the mark of the voter, the initials "J.E.C." written on it. The petitioner says that, notwithstanding those initials, the vote is valid and ought to have been counted, whereas the respondent says that it is a bad vote and ought not to have been counted, because it contains on its face writing from which the voter can be identified. With regard to the remaining five votes in that list of seven (viz., Nos. 7-11), they are all said to have been void for uncertainty and ought not to have been counted by the returning officer. The first two contained a mark under the name of the petitioner which is partly in the place reserved for the voters for the petitioner and partly in the place reserved for voters for the respondent. With regard to the third vote, it is a vote purporting to be for the petitioner with a mark underneath it. With regard to the fourth (viz., No. 10), it purports to be a vote for the petitioner with a marking over it, and the last of the seven (viz., No. 11) is a vote purporting to be for the petitioner with an indefinite mark. Of these five, counsel for the respondent conceded that all those votes were properly counted for the petitioner with the exception of No. 10, the one with certain pencil markings over it. Therefore, of this category of seven, three are contested, of which one is a vote for the respondent and two are votes for the petitioner. Then there was a further ballot paper put before us which clearly showed a cross against the name of the respondent, but bears no official mark of any kind, either embossed or perforated. That ballot paper is not included in the Special Case. We said

A that we would reserve consideration whether, as it was not included, we had power under the Special Case to deal with it. Subject to that ballot paper, of the five votes which are in issue four are for the petitioner and one is for the respondent.

The matter is governed by the Local Government Act, 1933. Section 29 of that Act says :

B Subject to the provisions of this Act, an election of councillors of a borough shall be conducted in accordance with the provisions of sched. II to this Act.

Schedule II, pt. III, para. 18, deals with the marking of ballot papers :

A ballot paper shall be delivered to an elector who applies therefor, and immediately before delivery (a) the ballot paper shall be marked with the official mark, either embossed or perforated . . .

C Then there are various other directions about the number, name and description of the elector. The other relevant paragraph is sched. II, pt. III, para. 34, which is headed "Void ballot papers" :

Any ballot paper (a) which does not bear the official mark ; or (b) on which votes are given for more candidates than the elector is entitled to vote for ; or (c) on which anything is written or marked by which the elector can be identified except the printed number on the back ; or (d) which is unmarked or void for uncertainty shall not be counted . . .

D In this case, therefore, the relevant matters in para. 34 are : (a) a ballot paper "which does not bear the official mark" ; (c) a ballot paper "on which anything is written or marked by which the elector can be identified except the printed number on the back" ; and (d) a ballot paper "which is unmarked or void for uncertainty."

E We were referred to several authorities, of which the first, a very important case, is Birmingham Case, Woodward v. Sarsons (1). There are many matters in that case which have no application to the matters with which we are concerned, but LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., delivering the judgment of the court, made the following observations (L.R. 10 C.P. 733, 743-745) :

F As to the first, we are of opinion that the true statement is that an election is to be declared void by the common law applicable to parliamentary elections, if it was so conducted that the tribunal which is asked to avoid it is satisfied, as matter of fact, either that there was no real electing at all, or that the election was not really conducted under the subsisting election laws. As to the first, the tribunal should be so satisfied, i.e., that there was no real electing by the constituency at all, if it were proved to its satisfaction that the constituency had not in fact had a fair and free opportunity of electing the candidate which the majority might prefer. This would certainly be so, if a majority of the electors were proved to have been prevented from recording their votes effectively according to their own preference, by general corruption or general intimidation, or by being prevented from voting by want of the machinery necessary for so voting, as, by polling stations being demolished, or not opened, or by other of the means of voting according to law not being supplied or supplied with such errors as to render the voting by means of them void, or by fraudulent counting of votes or false declaration of numbers by a returning officer, or by other such acts or mishaps. And we think the same result should follow if, by reason of any such or similar mishaps, the tribunal, without being able to say that a majority had been prevented, should

G be satisfied that there was reasonable ground to believe that a majority of the electors may have been prevented from electing the candidate they preferred. But, if the tribunal should only be satisfied that certain of such mishaps had occurred, but should not be satisfied either that a majority had been, or that there was reasonable ground to believe that a majority might have been, prevented from electing the candidate they preferred, then we think that the existence of such mishaps would not entitle the tribunal to declare the election void by the common law of Parliament . . . As to the second, i.e., that the election was not really conducted under the subsisting election laws at all, we think, though there was an election in the sense of there having been a selection by the will of the constituency, that the question must in like manner be, whether the departure from the prescribed method of election is so great that the tribunal is satisfied, as matter of fact, that the election was not an election under the existing law. It is not enough to say that great mistakes were made in carrying out the election under those laws: it is necessary to be able to say that, either wilfully or erroneously, the election was not carried out under those laws, but under some other method. For instance, if, during the time of the old laws, with the consent of a whole constituency, a candidate had been selected by tossing up a coin, or by the result of a horse-race, it might well have been said that the electors had exercised their free will, but it should have been held that they had exercised it under a law of their own invention, and not under the existing election laws, which prescribed an election by voting.

The judgment then deals with the question of the Ballot Act, 1872, which was a matter in that case, and with the various questions with regard to the directions as to voting. Then these observations occur (ibid., 746):

These observations lead us to the conclusion that the enactments as to the rules in sched. I [to the Ballot Act, 1872], and the forms in sched. II, are directory enactments, as distinguished from the absolute enactments in the sections in the body of the Act. And in such case, in order to determine the preliminary question, which is, whether there has been a material breach of the Act—and which must be determined before determining what effect such breach has upon a vote or on the election—the general rule is, that an absolute enactment must be obeyed or fulfilled exactly, but it is sufficient if a directory enactment be obeyed or fulfilled substantially.

The judgment then deals with the manner of voting, and says (ibid., 747, 748):

And therefore, by the general rule before mentioned, it would be necessary that the absolute enactment that the paper should be marked secretly should be obeyed exactly; but it would be sufficient that the manner of marking the paper should be obeyed substantially. If these two enactments be so obeyed, there is no material breach of the Act. The extent of error which is to vitiate so as to annul the ballot paper is further to be gathered from the statute itself. By s. 2 [of the Act of 1872] "any ballot paper which has not on its back the official mark, or on which votes are given to more candidates than the voter is entitled to vote for, or on which anything except the said number on the back is written or marked, by which the voter can be identified, shall be void, and not counted." It is not every writing or every mark besides the number on the back which is to make the paper void, but only such a writing or mark as is one by which the voter can be identified. So, in r. 36: "the returning officer shall report the number of ballot papers rejected and not counted by him, under the several heads of (1) 'Want of official mark'; (2) 'Voting for more candidates than entitled to'; (3) 'Writing or mark by which voter could be identified'; (4) 'Unmarked, or void for uncertainty'." And then, in sched. II, in the note to the form before referred to, we have this warning: "If the voter votes for more than — candidates, or places any mark on the paper by which he may be afterwards identified, his ballot paper will be void, and will not be counted." The result seems to be, as to writing or mark on the ballot paper, that, if there be substantially a want of any mark, or a mark which leaves it uncertain whether the voter intended to vote at all or for which candidate he intended to vote, or if there be marks indicating that the voter has voted for too many candidates, or a writing or a mark by which the voter can be identified, then the ballot paper is void, and is not to be counted: or, to put the matter affirmatively, the paper must be marked so as to show that the voter intended to vote for some one, and so as to show for which of the candidates he intended to vote. It must not be marked so as to show that he intended to vote for more candidates than he is entitled to vote for, nor so as to leave it uncertain whether he intended to vote at all or for which candidate he intended to vote, nor so as to make it possible, by seeing the paper itself, or by reference to other available facts, to identify the way in which he has voted. If these requirements are substantially fulfilled, then there is no enactment and no rule of law by which a ballot paper can be treated as void, though the other directions in the statute are not strictly obeyed. If these requirements are not substantially fulfilled, the ballot paper is void, and should not be counted; and, if it is counted, it should be struck out on a scrutiny. The decision in each case is upon a point of fact, to be decided first by the returning officer, and afterwards by the election tribunal, on petition.

Then the court went on to deal with the facts in the particular case.

The only other case to which I need refer is Gloucester (County) Cirencester Division Case, Lawson v. Chester-Master (2), where HAWKINS, J., said (4 O'M. & H. 194, 195, 196):

In several others of the ballot papers the official stamp itself had beyond doubt been applied to the back, but there seems to have been a deficiency of ink upon the stamp, and the impression was not by any means so clear as it would have been if greater care had been taken by the stamper. It was obvious, however, to us, and would be equally obvious to the presiding officer; and we think it is not necessary that there should be in every respect a clear and distinct impression of every part of the stamp, but that it is quite sufficient if the evidence afforded by that which appears on the back of the paper leads us to the conclusion that the stamp was applied there with the intention of making the required mark; and we cannot help remembering that which we constantly see—official stamps upon law proceedings imperfectly impressed, and yet not open to objection, nor even questioned. We think, therefore,

A that all the objections to the ballot papers upon the ground that the official marks were defectively marked upon the backs of them fail, and that it is quite sufficient if there is such evidence of the official mark, whether it is perforated through the paper, whether the ink is caused to run through the paper so as to indicate the official mark, or whether the stamp is applied but fails to make a perfect mark, in all such cases, if there be evidence that the presiding officer has intended to make, and has in fact made, what, fairly looked at, indicates that a recognisable official mark is upon the back of the ballot paper, votes marked on such papers ought to be held good votes

B in the absence of any other substantial objection.

That being so, the decision to which we have come with regard to the challenged votes in this case is that the first one to which I have already made reference, viz., the one for the petitioner on which there appears the one perforated hole and the two embossed holes, ought not to have been rejected on the ground that there was a want of the official mark, although the ten perforated holes

C plainly do not appear. Applying the reasoning in the Cirencester case (2), we are satisfied that the marks which do appear indicate the intention to apply the official mark. Although it was not perfectly done, we think the paper ought not to have been rejected on that account. In every other respect the vote is perfectly plain, and no other substantial objection can be raised to it. We think that, in a case where the voter is in no sense to blame, where he has

D intended to vote and has expressed his intention of voting in a particular way, and, so far as his part of the transaction is concerned, has done everything that he should, and the only defect raised as a matter of criticism of the ballot paper is some defect on the part of the official machinery by which the election is conducted, special consideration should (and, no doubt, would) be given, in order that the voter should not be disfranchised. So far as this one vote is concerned, it is quite clear from the cross in the petitioner's section that the

E voter did all that he could possibly do to record his vote. The only challenge was the fact that the official stamp had been imperfectly applied. We are satisfied that there was the clear intention to apply it and we shall allow that vote for the petitioner.

The next ballot paper to consider is the vote for the petitioner with the initials "F.G." on it. Learned counsel for the petitioner, I think, recognised his difficulty there quite frankly. He had already conceded that, so far as the ballot

F paper was concerned which was marked "Moore," he could not hope to succeed in the contention that that vote ought not to have been rejected, and, similarly, counsel for the respondent made the same concession with regard to the ballot paper with the word "Attan" written on it. The only question, therefore, is whether this vote for the petitioner with "F.G." written on it ought to have been rejected by the returning officer on the ground that it bore marks by which

G the voter could be identified. We are clearly of opinion that it was properly rejected on that ground. The learned counsel put before us yesterday many facsimiles of voting papers with initials on them into which I need not go at this moment, but, having regard to the rule with regard to this particular matter, it is perfectly plain that where a voting paper has the initials "F.G." on it, the voter can be identified. Therefore, we think that that vote, which was purported to be given for the petitioner, was properly rejected by the returning

H officer.

Thus, out of the first category of four (viz., the votes which were rejected), which had been challenged, one of those votes, viz., for the petitioner, ought to have been allowed, and, therefore, the petitioner has one more vote to his credit.

We now come to the second category, consisting of the seven ballot papers which were counted and are challenged. The first is the vote for the respondent in regard to which it was said that the marking had failed to perforate the paper. Applying the principle which I have enunciated from the Cirencester case (2), the voter had clearly voted for the respondent. No possible challenge could be made about that ; the voting paper was clearly and squarely marked, and there was no initial or writing on it. The official mark is plainly there in the sense that there are the imperfectly perforated holes, which I described previously as being embossed, and it is quite plainly a case where, owing to a deficiency in the stamping machine, or something of that nature, the full perforations had not been made. The conclusion to which we have come, applying the principles which I have enunciated, is that that vote for the respondent was properly allowed. With regard to No. 6, the vote for the petitioner on which the letters "J.E.C." appear, applying the principle which I have already mentioned, we think that that vote ought not to have been accepted by the returning officer as there was clearly an infringement of the direction with regard to the ballot paper, since there was on it, in addition to the vote, writing by which the voter could be identified. With regard to the remainder, viz., Nos. 7-11, I need only trouble about No. 10, because it is conceded that the other votes for the petitioner were properly accepted. With regard to No. 10, there was clearly the official mark, and there was most plainly the cross in the petitioner's square, but the voter apparently had put some pencil marks on it, and it was submitted to us that the voter had indicated that he was seeking to cancel the vote. We think that that contention really cannot be sustained. On the other hand, it may very well be that the voter was intending to emphasise his vote. At any rate, we cannot think that anything appearing on that ballot paper is such as to invalidate the vote, and that vote, we think, was, therefore, properly counted for the petitioner.

When the matter came before us, the respondent had a majority of two. The vote which we think ought to be allowed for the petitioner in the first category (viz., No. 1) would, therefore, reduce that majority to one. With regard to the seven in the second category, No. 5 (where the mark had failed to perforate the paper) had already been counted, so that it does not increase the majority. No. 6, the one for the petitioner with "J.E.C." written on it, in our view, ought not to have been accepted, so the respondent's majority goes to two. With regard to No. 10, we think that the vote there for the petitioner was properly counted. The result, therefore, is that, on the result of this scrutiny, the result of the election remains exactly the same. If that be so, we do not deal with the vote which was not included in the Special Case, because we think there is no reason to do so. It is quite plainly a vote for the respondent on which no mark of any character appears by way of official mark, and, undoubtedly, that vote should have been rejected. It would, however, make no difference to the result, so, in that event, we do not propose to deal with it. It was clearly a vote which was outside the Special Case, and we should require a little argument and persuasion before we could come to the conclusion that it was open to us to deal with matters outside the Special Case, but, in the result, it is immaterial whether we do or whether we do not. In those circumstances, we do not propose to deal with it. The result, therefore, of this petition, is that it fails, and our duty is to say that, on this scrutiny, the votes, in the result, remain the same, and the respondent's majority of two votes remains unchanged.

Petition dismissed with costs.

SHORT AND ANOTHER v. TREASURY COMMISSIONERS.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Porter, Lord Uthwatt, Lord du Parcq, Lord Normand, Lord Morton of Henryton), June 28, 29, July 29, 1948.]

Emergency Legislation—Control of undertaking—Compulsory acquisition of company—Transfer of shares to government nominees—Price to be paid for shares—Defence (General) Regulations, 1939 (S.R. & O., 1939, No. 927, (as amended)), reg. 78 (5).

A On Mar. 17, 1943, the Minister of Aircraft Production, in exercise of his powers under the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, reg. 55 (4), appointed a controller of the undertaking of a company. On Mar. 22, 1943, the Minister ordered to be transferred to his nominees all the shares of the company. On May 31, 1943, by a further order, made under reg. 78 (5) of the Defence Regulations, the price of the shares so transferred

B which were arrived at by reference to the prices of the shares of those classes ruling on the stock exchange at the date of the appointment of the controller. The shareholders contended that, as the transfer was of all the shares in the company, the appropriate mode of fixing the price of the shares was either (i) to ascertain the value of the whole undertaking and then to determine the proportionate value of the separate classes of shares and of individual shares within each class, or (ii) to apportion the value of the totality of the shares in one hand, so as to comprehend the value of the complete control of the undertaking thereby conferred.

C HELD : the price referred to in reg. 78 (5) was that to be paid for "any shares," which referred to those embraced in an individual holding, and not to the value of the shares as a whole; it was convenient to decide the value of individual holdings by reference to the Stock Exchange price at the date of the appointment of the controller; and, therefore, the method of valuation adopted was in principle correct.

Decision of the COURT OF APPEAL ([1947] 2 All E.R. 298), affirmed.

D Per LORD UTHWATT : If some one shareholder held a number of shares sufficient to carry control of the company, it might well be that the value proper to be attributed to his holding under reg. 78 (5) was greater than the sum of the values that would be attributed to the shares comprised in that holding if they were split between various persons.

G APPEAL from a decision of the Court of Appeal ([1947] 2 All E.R. 298), affirming a decision of MORRIS, J. ([1947] 1 All E.R. 22), who held that when an order was made by the Minister of Aircraft Production under the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, reg. 78, transferring the shares of a company to his nominees, each shareholder was divested of the value of the shares which he held and the rights to which the shares entitled him and not of some aliquot part of the property of the company, and, therefore, the basis of valuation of the shares which the Treasury had adopted, viz., the Stock Exchange quotations in respect of the shares at the date of the appointment of the controller of the company, was proper. The House of Lords dismissed the appeal. The facts appear in the opinion of LORD PORTER.

H Sir David Maxwell Fyfe, K.C., and C. W. Turner for the appellants.

Sir Cyril Radcliffe, K.C., and H. L. Parker for the respondents (the Treasury Commissioners).

The House took time for consideration.

July 29, 1948. LORD PORTER : My Lords, this is an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal affirming a decision of MORRIS, J., in the High Court. The question at issue involves a consideration of the sum to be paid to certain shareholders in Short Brothers (Rochester and Bedford, Ltd., whom I shall call Short Brothers, by the Treasury when taking over the shares in that company.

The issued capital of the company consisted of three classes of shares, viz., 230,475 redeemable preference shares of £1 each (as to which no question arises), 250,000 A ordinary shares of 5s. each, and 581,302 ordinary shares also of 5s. each. The voting power was concentrated in the ordinary shares and each A ordinary share entitled its holder to four votes as against one vote in the case of each ordinary share. No distinction, however, has been made or is claimed to exist between these two types of share for the purpose of this case, though it is clear that any one possessing 200,000 A shares would have control of the company. The appellants have, I understand, been chosen so as to represent the interests concerned, Mr. Short holding 22,958 A ordinary and Lonsdale Investment Trust, Ltd., the second appellant, 3,000 ordinary shares. The claim arises in this way as appears in the printed Case for the respondents:

3.—(1) By the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, reg. 55 (4), a competent authority was empowered for (inter alia) the efficient prosecution of the war to appoint by order an authorised controller of any undertaking to exercise with respect to the undertaking such functions of control on behalf of His Majesty as might be provided by the order.

(2) By reg. 78 (1) of the said regulations where an order appointing an authorised controller had been made in the case of an undertaking carried on by a company, the competent authority, if satisfied that it was necessary for the purpose of securing effective control, was empowered with the consent of the Treasury by order to transfer the shares of the company to such transferees as might be specified in the order.

(3) By reg. 78 (4) it was provided that where an order had been made under para. (1) thereof the shares should on such date as might be specified in the order vest in the transferees on behalf of the competent authority free from any mortgage, pledge or charge.

(4) By reg. 78 (5) the price to be paid in respect of any shares transferred by virtue of such an order was to be such price as might be specified in an order made by the Treasury, being a price which, in the opinion of the Treasury, was not less than the value of the shares as between a willing buyer and a willing seller on the date of the order made appointing the authorised controller.

(5) By reg. 78 (7) if any person who immediately before the date of transfer had an interest in any of the shares claimed that the price specified by the Treasury was less than the value aforesaid the value of the shares in which that person had an interest should be determined by the arbitration of a qualified accountant nominated by the Lord Chief Justice of England.

4. By an order entitled Short Brothers (Rochester and Bedford) Limited Control Order, 1943, dated Mar. 17, 1943, the Minister of Aircraft Production, in exercise of his powers under reg. 55 (4), appointed an authorised controller of the undertaking of the company.

5. By an order entitled Short Brothers (Rochester and Bedford) Limited (Transfer of Shares) Order, 1943, dated Mar. 22, 1943, (hereinafter referred to as the "transfer order"), the said Minister, with the consent of the Treasury, transferred as at Mar. 23, 1943, all the shares in the company to his nominees . . .

6. By an order entitled Short Brothers (Rochester and Bedford) Limited (Price of Shares) Order, 1943, dated May 31, 1943 (hereinafter referred to as the "prices order"), the respondents specified the following prices: (a) 22s. 3d. per share in the case of the five per cent. redeemable cumulative preference shares; (b) 29s. 3d. per share in the case of the A ordinary shares; (c) 29s. 3d. per share in the case of the ordinary shares.

7. . . . Both appellants gave notice that they were dissatisfied with the prices fixed for their shares by the prices order and Mr. Sydney John Pears, a qualified accountant, was nominated by the Lord Chief Justice of England to act as arbitrator and to assess the value of the said A ordinary and ordinary shares. For convenience it was agreed that the claims of the appellants should be treated as test cases and that, if the arbitrator held that the prices to be paid by the Treasury to the appellants should be in excess of those specified in the order, the Treasury would pay those revised prices in respect of all shares of these classes, irrespective of whether other former holders had themselves claimed arbitration.

8. The arbitration was held on Oct. 15, 16, 17, 18, 1946, and on Oct. 30, 1946, the arbitrator stated his award in the form of a Special Case for the opinion of the court.

As appears from the award itself the respondents contended that the proper basis of valuation under reg. 78 (5) was to assume that the shares had been purchased in individual blocks from individual shareholders on the date of transfer and to fix the value accordingly, and that, in fact, that value was best ascertained from the prices ruling on the Stock Exchange on the relevant date, viz., the date on which the controller was appointed. The appellants, on the other hand, contended that, the transfer being a transfer of all the shares, the Stock Exchange value was not a true criterion inasmuch as no order transferring the shares under reg. 78 (1) was authorised unless it provided for the expropriation of all the shares. As they maintained, the proper method for fixing the price was first to ascertain the value of the whole undertaking and then to determine the proportionate value of each class of shares. They stressed the argument that the Crown was taking, and could only take, the whole of the shares, and, therefore, must acquire the whole undertaking. No one, they contended, could acquire all the shares in a company except by paying for the business as a whole, and if the business as a whole is acquired, its value should be paid for. That, they say, was the view of the arbitrator, and he has stated what that value amounts to when the appropriate division among the ordinary shares has been made. Even if, however, the shares be treated as purchased in individual blocks the same result, so the appellants contend, is arrived at, because the potential value which is attributable to the opportunity of acquiring complete control must be taken into account.

My Lords, as I understood the argument of the appellants, no point was made that an inaccurate principle had been adopted or untrue figures accepted if the true method of ascertaining the shares was to value them share by share. Admittedly, the Stock Exchange price was not necessarily the value of shares calculated on this principle, but it was cogent evidence of their value and the appellants acknowledged that it would be useless to send the case back to the arbitrator unless their method of ascertaining the values were adopted. In deciding which of the views presented to your Lordships is right, it is plain that regard must be had to, and the result reached by a consideration of, the language of reg. 78, and, primarily, of para. 5 of that regulation. That paragraph can, I think, be expressed in shortened form so as to exhibit its essential quality. In that case it would run :

The price of any shares transferred shall be not less than the value of those shares as between a willing buyer and a willing seller on the date of the order made by the authority under reg. 55 (4).

The date of an order made under reg. 55 (4) is the date on which a controller of the business is appointed, and in the present case that date was Mar. 17, 1943. The value, then, which the arbitrator must put on the shares is that which they had on Mar. 17, 1943, and, in my view, that which they had before the controlling order was made, whether the effect of making it decreased or increased their value, that date being chosen, as I think, in order to make sure that no fictitious value should be placed on the shares by reason of the fact that the government were taking control and might expropriate them. At that time it was not, in fact, known that the undertaking was to be taken over or the shares transferred. They were not, in fact, transferred until Mar. 22 and the Prices Order did not come into force until Mar. 23. In such circumstances it is difficult to see why the shares, if bought in individual blocks, should have any increased value attributed to them because the whole were transferred at a subsequent date. Nor do I think their value would be enhanced because there was a possibility of the government subsequently taking them over. That factor must have been well known to both brokers and jobbers, and would be a circumstance which would affect the value on the Stock Exchange. There is, therefore, no reason for attributing an increase in value to such a possibility.

As to the alternative argument that the value of the business as a going concern should first be ascertained and then that global sum should be divided in due proportions between the different classes of shareholders, no doubt, if the regulation had stated that the shareholders were to receive the value of their shares calculated on their value on the sale of their business as a going concern, the appellants' claim would be correct, but, to my mind, the regulation makes quite a different stipulation. It is true that under the order all the shares are to be transferred, but though all are transferred to the nominees of the Treasury, all are not transferred from one person, and it is the value to the willing seller of his holding which has to be ascertained, not a potentiality of control which he does not possess. The paragraph speaks of the price of "any shares" which naturally refers to those embraced in any individual parcel and it is those shares, not the shares as a whole, the value of which is to be ascertained as between a willing buyer and a willing seller, a phrase which, in my mind, means a willing buyer and a willing seller of those shares. If it were not so, there would be great difficulty, if not impossibility, in distributing the total sum obtained as the price of the undertaking among the various classes of beneficiaries in cases where there were a number of different classes of shares, and even in the present case where the preference shareholders are only entitled to the nominal value of their shares on a winding-up the question might arise as to their value when they were being paid off, but the company was not being wound-up.

This is the conclusion I should come to on the wording of para. 5 above, but such a construction is supported when one finds the phrase "any shares" used in paras. 6 and 7 as applicable to individual shares and not to the shares as a whole. It is true that that phrase is used in those paragraphs in reference to individual interests in particular shares, and, therefore, it is necessary to interpret its use as applying in those paragraphs to the shares or parcels of shares individually, but the phrase is the same in each case, and I see no reason for interpreting it in a different sense in three successive paragraphs. It is used, I think, of individual shares in paras. 6 and 7 because that is its natural meaning, and the fact that it is so used is a ground for refusing to attribute a less natural meaning to it in para. 5.

My Lords, in reaching this conclusion I do not find myself assisted by the provisions of other statutes or regulations dealing with the price to be paid for expropriated shares. Each contains its own terms and deals with questions incidental to the transfer of the particular interest taken over by the government in specified industries. They follow no general principle and have no bearing the one on the other. Nor, when dealing with shares, do I find any useful analogy in the principles on which the value of land compulsorily acquired is to be determined. If the principles adopted in Vyricherla Narayana Gajapatiraju (Raja) v. Revenue Divisional Officer, Vizagapatam (1) be accepted as correct (which for the purposes of this case I am prepared to assume), viz., that land compulsorily acquired must be valued not merely by reference to the use to which it is being put at the time at which its value has to be determined, but also to the uses to which it is reasonably capable of being put in the future, still, in the first place, in the case of land the owner possesses a tangible asset whereas a shareholder has no direct share in the assets of a company. He has such rights as the memorandum and articles give him and nothing more. In the second place, as has already been pointed out, there is no reason to suppose that the potentialities of the shares as existing before the control order was made were not fully represented in the Stock Exchange price. My Lords, for these reasons, which are substantially those which influenced the learned judge and the Court of Appeal, I would dismiss the appeal and order the appellants to pay the respondents' costs.

LORD UTHWATT : My Lords, the point which the appellants seek to make good is that the appropriate method of fixing the price to be paid for shares acquired under reg. 78 is to ascertain the whole value of the undertaking of the company, and then in light of that value to determine the proportionate value of the separate classes of shares and of individual shares within each class.

The matter is put in two ways—first, on the construction of the regulation, and, secondly, (assuming the appellants to be wrong on the question of construction) as a necessary consequence of the value to be attributed to the potentialities of any share acquired pursuant to the regulation. The first argument rests on the undoubted fact that the competent authority exercising the power conferred by reg. 78 must buy all the shares of the company. Paragraph 5 is, it is urged, to be construed against this background. All the shares taken as a single block are worth the value of the undertaking and each share must as a matter of construction of the regulations have a price allotted to it on the basis of that value.

My Lords, I agree that in construing para. 5 the background must be borne in mind, but I fail to see that this fact in any way assists the appellants. The transaction provided for by paras. 1 and 4 of the regulation is in form and substance the acquisition of shares by means of separate dealings with each shareholder. Paragraph 5 follows up this conception. On its plain language it is concerned with the fixing of a price as respects each and every share acquired. It is not concerned with fixing a price as respects all the shares taken as a single block or, as respects any share, a price based on the value of all the shares taken as a single block. There is nothing in para. 4 to suggest that in fixing a price the nature of the dealing in respect of which a price is to be fixed—an individual dealing—is to be thrust out of consideration, and the simple language used in this paragraph is not capable of being twisted into the complicated formula embodied in the appellants' contention. The picture painted on the background is clear and definite. I desire only to add that, if some one shareholder held a

A number of shares sufficient to carry control of the company, it might well be that the value proper to be attributed to his holding under the regulation was greater than the sum of the values that would be attributed to the shares comprised in that holding if they were split between various persons. The reason is that he has something to sell—control—which the others considered separately have not. The contention of the appellants, if accepted, would, as the Court of Appeal point out, deny him the real value of his holding.

B The second argument, as I understood it in its final form, was as follows. In an inquiry as to the value of the shares as between a willing buyer and a willing seller, all possible buyers are to be taken into account. Among those buyers here was the competent authority, which, if it became a buyer, was necessarily committed to buying all the shares, and was, on the face of the regulation, buying for the purpose of obtaining control. In each individual

C transaction with a shareholder, therefore, the competent authority must be assumed to be ready to bargain in light of the potentialities of the share or its special adaptability to his purpose, namely the forwarding of the acquisition of control by him. Its value to him for that purpose was to be considered. My Lords, I do not think the phrase "potentialities of the share" or "special adaptability" carry one anywhere, or, indeed, have any particular meaning in relation to a share. A share always has the same qualities and potentialities.

D The appearance of a buyer needing the share for his particular purposes does not add to or detract from those qualities. But the argument does not rest on the aptness of these phrases. The substance of it is that the competent authority is to be included among the possible willing buyers, and that, wanting control, he must be taken as prepared to pay for it up to the hilt. Its value is, therefore, to be determined by the proportionate interest in the company's undertaking which it represents. There are, I think, more answers than one to this argument.

E I choose the easiest of them. That answer is that the argument disregards the facts. The competent authority can acquire under the regulation according to its true construction and not otherwise. One is, therefore, thrown back on the regulation. Under the regulation, though all the shares were to be acquired, they were to be acquired only through the machinery of a compulsory transaction with each shareholder. The price was to be not less than the value

F as between a willing buyer and a willing seller on the date of the order appointing an authorised controller—which must be read as on that date immediately before the appointment of a controller took effect. That I call the critical date. The conclusion desired by the appellants—that, in valuing the individual blocks of shares, their proportionate share in the assets of the company measures the value between a willing buyer and a willing seller—cannot, therefore, be reached unless it be assumed that on the critical date—before any steps had

G been taken to bring the company in any form under control—there was a certainty that the competent authority would apply to the company a regulation in possibility applicable to all companies, and a certainty that the competent authority would ultimately step in and buy all the shares. The making of the assumption is obviously out of the question. Without that assumption the argument produces no result. I would dismiss the appeal.

H LORD DU PARCQ : My Lords, I find myself in complete agreement with the opinions of my noble and learned friends who have just addressed your Lordships, and also with the opinion of my noble and learned friend, LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON, which I have had an opportunity of reading in advance. I do not desire to add any words of my own. I am authorised by my noble and learned friend, LORD NORMAND, whose public duties require his attendance elsewhere, to say that he agrees with those opinions and has nothing to add.

LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON : My Lords, the respondents contend that the proper basis of valuation of the shares in Short Brothers (Rochester and Bedford), Ltd., under reg. 78 is to assume that the Minister has acquired all the shares in the company in individual blocks from individual shareholders on the date of the control order of Mar. 17, 1943, and on this assumption to fix the value of all the shares on the basis of the prices ruling on the Stock Exchange on that date. It is common ground between the parties that there is nothing in reg. 78 which compels the arbitrator to fix the value of the shares on the basis of the Stock Exchange prices. On the facts of this case, however, if the respondents' contention on the main question of construction is correct, I think that the Stock Exchange prices afford a fair criterion of the value of each block of shares, as between a willing buyer and a willing seller, on the relevant date.

For my part, I feel no doubt that the respondents' contention is correct. The regulation contemplates that the competent authority shall acquire all the shares in the company at one and the same time, but it also contemplates that he shall obtain these shares from the individual shareholders and that each shareholder shall be paid for his shares in accordance with the provisions of para. (5) of the regulation, which has already been read. The phrase "the price to be paid" assumes a seller and a buyer, and the "shares transferred" belong to the individual shareholders in the company. Each shareholder is a seller and in each case the competent authority is the buyer. The price is to be "not less than the value of those shares as between a willing buyer and a willing seller" on the relevant date. These words mean, to my mind, that each shareholder is to be assumed to be a willing seller of his shares on that date, and the competent authority is assumed to be a willing buyer of these shares on that date. This is, in my view, the natural meaning of the words used in para. (5), and if that paragraph is read, as it ought to be read, in conjunction with paras. (6) and (7), it becomes still more clear that the price is to be fixed on the basis of sales of their respective holdings by individual shareholders. Paragraph (6) is clearly dealing with the case in which a block of shares belonging to an individual shareholder is subject to a mortgage, pledge or charge, and para. (7) gives each individual shareholder a right to go to arbitration if he thinks that the price to be paid for his shares is less than their true value.

The contention of the appellants gives rise to many difficulties. I shall mention only one. If they are right, the phrase "those shares" in para. (5) means all the shares in the company, and the regulation is providing for a valuation of all the shares in the company, as one mass, on the basis of the value of the whole undertaking. If this is so, the regulation contains no provisions for apportioning this lump sum among the holders of various classes of shares. It is extremely unlikely that any regulation would be framed in such a way, and paras. (6) and (7) seem to me quite inconsistent with the view that only such a "mass" valuation has been dealt with in para. (5). In my view, the Court of Appeal and MORRIS, J., rightly construed reg. 78, and this appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS v. ELECTRIC AND MUSICAL INDUSTRIES, LTD.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Singleton, J.), July 5, 6, 1948.]

Excess Profits Tax—"Income received from investment"—Fees from licences to perform gramophone records in public collected and distributed to members by company limited by guarantee—Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939 (c. 109), sched. VII, pt. I, para. 6 (1), (2).

To protect themselves against infringement of their copyright entitling them to the exclusive right of the performance in public of their records, groups of gramophone record manufacturers incorporated a company limited by guarantee and not having a share capital, with power, under its memorandum and articles of association, to exercise and enforce on behalf of its members all rights and remedies of the members by virtue of the Copyright Act, 1911; to grant, on behalf of its members individually, licences for public performance of records; to collect fees in respect thereof; and to divide the net moneys so received among its members. By art. 6 of the articles of association each member granted to the company sole power to grant licences on his behalf for the public performance of his records, and, by art. 9, all moneys received by the company in respect of the exercise of the rights granted by the member were to be the property of the company.

HELD: the moneys received by a member of the company did not constitute "income from an investment" within the meaning of para. 6 (1) of pt. I of sched. VII to the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939, but was income arising to the member in the course of its trade as manufacturer of gramophone records, and, therefore, fell to be included in the computation of the member's profits for the purposes of excess profits tax.

CASE STATED by the Special Commissioners of Income Tax, who held that certain fees received by the taxpayers from a company limited by guarantee, incorporated to protect their copyright interests in respect of the performance in public of their gramophone records, were income from an investment within the meaning of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939, sched. VII, pt. I, para. 6 (1), and therefore were to be excluded from their profits for the purposes of excess profits tax. The appeal by the Crown was allowed. The facts appear in the judgment.

SINGLETON, J.: The Gramophone Co., Ltd., which was a subsidiary company of Electric and Musical Industries, Ltd., throughout the accounting period, manufactures gramophone records, and in 1933 obtained judgment in the High Court in Gramophone Co., Ltd. v. Stephen Cawardine & Co. (1), establishing that manufacturers of gramophone records have such a copyright under s. 19 of the Copyright Act, 1911, as entitles them to the exclusive right of performance in public of records made by them, so that they are entitled to restrain the use of those records for public performances. In due course manufacturers of gramophone records took measures to protect themselves against infringement of their copyright by the use of records for public performances without licence, and the manufacturers—there are two groups of them, the Electric and Musical Industries group and the Decca group—formed a committee to co-ordinate the arrangements for granting licences for public performances of their gramophone records. The business increased, and became very remunerative as the figures in this case show. It was decided later that other means should be taken to look after the copyright interests of the gramophone record makers, and to provide for the collection of fees for the granting of licences. Accordingly, on May 12, 1934, Phonographic Performance, Ltd., was incorporated as a company limited by guarantee, and not having a share capital. Since that time matters of the kind I have mentioned have been in the hands of the Phonographic Co., and in the accounting period July 1, 1943, to June 30, 1944, the sum of £17,265 17s. 1d. was paid over by the Phonographic Co.

to the Gramophone Co. in respect of what I may describe as their share of a balance remaining due, after expenses had been paid.

The question is whether that sum of £17,265 17s. 1d. received by the Gramophone Co. constitutes income from an investment in the hands of the Gramophone Co., and has thus to be excluded from its profits for the purposes of excess profits tax. The submission made on behalf of the Crown is that this sum of £17,000 odd was not income received by the taxpayers from an investment. The argument put forward by counsel for the taxpayers is that the sum constituted income from investment, so that it ought to be excluded from the computation of its profits for the purposes of excess profits tax. A

The question arises under the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939, s. 12 (1), which reads :

Where the profits arising in any chargeable accounting period from any trade or business to which this section applies exceed the standard profits, there shall, subject to the provisions of this part of this Act, be charged on the excess a tax (to be called the excess profits tax) equal to three-fifths of the excess. B

Schedule VII to the Act provides for computation of profits and capital for purposes of excess profits tax, and in pt. I, which contains rules for adaptations of income tax principles as to computation of profits, para. (6) (1) says :

Income received from investments shall be included in the profits in the cases and to the extent provided in sub-para. (2) of this paragraph and not otherwise. C

Sub-paragraph (2) is :

In the case of the business of a building society, or of a banking business, assurance business or business consisting wholly or mainly in the dealing in or holding of investments, the profits shall include all income received from investments, being income to which the persons carrying on the business are beneficially entitled. D

It is to be noticed that para. (6) (1) deals with income from investments only, and it is different from the Act of 1937 in that respect, because sched. IV, para. (7) of that Act, provided :

Income received from investments or other property shall be included in the profits in the cases and to the extent provided in this paragraph, and not otherwise . . .

The Act of 1939 in this respect leaves out the words "or other property," and consequently one is concerned only with income received from investments.

To determine the question one has to look at the memorandum and articles of association of the Phonographic Co. and, as I think both sides agree, at certain minutes which have been passed from time to time, and one has to see what has been done in order to get the general view of the position. First, with regard to the memorandum of association, the objects for which the company are established are : E

3 (A) To exercise and enforce on behalf of members of the company, being manufacturers of gramophone records, perforated rolls and other contrivances by means of which sounds may be mechanically reproduced (all of which contrivances are hereinafter included in the term "record") and/or the owners of or being otherwise entitled to the benefit of or interest in the copyright in such records (hereinafter called "the proprietors") all rights and remedies of the proprietors by virtue of the Copyright Act, 1911, or otherwise in respect of the public performance of records. F

3 (B) In the exercise or enforcement of such rights and remedies to grant licences and to make and from time to time to rescind, alter or vary any arrangements and agreements with respect to the public performance of such records in any and every respect whatsoever, and to collect and receive and give effectual discharges for all royalties, fees and other moneys payable under any such licences agreements or arrangements or otherwise in respect of such public performances by all necessary actions or other proceedings, and to recover such royalties, fees and other moneys, and to restrain and recover damages for the infringement . . . 3 (C) To obtain from the proprietors such assignments, assurances, powers of attorney, or other authorities or instruments as may be deemed necessary or expedient for enabling the company to acquire the legal estate in the copyrights of such records, and to exercise and enforce in its own name or otherwise all such rights and remedies as aforesaid, and to execute and do all such assurances, agreements and other instruments and acts as may be deemed necessary or expedient for the purpose of the exercise or enforcement by the company of such rights and remedies as aforesaid. G

3 (D) To make and from time to time alter or vary any rules for regulating (1) the manner in which the period or periods for which, and the conditions under which the proprietors shall authorise the company to exercise and enforce the rights and remedies aforesaid of the proprietors in respect of such records aforesaid ; (2) the method and proportions H by and in which and the times at which the net moneys received by the company in respect of the public performance of any such records as aforesaid shall be divided and apportioned among the members of the company.

Reliance was placed by counsel for the Crown on the commencement of cl. 3 (A), which states that one of the main objects for which the company is established is to exercise and enforce "on behalf of the members of the company . . ." The members are the different companies who were making or producing gramophone records, divided as they were into the two groups I have already mentioned—the Electrical and Musical Industries group and the Decca group. Those companies, seven in number, were signatories to the memorandum, and became members of the company. The first of the articles of association referred to was art. 4 :

The subscribers to the memorandum of association and such other persons as the directors shall admit to membership in accordance with the provisions hereinafter contained shall be members of the company.

Article 6 :

Every member who is the proprietor of the whole or any part of the performing rights in any record may, on or at any time after his election, and shall, if and when requested by the directors in writing so to do, assign to the company in the form prescribed by the company his interest, whether present or future, in such performing rights, and until such assignment and so far as such assignment may not extend, every member, by virtue of his application for membership, and his election as a member by the directors, grants to the company for and during the period of his membership, but subject to the provisions of arts. 10 and 11, the sole power and authority (a) to authorise or permit or forbid the public performance of all or any records the performing rights in which is or shall during his membership be or become vested in him ; (b) to grant licences on his behalf for the public performance of all or any of such records.

As I understand the submission on behalf of the taxpayers it is that in some way the Phonographic Co. obtained a beneficial interest in the copyright of the music and the records. It seems to me that the rights of the Phonographic Co. in the copyright of any such record must be acquired under art. 6, and not otherwise. I have not seen any document purporting to transfer any right otherwise, nor have I seen anything which intimates to the Phonographic Co. that some new record was ready for their handling. All that I am given is art. 6, and when that is examined it shows, in the first place, that every member may assign to the company in the form prescribed his interest in such performing rights. He may do that. It is optional on him at that stage but if he does not do that of his own volition he shall, if and when requested by the directors in writing so to do, assign to the company in the form prescribed by the company his interest in such performing rights. There is nothing to show that at any time any member did assign of his own volition, or that he was requested by the company to do so at any time, or that he did so. Thereupon it seems to me the position must be dealt with under the later part of art. 6 :

. . . until such assignment and so far as such assignment may not extend, every member, by virtue of his application for membership, and his election as a member by the directors, grants to the company for and during the period of his membership, but subject to the provisions of arts. 10 and 11, the sole power and authority . . . (b) to grant licences on his behalf for the public performance of all or any of such records.

So it would appear that the position is that the members of the company (and the Gramophone Co. was one of them), by virtue of the application for membership, grant to the company the sole power and authority to grant licences.

It is said by counsel for the taxpayers that the beneficial interest in the copyright passed to the Phonographic Co. I think, putting it another way, the Special Commissioners found that there was an equitable assignment of copyright. I confess I prefer to read it as it appears from the article itself, that the members must be deemed to have granted to the company the sole power and authority to grant licences, etc. Whether that is quite the same thing I am not so sure, but I think one ought to have regard to the words of the article in the first place. Article 7 is :

Every member, by virtue of his application for membership and his election as a member by the directors, authorises the company for and during the period of his membership in their or his name, but at their sole charge and expense (a) to collect fees and subscriptions and all moneys, whether for the performance of any of the records the performing rights in which are vested in or controlled by the company or by way of damages or compensation for unauthorised performances thereof . . .

Article 8 is :

No member shall be at liberty to transfer his membership to any other person or to alienate or exercise the performing rights vested in the company by the member, or controlled by the company by virtue of his membership, or by the articles required to be so vested or controlled . . .

Article 9 is very important :

All moneys received by the company in respect of the exercise of the rights, licence or authority granted by the member shall be the property of the company, and shall be by them dealt with in accordance with the rules for the time being in force.

From time to time resolutions were passed as to how the money should be dealt with, and they are bound up with the memorandum and articles of association. The copy of the resolution of Mar. 15, 1937, an extraordinary resolution, is to this effect :

That in pursuance of the powers reserved by cl. 3 (D) of the memorandum of association, on and after Dec. 1, 1936, (1) The distribution of revenue to members shall be on the basis of user of records as shown by the returns made by the company's licensees. (2) The fees received from the British Broadcasting Corporation and other broadcasting companies shall be kept separate and distinct from the fees received from all other licensees. (3) The company's auditors shall certify what proportions of the company's expenses shall be debited as against the collection of each of the two forms of revenue mentioned above ; and (4) Each member shall receive his proportion of each form of revenue based on the user of records after the expenses allocated by the company's auditors thereto shall have been deducted therefrom.

The Case exhibits certain other documents, and, in particular, an agreement of Mar. 19, 1937, made between the taxpayers and the Decca Record Co., Ltd., each on behalf of themselves and their subsidiary companies, relating to the distribution of the revenue of the Phonographic Co. There were slight variations in that. It also exhibits a copy of a minute, dated Oct. 4, 1944, relating to the distribution of the net moneys, and in that document there is a total sum of £66,577 10s. 10d., part of which is represented by the amount in this case. There is also exhibited a copy of an agreement dated Mar. 1, 1940, between the persons, firms, companies and societies, carrying on business as music publishers, whose names are set forth in the first schedule thereto, and the gramophone record manufacturers, of whom the Gramophone Co. is one, relating to the payment to the publishers of 10 per cent. of the gross revenue from public performances, the payment to be made by the Phonographic Co. as agent for the manufacturers. That was used, or called in aid, by counsel for the Crown to show that in that respect at least it was admitted that the Phonographic Co. was acting as agent for the manufacturers generally. There was no dispute as to that. Other articles, to which my attention was drawn, were, in particular, arts. 46 and 68. I am not going to read them. The point which was made in regard to art. 68, and indeed some other matter which was referred to, was that nowhere in the memorandum and articles is there raised any question of any mention of profits. It is said that in art. 68 there is a provision that there must be once at least in every year an income and expenditure account, but there is no provision anywhere for arriving at the profits of the company, and so it is submitted that this company was not a company setting out to make any profit, but was a company formed for some other purpose entirely. The submission of counsel for the Crown is that the company was in fact formed for the express purpose of managing this business, of farming out the right to give public performances of these records, and the right to collect revenue thereon.

On these facts the Special Commissioners made certain findings, but I have felt some difficulty about the paragraph which may be said to contain their findings of fact. Paragraph (6) of the Case is :

Evidence was given at the hearing which we accepted as follows : A minute similar to the minute in para. 5 (4) above was passed by the Phonographic Co. each year.

That is the minute for the division of the money available.

No legal assignment of the right to grant licences was made by the Gramophone Co. to the Phonographic Co. The licence covered every known make of record and the Phonographic Co. was in possession of the copyright of them all:

It is that part in particular which I do not follow.

For the year ended May 31, 1944, between 20,000 and 30,000 subjects recorded were in the repertoire of the Gramophone Co.

The Special Commissioners give their decision in this way :

A The question we have to decide is whether the sum of £17,265 17s. 1d. received by the Gramophone Co., Ltd., in respect of the year ended May 31, 1944, was income from an investment or whether it constituted income arising to that company in the course of its trade as manufacturer of gramophone records. In our opinion, in order for the Crown to succeed in this appeal, it is necessary to establish that the Phonographic Co. was throughout acting as an agent for its members, including the Gramophone Co., Ltd., in granting licences and collecting payments. The circumstances of the case and in particular cl. 3 (D) (1) and (2) of the memorandum and arts. 9 and 46 of the articles, in our opinion, negative the existence of an agency. It is true that no legal assignment was granted by the Gramophone Co., Ltd., to the Phonographic Co. in respect of the granting of licences. In our view there was an equitable assignment by the Gramophone Co., Ltd., of the whole of its beneficial interest in the copyright as regards public performances of records. Thereafter its interest, in this respect, was confined to membership of the Phonographic Co. and the obtaining of its share of the profits available for distribution. We regard the receipt of the sum of £17,265 17s. 1d. in the nature of a dividend from an investment. The Phonographic Co. did, in one respect, act as an agent of the Gramophone Co., Ltd., in making payments to publishers under the agreement dated Mar. 1, 1940. These payments are made out of the share of the respondent company group before the net amount receivable is arrived at. We do not consider that the manner in which these payments were made affects the conclusion at which we have arrived. The Phonographic Co. also made payments to artistes, who performed the recording, under the terms of the specimen letter. These payments were not made as agent of the Gramophone Co., Ltd. In our opinion, in the particular circumstances of this case, the fact that the Phonographic Co. was a company limited by guarantee is not material. We hold that the said sum of £17,265 17s. 1d. was income received from an investment held by the Gramophone Co., Ltd., and that the appeal succeeds.

In those circumstances the Crown appeals, and asks me to say that the findings of the Special Commissioners, in so far as they are findings of law, are wrong. Counsel for the Crown, puts forward two points. In the first place he submits that there was no making over of any property by the Gramophone Co. at all, either in fact or in law. There was a grant of something, but there was nothing to show that any property had passed or that there was anything in the nature of any equitable assignment whatever. His submission was that the general set up shows that that which was taking place was really no more than the Phonographic Co. acted as agents to do that which the Gramophone Co. and other manufacturers might have done for themselves. He instanced the fact that in the early days, after the judgment in the Chancery Court, the arrangements were made or done through the committee. At last, he said, the business became too big for that committee, and so the Phonographic Co. was incorporated in order to do that which the committee had done before. The Phonographic Co. was given certain powers, but all its acts, he submitted, were done as agent for and on behalf of members. His second point was that, if there was anything made over to the Phonographic Co., it was not by way of investment, but was merely a method of exploitation by the manufacturers of the copyright to the extent of the performing rights in the way of their trade. He amplified that a little in this way. He said the arrangement, if it was an agency, was really nothing more than a business deal, the one saying to the other, "I cannot well do this work myself; I am too tied up with other things; you do it on these terms," the terms being contained in the memorandum and the articles of association, the contract between the member, the Gramophone Co., and the Phonographic Co. He submitted there was nothing in the nature of an investment at all. Counsel for the taxpayers pointed out that the Phonographic Co. under the articles had the sole right to grant licences, and he submitted that there was, and could be, no question of agency here, especially having regard to art. 9. He submitted that there passed to the Phonographic Co., by reason of art. 6, a beneficial ownership in the copyright, or in the right to grant licences to give public performances. The Phonographic Co., having that beneficial right, had also, by virtue of art. 9, the ownership of all moneys received by the company in respect of the sale of or payment for the grant, or in respect of damages received for infringement. Article 6, submitted counsel, taken by itself might not be decisive on the position, but once you have art. 9, there can be no agency. He was in some little difficulty, I thought, in pointing out just what was transferred by art. 6, but his real point was based on art. 9. I asked him what was the asset which was transferred, and he answered me "the asset, or the investment, is my membership of and interest in the Phonographic Co." He said: "I obtained that investment in return for handing over the beneficial interest in the copyright of these records in so far as public performance is concerned." It is a little difficult and complicated. I think his strongest arm against there being an agency really rests on art. 9. Article 9 does not, I think, carry any further forward the passing of anything from the Gramophone Co. to the Phonographic Co. All that it says is that the monies received by the Phonographic Co. are the property of the Phonographic Co. Counsel for the Crown, in reply, treated art. 9 rather as something in the nature of accounting. He pointed out that, if the Phonographic Co. vis-a-vis its members remained in the position of agent and principal, then the Phonographic Co. would have to account for the expenditure in respect of each member's records, etc. They would be in much the same position as a trustee, and they would have to account for each individual transaction, whereas under the rules they made by means of the minutes they were able to deal with the position generally and to decide on a general method of distribution, based on the user of records, after expenses allocated by the company's auditors were deducted therefrom. Counsel submitted that was the only reason for art. 9.

I feel, I confess, very considerable difficulty about this. If I have to judge on the general appearance of the matter I cannot help thinking that this looks more like an agency transaction than an investment. On the other hand, the argument under art. 9 has impressed me. The second point has also to be considered. It is that, even if there was anything in the nature of a making over of something to the Phonographic Co., this was all rather a method of exploitation by the manufacturer of the copyright to the extent of performing rights in the way of his trade. In other words, it is a business arrangement made for the convenience of the Gramophone Co. and other manufacturers that they should have someone to manage their business for them in this way. In support of that submission counsel for the Crown cited to me Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Desoutter Bros., Ltd. (2), a case not precisely in point, but one in which there are expressions, which are most useful, on "investment" and "income from investment." The decision in that case, in so far as it affects this case, is that the exploitation of a patent in the hands of a manufacturer differed from that of a mere passive owner in that only in the latter case could the income from the patent be properly described as income from an investment. In the circumstances of the case, therefore, the income received by the taxpayers under the agreements was not income derived from investments within the meaning of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939, sched. VII, pt. I, para. 6, but income of the trade or business and, as such, liable to tax. LORD GREENE, M.R., in his judgment says this ([1946] 1 All E.R. 58, 59):

The third argument was the one that was dealt with by the commissioners ... In a somewhat similar case, Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Rolls-Royce, Ltd. (3), a question relating to income derived from patent licences came up for decision. MACNAGHTEN, J., there held that the particular income in that case was not income from an investment within the meaning of para. 6 of the schedule.

The MASTER of THE ROLLS then read the relevant words of sched. VII., pt. I, para. 6, to the Act of 1939 and added:

In order, therefore, that income from an investment is to be treated as a profit, it must be an investment which falls within the language of sub-para. (2). In the Rolls-Royce case (3) MACNAGHTEN, J., held that an income derived from the patent licences in that case was not income from an investment within the meaning of para. 6. When the present case was before the commissioners, that decision of MACNAGHTEN, J., had not been given. The commissioners, not being bound by that decision, came to this conclusion: "We, the commissioners who heard the appeal, were of opinion that the word 'investment' in the said para. 6 was apt to include patents which had been licensed and which were yielding a royalty income and that the said royalties were income from investments." MACNAGHTEN, J., reversed that decision, following, without further comment, his own decision, in the Rolls-Royce case (3). Attempts have been made by counsel on both sides to suggest some comprehensive test or definition which would enable the court to discover whether a particular piece of income is income received from an investment or not. MACNAGHTEN, J., in the Rolls-Royce case (3) applied a test which was, put shortly, this: that before you can have anything properly called an investment, you must have the placing of money into it in order to acquire it or bring it into existence. Applying that test, MACNAGHTEN, J., came to the conclusion that the patents in that case were not investments because they had come into existence not by putting money into them but by making the invention which the patent protected. Speaking for myself, I am always disinclined to accept any general definition or test for the purpose of solving this type of question. The question whether or not a particular piece of income is income received from an investment must, in my view, be decided on the facts of the case. The facts must be ascertained, and then the question has to be answered. For the court to find itself fettered by some apparently comprehensive attempt at a definition directed to the solution of the problem in relation to one type of property, I cannot help thinking is unfortunate. It may well be that a definition or test, when applied to one type of property, is a useful method of approaching the particular problem in the particular case; but to take it as a guide in other cases is apt to be extremely dangerous, and certainly, in the present case, I do not propose to do it. As I view this case, it falls to be decided in rather a different way. The facts of the case, for the present purpose, are shortly these. Here is a manufacturing company carrying on a manufacturing business in this country. It makes and sells certain specialities protected by patents here, and in the United States of America. A patent is a peculiar type of property. In considering what it is and what is the nature of the income from it, it seems to me to be only confusing to attempt to find analogies and comparisons with war loan, real property, and other types of property. One has to remember exactly what a patent is. I am not concerned to dispute the proposition that in some cases, and in some sets of circumstances, a patent may fall within the description of investment within the meaning of para. 6. But the question in the present case, whether the income derived from these patents is or is not an investment, must be determined by the true character of that income, and the true nature of the source of the income which is derived by this particular company in this particular way.

Later in his judgment, the MASTER OF THE ROLLS said (ibid., 61):

But directly the patent is held by a manufacturer of the patented article, it seems to me that the situation is entirely changed. When you have a manufacturer who is exploiting his monopoly right, not merely by excluding all competitors, but by letting one competitor in on terms, to say that the profits so derived are profits from an investment seems to me to be a misuse of language. It is contrary to what one may call the popular conception of the word "investment," which is not a word of art, but has to be interpreted in a popular sense.

Counsel for the taxpayers, in dealing with this argument, submitted that he had a finding in his favour in this case, and that the question was largely one of fact. I think in many cases it may well be so, but in a case such as this the decision has to be arrived at from a consideration almost wholly of documents—the memorandum, the articles, resolutions and the like. I think really it then becomes a matter of what is the true inference to be drawn and really it is a question of law. So I regard it in the circumstances of this case. MAC-KINNON, L.J., in the Desoutter Bros., Ltd. case (2) agreed with the judgment of the MASTER OF THE ROLLS, and said (ibid., 63):

I think that the word "investments" in the relevant sections of the statute is not a word capable of legal definition. Like so many words in modern legislation, it is a word of current vernacular. On the facts of this case, I do not think that the income derived by the appellants under these American agreements was income from investments within the meaning of that English word, for the reasons so aptly stated by LORD GREENE, M.R.

TUCKER, L.J., agreed, and said (ibid.):

The company, whose business it is to invent, manufacture, and supply tools cannot, in my view, be said to be making an investment when it takes out patents for the protection of its own products. Nor can it be said to be making an investment when it enters into an agreement for the exploitation of the said patents taken out for that purpose.

A further case was cited to me, Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Tootal Broadhurst Lee Co., Ltd. (4), and in that case the decision in Desoutter Bros., Ltd. (2) was applied. That case, which came before TUCKER, SOMERVELL and EVERSHED, L.JJ., I need not read, but I draw attention to the fact that all the Lords Justices refer to passages in the judgment to which I have referred, and in particular EVERSHED, L.J., referred to the judgment of MACKINNON, L.J., in this way ([1947] 2 All E.R. 409, 414):

Those contractual rights included the contractual right to receive sums described as royalties, but, in my judgment, applying the test laid down by MACKINNON, L.J., that the word "investment" must be given a business sense according to current vernacular, it is impossible to say that the sums received are received from an investment in that sense.

Those are the nearest decisions on this point, though counsel for the taxpayers referred me to Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Gas Lighting Improvement Co., Ltd. (5). I draw attention to the fact that in the present case I have not had before me any balance sheet showing how the assets are treated, nor have I seen any profit and loss account or anything of that kind. I do not think it matters greatly. I merely draw attention to it, because of the observation of LORD SUMNER (129 L.T. 481, 488). The real argument put forward on behalf of the taxpayers is based on art. 6, coupled with art. 9. Counsel's submission, on the decision in the Gas Lighting Improvement Co. case (5), is that there was no difference between that case and the present case. True in that case the company was a company which had a shareholding, whereas in the present case it is a company limited by guarantee, but that, he submitted, made no difference at all. He particularly referred me to two passages in LORD SUMNER's speech (ibid., 489); and he submitted that the taxpayers had parted with an asset in return for an interest in the company and that on the basis of the decision of the House of Lords in the Gas Lighting Improvement Co.'s case (5), the motives were quite immaterial. If shares are taken in return that must be held to be an investment, he submitted, and in the present case the fact that the company was a company limited by guarantee made no difference at all, and, consequently, the money should be held to be invested, and the £17,000 odd fell to be treated as income from an investment.

I have considered the submissions made to me, and my conclusion is this. I regard the case as nearer to an agency case than an income from investment case. I agree to some extent with counsel's submission that art. 9 does make it difficult to regard this as an agency case. It seems to me to be something in the nature of a mixture. It is difficult to put into words what I mean, but it really is an arrangement made by the different members, and in particular by the Gramophone Co., for the convenience, I think, of their business. It is largely a matter of agency, but if you resolve it down to the end it does appear to me more in the nature of a business deal, as counsel for the Crown put it. The new ground, which was put forward by the Crown is that the Gramophone Co. handed over its property in its copyright to be managed by the Phonographic Co., along with the property of other members of the Phonographic Co. on the terms of receiving a share of the profits to be derived from the management of the property—I am not sure that "profits" is the right word. I think it is rather on the terms of getting that which they would have got if they had taken the trouble to manage it themselves—subject to any expenses incurred, deducted according to the rules. The letter giving notice that this further ground would be raised on this appeal states:

... the sum of £17,265 17s. 1d. was the consideration received by the Gramophone Co. in respect of the accountable period for the right of the Phonographic Co. to collect the royalties for the period under the Gramophone Co.'s copyrights; and that the relation between the two companies was a contractual relation of trader and customer.

There are several sentences in that new ground which, in my view, do not put the position accurately. I prefer it as put by counsel for the Crown in his argument, and I look on it as beginning with something in the nature of an agency but ending rather as contractual relation of trader and customer. That is what I think it was.

I have considered whether in any sense this can be described as income from an investment. I do not see how it can, according to the ordinary use of language. It is difficult, as I say, to find out what is transferred by the Gramophone Co. to the Phonographic Co. It is wholly different from the basis of any ordinary company trading for profit, because profit does not seem to be in contemplation,

It is in part management, and in part the relationship of trader and customer. It is not, in my view, a case in which the £17,000 odd can be treated as income from an investment in the popular sense or in any other sense. For these reasons I have come to the conclusion that this appeal must be allowed.

Appeal allowed with costs.

HAIN STEAMSHIP CO., LTD. v. MINISTER OF FOOD.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Sellers, J.), July 1, 2, 5, 1948.]

B Charterparty—Freight—Computation—Carriage of specified cargo—Option to charterer to ship other lawful merchandise—Freight to be paid at rate agreed for specified cargo—Vessel completely loaded partly with specified cargo and partly with optional cargo.

Demurrage—Computation—Lay days—Carriage of specified cargo—Option to charterer to ship other lawful merchandise—Vessel completely loaded partly with specified cargo and partly with optional cargo—Calculation of demurrage on cargo actually loaded and discharged.

C A charterparty provided that the chartered vessel should load a full and complete cargo of wheat and/or maize and/or rye in bags and/or bulk and deliver the cargo on being paid freight at the rate of 81s. per ton for wheat and/or maize and/or rye. The charterparty contained the following clause: "(6) Charterer has the option of shipping other lawful merchandise . . . in which case freight to be paid on steamer's dead-weight capacity for wheat in bags on this voyage at the rate above agreed on for heavy grain, but steamer not to earn more freight than she would if loaded with a full cargo of wheat in bags . . . All extra expenses in loading and discharging such merchandise over heavy grain to be paid by charterer." The steamer was to be loaded at the rate of 500 tons per running day and, at the destination, cargo was to be received at an average of not less than 1,000 tons per weather working day for bulk cargo and not less than 750 tons for bagged cargo, otherwise demurrage was to be paid at the rate of 8d. per G.R.T. per day or pro rata for part of a day. Exercising his option under cl. (6) the charterer loaded the ship to capacity with specified cargo of maize in bulk, and optional cargo of linseed in bags and pollards, a total of 8,858 tons, or 579 tons short of the vessel's dead-weight capacity for wheat in bags of 9,437 tons.

F HELD: (i) the freight should be calculated, not on the dead-weight capacity of the ship for wheat in bags, less an allowance for shrinkage, but on the actual delivered weights of the cargo weighed on discharge and the estimated delivered weights of cargo not weighed on discharge, plus the 579 tons by which the tonnage fell short of dead-weight capacity for wheat in bags, less an allowance for the saving in discharging expenses through such cargo not having been shipped.

(ii) in arriving at the amount of demurrage the lay days should be calculated on the cargo actually loaded and discharged respectively.

SPECIAL CASE stated by an arbitrator in respect of freight and demurrage payable by the charterer. The arbitrator accepted the shipowners' computation for both claims. The court reversed the arbitrator's finding in respect of freight and affirmed his finding in respect of demurrage. The facts appear in the judgment. A

SELLERS, J. : This Special Case raises questions of the construction of the terms of the "Centrocon" form of charterparty, and, in particular, of cl. 6. This clause was described in 1909, by BRAY, J., in Red "R" S.S. Co. v. Allatini Brothers (1) (100 L.T. 268, 269) and again in 1925, by ROWLATT, J., in Mazarakis (A. & C.) v. Bunge Y. Bord, Ltd. (2) (23 Lloyd L.R. 275), as puzzling and difficult to construe. It has remained unchanged to the present time and again comes up for consideration in a different set of circumstances. B

The owners of "Trevoze" claim freight and demurrage against the charterer, the Minister of Food, under a charterparty dated Oct. 18, 1946, in the form of the Chamber of Shipping (River Plate) Charterparty, 1914, Homewards, the code name of which is "Centrocon." The relevant clauses of the charterparty are as follows : C

2. That the said steamer . . . shall . . . proceed as ordered by the charterer or his agents to the undermentioned ports or places and there receive from them a full and complete cargo of wheat and/or maize and/or rye in bags and/or bulk. 3. The steamer shall load as follows, viz., at one or two safe loading ports or places in the River Parana . . . and the balance of the cargo in the Port of Buenos Ayres, La Plata or Montevideo at charterer's option . . . 4. Being so loaded the steamer shall . . . proceed . . . to discharge at a safe port in the United Kingdom including Northern Ireland . . . and deliver the cargo . . . on being paid freight at the rates hereinafter mentioned. 5. 81s. per ton for wheat and/or maize and/or rye . . . all per ton of 2,240 lbs. English or 1,016 kilos (gross weight delivered) . . . 6. Charterer has the option of shipping other lawful merchandise, cotton, sugar, Quebracho wood, Quebracho extract and distillery residue excluded, in which case freight to be paid on steamer's dead-weight capacity for wheat in bags on this voyage at the rate above agreed on for heavy grain, but steamer not to earn more freight than she would if loaded with a full cargo of wheat in bags. This option can only be used if the quantity of other lawful merchandise as above shall amount to not less than 200 tons. All extra expenses in loading and discharging such merchandise over heavy grain to be paid by charterer. The charterer is to have the full reach and burthen of the steamer including tween and shelter decks, bridges, poop, etc. (provided same are not occupied by bunker coals and/or stores). 13. The steamer shall be loaded at the rate of 500 tons per running day, Saturdays after 1 p.m. and Sundays and holidays excepted, otherwise demurrage shall be paid by the charterers as per cl. No. 48 . . . 20. The freight shall be paid as follows viz. : on the right and true delivery of the cargo, in cash. 25. At destination cargo to be received at the average rate of not less than 1,000 tons per weather working day (Sundays and holidays excepted) for bulk cargo, and at the average rate of not less than 750 tons per weather working day (Sundays and holidays excepted) for bagged cargo . . . 41. Charterers have the option of ordering the vessel to discharge at two safe ports in the United Kingdom including Northern Ireland, as follows :—Two ports on the west coast of United Kingdom . . . at 2s. 6d. per ton extra on the entire cargo . . . 48. Demurrage in loading and/or discharging to be at the rate of 8d. per G.R.T. per day, or pro rata for part of a day. D E F G

The "Trevoze" arrived at Buenos Aires on Nov. 13, 1946, and between then and Dec. 15, 1946, loaded 8,858 tons made up of four parcels, viz., maize in bulk, linseed in bags (two parcels), and pollards in bags. The out-turn weight of maize at Liverpool was just over 2,213 tons. That was the only specified cargo shipped and carried, the linseed and pollards being shipped under the option granted to the charterer by cl. 6. The total cargo loaded filled the carrying space of the ship, but its total weight was 579 tons short of the ship's dead-weight capacity for wheat in bags, which the learned arbitrator found to be 9,437 tons. The shipowners did not allege any breach of the charter-party and there was no claim for dead-freight. The first issue between the H parties is what is the freight payable in the circumstances under the charter-party. The shipowners take the dead-weight capacity of the ship for wheat in bags as 9,437 tons, translate that into a delivered weight by making an allowance of 0.75 per cent. for shrinkage or shortage, which gives just over 9,366 tons delivered, and claim 83s. 6d. per ton on that. The cargo was discharged at Liverpool and Avonmouth and the 2s. 6d. per ton extra provided by cl. 41 has been added to the 81s. per ton under cl. 5 to make the 83s. 6d. The charterer, on the other hand, makes his assessment of freight due by taking the actual delivered weights of the parcel of maize and one parcel of linseed at Liverpool and the estimated delivered weights of the remaining two parcels at Avonmouth where the cargo was not weighed on discharge, which total just over 8,796 tons and by charging this at 83s. 6d. a ton. The charterer agrees an additional liability in respect of the 579 tons which were short of the ship's dead-weight capacity for wheat in bags, but claims to deduct from the freight on this amount at 83s. 6d. a ton the discharging expenses which the shipowner has been saved by the cargo not, in fact, having been shipped, and, therefore, not handled in discharge. The difference between the two sums so calculated is £41 7s. 9d. and the charterer has paid all the freight claimed except that balance.

The shipowners relied on the construction given to the clause in Red "R" Steamship Co., Ltd. v. Allatini and Others (1). In that case the specified cargoes were wheat, maize, linseed and rapeseed in bags or bulk and none of these was shipped. A part cargo—about half—of oats and barley was shipped, and the shipowner claimed against three receivers of the cargo under bills of lading that they were liable for the sums of money which the receivers had respectively deposited to release their goods from the lien which the shipowner asserted he had for the balance of freight and for dead-freight. The charterparty gave a lien for dead-freight. BRAY, J., held that as other lawful merchandise had been shipped the clause dealing with that (comparable to cl. 6 here) applied as between shipowner and charterer, that it provided for a lump sum freight, that it mattered not what amount of cargo was carried, and that the freight was a fixed sum and there could be no dead-freight. I quote that brief passage in BRAY, J.'s judgment where he says (100 L.T. 268, 270):

As between them it seems to me there was no dead-freight. The shipowner was entitled to his lump sum, neither more nor less, however much or little he carried. The charterer would not be entitled to say that the shipowner should receive less, because he might have reduced the loss by taking in other cargo for other persons. It would not be a question of reducing damages, because it is not a question of damages . . .

This view was upheld by the Court of Appeal and the House of Lords and expressed conveniently by FLETCHER MOULTON, L.J., in the Court of Appeal in a passage where he says (101 L.T. 510, 513):

We have seen that the charter-party primarily contemplates a cargo based on wheat and/or maize and/or linseed and/or rapeseed. But clause 16 gives to the charterer the option of shipping other merchandise—i.e., of turning the ship into a general ship, with no restriction on the kind of cargo it may carry, except that it must not contain Quebracho wood or sugar. But if the charterer avails himself of this privilege, the terms of an affreightment are wholly changed. The freight to be paid to the shipowner is no longer so much per ton, but it is a lump sum calculated on the facts of the vessel, and not on the facts of the cargo which she may ultimately be required to carry. It is the same whether much or little cargo is carried and whatever nature it may be.

The shipowners in the present case based their claim on such a lump sum freight on delivered and not shipped weights. The charterer relied, at least in part, on A. & C. Mazarakis v. Bunge Y. Bord, Ltd. (2). In that case part of the cargo was of the specified heavy grains and part of optional cargo, and the total cargo filled the ship and gave the same dead-weight as a cargo of wheat in bags would have done. The shipowners claimed that the freight earned was a lump sum for the whole of the cargo fixed, by reason of cl. 6, by taking the dead-weight capacity of the ship for wheat in bags and multiplying it by the rate of freight for heavy grain with the limitation that the ship was not to earn more freight than she would if loaded with a full cargo of wheat in bags. This claim was rejected by all the courts and by the learned arbitrator. LORD SUMNER, who expressed the view of all the members of the House of Lords, said (26 Lloyd L.R. 169, 172):

The preferable construction of cl. 6 is, that in the event of a due exercise of the option given by that clause, freight, earned by right delivery and calculated on the delivered weights of the several sorts of cargo delivered, is to be paid at the rate agreed above for heavy grain, but so that, either the steamer shall have been loaded to her marks, or, if not, the total freight paid shall not be less than the agreed rate for wheat in bags on a full and complete cargo, duly delivered. The expression "lump sum charter," so much relied on in argument, is, I think, for present purposes misleading. It may well be that the freight payable under cl. 6 is such as to preclude any claim for dead-freight if the ship had not been loaded to her marks at her final port of loading. Such a case arose in Red "R" Steamship Co. v. Allatini (1), but it is not the case here, and I therefore think that the expressions there used about a "lump sum" do not apply now. In no other respect does this term fit the present charter. Nothing that was said in Allatini's case (1) is a binding authority to determine how the calculation of the charterparty freight is to be made when a full cargo has been both shipped and delivered but has lost weight by evaporation during the voyage. There is no true lump sum, but only the result of a particular calculation by multiplying rates of freight with tons of cargo. It is a "weight and rate" freight in every sense, dead-freight alone excepted. Viewing the charter in this way, nothing happens on the exercise of the option given by cl. 6 except the necessity for applying the rates, named and measured as in cl. 5, to any unnamed cargo not within cl. 2. In other respects the calculation and payment of freight takes place as if the option had not been exercised.

The learned arbitrator has accepted the shipowners' contention and held that their calculation of freight is correct. The conclusion so reached does not, as I see it, fully deal with or exhaust the charterer's submissions before this court. Neither of the two cases cited deals with the position which arises here where part of the cargo consists of specified and part of optional cargo and the two together do not reach the dead-weight capacity of the ship of wheat in bags, but, as Mazarakis (2) is the later case and as it deals with parcels of specified and optional cargo, I am of opinion that it should be applied to the present case and that the charterer is right in making his calculation of freight on the several sorts of cargo delivered. Whichever view is taken, however, the argument on behalf of the charterer still subsists that, in assessing the freight, whether on a notional cargo of wheat in bags to cover the shortage in dead-weight or to cover freight on the entire cargo, an allowance must be made to the charterer for the discharging expenses saved by the shipowners. This argument was not advanced in either of the cases to which I have just referred. Before the arbitrator the claim seems to have been based on a liability for dead-freight or damages. If that were correct, I think the estimated discharging expenses would be deductible from the freight attributable to the shortage, but the two cases cited establish clearly that the liability arising under cl. 6 is not for dead-freight but is for freight due under the contract—not for breach of it. The argument was not so put or restricted before me.

Cause 6 provides that the steamer is not to earn more freight than she would if loaded with a full cargo of wheat in bags. It places on the charterer all expenses in loading and discharging optional cargo in excess of those incurred with heavy grain. The provision restricting the option to amounts not less than 200 tons does not seem to help in the construction of the clause on the point in issue. It is, perhaps, inserted because it would not be thought worth while to deal with less than 200 tons of cargo which might well involve moving the ship for loading or discharging to another berth as grain berths are frequently specially equipped for handling grain and are, or are sometimes, restricted to such purposes. If the clause were to be construed as one providing for a true lump sum freight here, it may well be that there would be no scope for the charterer's contention: Robinson v. Knights (3); but it is not, on any contention before me, a true lump sum freight. To make cl. 6 come into operation, optional cargo must be shipped, and it is conceded that freight is only payable on delivered weights.

I think the charterparty should be looked at as a whole, especially as cl. 6 has been described more than once as ambiguous and puzzling. The charterparty is essentially one for the carriage of grain, and where the option is given to ship any other lawful merchandise, except a few specified commodities, the freight on such merchandise is based on the carriage of wheat in bags at the rate for heavy grain fixed by the charterparty—i.e., it keeps the ship, so far as earnings are concerned, on the same basis as for one of the specified grain cargoes. There is nothing to indicate that the ship should gain by this. The indications are that she should be in the same position, neither better nor worse, whether grain is loaded or not. All extra expenses are for the charterer. The steamer is not to earn more freight. If wheat in bags only were shipped and the cargo failed to reach the dead-weight then dead-freight or damages would be recoverable from the charterer and any saving to the ship would be taken into consideration. If a full cargo were shipped, then the ship would recover freight on the out-turn weights and would have the expense of discharging the full cargo in order to earn the freight. In my opinion, the charter-party (and cl. 6 in particular) should be so interpreted that the shipowner is placed in no better position than if he, in fact, carried wheat in bags instead of the optional cargo and that the charterer's contention is right. There has to be a calculation on the basis of a notional cargo in order to assess the freight under cl. 6. In that calculation an allowance has to be made for the shrinkage or shortage on delivery of a hypothetical cargo and there seems to me to be no difficulty in inserting in that calculation an allowance for the expenses of the shipowners which would have been incurred if the goods had in fact been shipped. This assessment can as readily be made before the ship finally sails for her destination as after discharge.

I have, therefore, come to a conclusion contrary to that of the learned arbitrator, and I hold that the charterer's calculation for freight is correct. The second issue between the parties is in respect of demurrage. The shipowners contend "that the lay days must be calculated on the actual quantities, viz., 8,858 tons and 8,796½ tons, loaded and discharged, respectively." The charterer contends "that at the loading port the calculation must be based on the deadweight capacity of the vessel for wheat in bags, viz., 9,437 tons, and, at the discharging ports, on the aggregate out-turn weight at Liverpool, the bill of lading weights (with no allowance for shrinkage) of the cargo discharged at Avonmouth and the weight on which . . . dead-freight is payable which aggregate amounts to 9,399½ tons."

The learned arbitrator has found as follows :

Clauses 13 and 25 (which provide for the lay days at ports of loading and discharge respectively) are wholly independent of the clauses which provide for the calculation and payment of freight, and, on their true construction, provide that the lay days shall be calculated on the weights of cargo actually loaded and discharged respectively. Accordingly I hold that the shipowners' calculation of demurrage are also correct.

On this issue I agree with the learned arbitrator. The charterer has loaded cargo to the full capacity of the ship and if he had loaded and discharged at the agreed rate the shipowners would have been free to employ their vessel elsewhere during the time for which they now claim demurrage. The clauses provide for demurrage on a tonnage rate and draw no distinction between specified and optional cargo which may vary very considerably in the rate of loading or discharging. In the result, therefore, I find against the award in respect of freight calculation and in favour of the award in respect of demurrage calculation.

Order accordingly. Charterer to have half the costs of the hearing. Shipowners to have the costs of setting down the case for argument.

R. v. PADDINGTON AND ST. MARYLEBONE RENT TRIBUNAL.

Ex parte BEDROCK INVESTMENTS, LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Scott and Asquith, L.JJ., and Romer, J.), June 22, 23, 24, July 16, 1948.]

Rent Control—Furnished house—Reduction of rent—Reduction below amount of standard rent—Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946 (c. 34), s. 7.

The Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946, s. 7, provides: "Sections 9 and 10 of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, (which relate respectively to limitation on rent of houses let furnished and to penalty for excessive charges for furnished lettings), shall not apply as regards the rent charged for any house or part of a house entered in the register under the provisions of this Act in respect of any period subsequent to registration, but save as aforesaid nothing in this Act shall affect any provisions of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Acts, 1920 to 1939."

In 1946 the landlords let unfurnished certain premises which were within the Rent Restrictions Acts, but they provided various services and it was accepted that the premises were within the Act of 1946. The letting was a "first letting" and the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, was applicable thereto, so that the contractual rent was the standard rent. The tenant applied to a rent tribunal under the Act of 1946, and the contractual rent was ordered to be reduced.

HELD: the reduction "affected" provisions of the Rent Restrictions Acts within the meaning of s. 7 of the Act of 1946, namely, those under which the standard rent was determined, and, if need be, apportioned, and under which it might, in certain circumstances, be increased, and, therefore, the tribunal had exceeded its jurisdiction.

Decision of the Divisional Court ([1947] 2 All E.R. 15), affirmed.

Per curiam: In a loose sense it is not incorrect to say that a lessor is authorised by the Rent Restrictions Acts to receive the standard rent, because those Acts impliedly recognise and leave undisturbed his right to exact that rent by contract while eliminating his common law right to contract effectively for anything more. Strictly, however, a lessor's right to receive, and, if necessary, enforce, payment of the standard rent is in no way conferred by the Acts. It arises only out of the contractual relations into which he enters with his tenant.

APPEAL by the Rent Tribunal for Paddington and St. Marylebone from a decision of the Divisional Court of the King's Bench Division ([1947] 2 All E.R. 15) granting, on the application of the landlords, Bedrock Investments, Ltd., orders of certiorari to bring up and quash orders made by the tribunal under the Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946, whereby the rents of certain flats were reduced. The appeal was dismissed. The facts appear in the judgment of the court.

Cur. adv. vult.

JULY 16. ROMER, J., read the following judgment of the court. This is an appeal from an order made by the Divisional Court on May 13, 1947, on an application to bring up for review certain orders made under the Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946, by the Rent Tribunal for Paddington and St. Marylebone. That application succeeded, and the Divisional Court quashed the orders of the rent tribunal. Those orders related to the following accommodation or apartments in No. 6, Craven Hill Gardens, London, W.2: (i) a flat comprising rooms 1, 2 and 3: this flat was let by an agreement dated Jan. 17, 1946, for a term expiring on Jan. 31, 1949, at a rent of £240 per annum; (ii) a flat comprising rooms 4 and 5: this was let by an agreement made in March, 1946, for a term expiring on Mar. 24, 1949, at a rent of £169 per annum; (iii) room 6 which was let at a rent of £85 per annum from May 1, 1946, for a term expiring on Mar. 24, 1947; (iv) a flat comprising rooms 7 and 8 which was let from June 24, 1946, for a term expiring on Mar. 25, 1948, at a rent of £156 per annum; (v) room 9 which was let on Oct. 1, 1946, for a term expiring on Mar. 31, 1947, at a rent of £80 per annum; and (vi) a flat comprising rooms 15 and 16: this flat was let by an agreement dated Jan. 21, 1946, for a term expiring on a date which we do not know at a rent of £144 per annum. On the applications of the various tenants the tribunal made orders on Dec. 9, 1946, reducing these rents as follows: the rent for rooms 1, 2 and 3 was reduced to £140 per annum, that for 4 and 5 to £120 per annum, that for 6 to £66 per annum, that for 7 and 8 to £102 per annum, that for 9 to £70 per annum, and that for 15 and 16 to £110 8s. 0d. per annum. The period in respect of which each of these reduced rents was fixed by the said orders was expressed to be "until the expiration of the Act." The orders stated that all these rooms and flats were let unfurnished, but that services, specified in the orders, were provided by the lessor. In January, 1947, on application made to the Marylebone County Court, the following apportionments to the rooms in question were made of the rateable value (£155) of the premises 6, Craven Hill Gardens as on Apr. 6, 1939:—£32 to the rooms 1, 2 and 3, £22 to 4 and 5, £8 to 6, and £16 to 14 and 15. We do not know what amount was apportioned to room 9. These apportionments were effected pursuant to the Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 12 (3).

All the lettings above referred to were first lettings, and the premises were accordingly "new control" premises and are controlled by the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939. It follows that the contractual rents of the various flats and rooms are the standard rents for the purposes of the Rent Restrictions Acts, and the point in issue on this appeal is whether the tribunal had power, by virtue of the Act of 1946, to reduce them. When the matter was before the Divisional Court there was some question whether the rooms and flats in No. 6, Craven Hill Gardens and in the premises which were the subject of the other appeals before the court were within the Act of 1946 at all, but before us counsel for the respondents (the landlords), disclaimed any such point, and invited us to approach the present appeal on the footing that all the premises in question do fall within the Act of 1946. It is conceded that they all come also within the general provisions of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Acts, 1920 to 1939.

Before considering the arguments which were addressed to us, it would be convenient to refer to the relevant provisions of the Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946, which received the Royal Assent on Mar. 26 of that year. The Act only operates in districts to which it has been applied by order of the Minister of Health (s. 1 (1)). Such an order has been made by the Minister in relation to London. Section 1 (2) provides for the constitution of a tribunal for each district in which the Act is in force, and the provisions of the schedule to the Act are to apply to each such tribunal. A reference to the schedule shows that a tribunal is to consist of a chairman and two other members, all appointed by the Minister, and it may be noted in passing that there is no requirement that the chairman or any member of the tribunal shall have any legal qualifications. Section 2 (1) provides that where a contract has, whether before or after the passing of the Act, been entered into whereby one person grants to another person the right to occupy as a residence a house or part of a house situated in a district in which the Act is in force in consideration of a rent which includes payment for the use of furniture or for services, it shall be lawful for either party to the contract, or for the local authority, to refer the contract to the tribunal of the district, who may thereupon require the lessor by notice to give them certain information. On any such reference the tribunal concerned (by s. 2 (2)):

... shall approve the rent payable under the contract or reduce it to such sum as they may, in all the circumstances, think reasonable, or may, if they think fit in all the circumstances, dismiss the reference, and shall notify the parties and the local authority of their decision in each case.

By s. 2 (3) either party or the local authority may refer a case again to the tribunal for re-consideration of the rent fixed by its decision and entered in the register, on the ground of change of circumstances, and on such reference the provisions of sub-s. (2) shall apply, subject to the modification that the tribunal shall have power to increase the rent payable. Section 2 (4) provides that where the rent under a referred contract includes payment for services and the tribunal are of opinion that it would be proper that the rent payable for the premises should include an amount in respect of increase since Sept. 3, 1939, in the cost of providing such services, and are also of opinion that in all the circumstances a rent higher than the rent payable under the contract might properly be chargeable for the premises in order to include an amount in respect of such increase, they may approve a rent higher by not more than such amount as they think reasonable in that respect. By sub-s. (5) an approval, reduction or increase under s. 2 may be limited to rent payable in respect of a particular period. We would here observe that the tribunal suggest (and we think rightly) that, in the case of premises which are within the Acts of 1920 to 1939, a tribunal cannot exercise the powers of increasing rents conferred by sub-ss. (3) and (4) of s. 2 so as to raise the contractual rent above the amount of the standard rent (if any). Section 3 requires the local authority to prepare and keep up to date a register in which shall be entered certain particulars with regard to any contract under which a rent is payable that has been approved, reduced or increased under s. 2. Where the rent payable for any premises is entered in the register it shall not be lawful to require or receive (a) on account of rent for those premises in respect of any period subsequent to the date of such entry (or, in a case in which a particular period is specified, in respect of that period) payment of any sum in excess of the rent so entered, or (b) as a condition of the grant, renewal or continuance of a contract to which the Act applies relating to such premises, payment of any fine, premium or other like sum, or any consideration, in addition to the rent (s. 4). Section 5 contains certain provisions for the protection of tenants in the event of notices to quit being served on them after a contract has been referred to a tribunal. Section 7 is of considerable importance and is in the following terms :

Sections 9 and 10 of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, (which relate respectively to limitation on rent of houses let furnished and to penalty for excessive charges for furnished lettings), shall not apply as regards the rent charged for any house or part of a house entered in the register under the provisions of this Act in respect of any period subsequent to such registration, but save as aforesaid nothing in this Act shall affect any provisions of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Acts, 1920 to 1939.

Section 8 empowers the Minister to make regulations as to the matters therein mentioned. Section 12 (1) defines "services" as including attendance, the provision of heating or lighting, the supply of hot water and any other privilege or facility connected with the occupancy of a house or part of a house, not being a privilege or facility requisite for the purposes of access, cold water supply or sanitary accommodation. Section 12 (2) provides for aggregation in cases where separate sums are payable by a lessee in respect of occupation of the premises, use of furniture and services respectively; and sub-s. (3) excludes from the Act a house or part of a house let at a rent which includes payment in respect of board provided that the value of such board to the lessee forms a substantial proportion of the whole rent. Section 13 provides that the Act should continue in force until Dec. 31, 1947, but its operation has in fact been extended.

Having regard to the provisions of the Act of 1946 as outlined above, it is clear that certain premises come both within the provisions of this Act and within the provisions of the Acts of 1920 to 1939 (for convenience referred to hereafter as "the Rent Restrictions Acts"), and we agree with what ATKINSON, J., said on the point in the court below ([1947] 2 All E.R. 18) :

Lettings seem to fall into three classes. There are lettings in which there is no furniture and no attendance included; secondly, lettings in which a substantial portion of the rent is fairly attributable to the use of furniture or to attendance; thirdly, lettings in which part of the rent not amounting to a substantial portion is attributable to the use of furniture or to attendance. As to the first, the Act of 1946 can have no application; as to the second, the Rent Restrictions Acts can have no application; as to the third, on the face of it they may be within both Acts . . . Which set of provisions is to prevail?

One criticism by the rent tribunal of the decision of the Divisional Court that the Rent Restrictions Acts are to prevail in the sense that a tribunal cannot reduce a contractual rent below the amount of the standard rent is that it was founded on the view that a statutory right to the standard rent is conferred on a lessor by those Acts. Although passages are to be found which might suggest that the court did hold that view, we do not think that the learned judges were in reality intending to convey anything of the kind. As part of his argument counsel for the landlords did, indeed, suggest that the view is a sound one, and he pointed to (among other provisions) the definition of "recoverable rent" in the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, s. 16. In a loose sense it is not incorrect to say that a lessor is authorised by the Rent Restrictions Acts to receive the standard rent, because those Acts impliedly recognise and leave undisturbed his right to exact that rent by contract while eliminating his common law right to contract effectively for anything more. Strictly, however, a lessor's right to receive, and, if necessary, enforce, payment of the standard rent is in no way conferred by the Acts. It arises, and arises only, out of the contractual relations into which he enters with his tenant. We are, accordingly, unable to accept the argument that a tribunal which reduces a contractual rent below the standard rent is pro tanto depriving the lessor of rent to which he has a statutory right. That, however, is by no means the end of the matter, for the question involved is of much wider scope and was, as we think, accurately formulated by counsel for the landlords as follows: Does an order of a tribunal under the Act of 1946 reducing the contractual or registered rent below the standard rent of a dwelling-house affect any provision of any Rent Restrictions Act? The tribunal's contention is that this question should be answered in the negative and their argument before us may be summarised as follows: Statutory tenancies are outside the scope of the Act of 1946 and the only tenancies with which the tribunals can deal are those which are created by, and depend on, contract. The Rent Restrictions Acts do not operate during the subsistence of a contractual tenancy and, accordingly, during the contractual term, no conflict can arise between those Acts, on the one hand, and any order that may be made by a tribunal under the Act of 1946, on the other. If, therefore, a tribunal reduces a contractual rent below the standard rent, but limits the duration of its order to the duration of the contractual term, then that order in no way conflicts with or affects any provision of the Rent Restrictions Acts. If, however, the tribunal's order is not so limited and ex facie continues to operate after the contractual tenancy has become a statutory tenancy, again no conflict arises, and for the reason that, on this change occurring, the rent which will be properly chargeable thereafter against the statutory tenant will be the standard rent, to which, in view of s. 7 of the Act of 1946, the registered rent must then give way. As to this section the rent tribunal argued that the words "but save as aforesaid nothing in this Act shall affect any provisions of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Acts, 1920 to 1939" mean that nothing in the Act shall repeal or modify any such provisions excepting only (to a limited extent) ss. 9 and 10 of the Act of 1920. The object of the section was, it is said, to make it clear that, notwithstanding the Act, tenants were not to be deprived of their existing rights (for example, the right of applying to a county court judge) under the Acts of 1920 to 1939.

In our judgment, the question involved does, in fact, depend on the true construction of s. 7 of the Act of 1946, and, in particular, on the meaning which is to be attributed to the word "affects" as it appears in the section. As to this it is to be borne in mind that complicated and, in some ways, intricate machinery had been devised through the medium of the Acts of 1920 to 1939 for the purpose of protecting tenants from the actual or potential avarice of landlords. Security from dispossession had also to be achieved, but with this we are not immediately concerned. The legislative provisions which are relevant for present purposes are those which were evolved over a considerable period, by a process of trial and error, with the object of imposing a "ceiling" on the rent which a landlord could legitimately require his tenants to pay for the occupation of premises that came within the Acts. In our judgment, those provisions are included among the provisions which are to remain unaffected by the Act of 1946. Counsel for the landlords argued that some of those provisions are not only affected, but are overruled if the tribunals set up under the Act of 1946 purport to reduce the contractual or registered rent of premises which are within the Act to a level below the standard rent. He supported his argument by certain illustrations, to which it is convenient to refer. First, he assumed the case of a house which, on Sept. 1, 1939, was let as a whole at £200 per annum, including rates, the rateable value of the house, on Apr. 1, 1939, being £100. Such a house is within the Rent Restrictions Acts. The landlord divides the house into three flats, A, B and C. Flat A has no furniture, and no services are provided to the tenant. Flats B and C have no furniture, but the landlord agrees to supply central heating. The landlord lets each flat at £100 per annum (to include rates) on tenancies which may be determined by a month's notice on either side. The result of this is that each flat is within the Rent Restrictions Acts and that flats B and C are also within the Act of 1946. An application is made by the tenants to the appropriate county court for apportionment under s. 12 (3) of the Act of 1920. The judge apportions the September, 1939, rent as follows: flat A £70, flat B £70, flat C £60. Under the express provisions of s. 12 (3) this apportionment is "final and conclusive." The tenants of flats B and C then apply to a tribunal under the Act of 1946, which assumes jurisdiction to entertain the applications. On the ground that flat C is a better or more attractive flat than flat B, the tribunal reduces the rent of flat B to £50, but confirms the rent of flat C. These rents are then registered. On this sequence of assumptions it seems to us that the provisions of s. 12 (3) of the Act of 1920 have been very gravely affected, for the "final and conclusive" apportionment by the county court judge has not only been brought up for review before the tribunal, but has been overruled by its decision. It is also to be observed (although this, perhaps, is only a matter for comment) that, inasmuch as the rent tribunal has no power to interfere in the matter of flat A, the landlord continues to get a higher rent from the tenant of that flat (to whom he renders no services) than he does from the tenant of flat B (possibly identical in accommodation, position and outlook) to whom he is bound to render services in accordance with his contractual obligations.

Secondly, counsel assumed that between Sept. 1, 1939, and the date of application to the rent tribunal (a) the rates on the whole house were increased by £20, (b) the landlord spent £200 by way of re-construction on each flat, and (c) notices of increase had been duly served on former tenants of the flats. The result of these hypotheses is that the "ceiling" rents for the flats became as follows:—flat A, £70, plus £7, plus £16, equals £93; flat B, £70, plus £7, plus £16, equals £93; flat C, £60, plus £6, plus £16, equals £82. If, on the application of the tenants of flats B and C, the tribunal reduces those rents, we cannot but think that their decision "affects" the provisions of s. 2 (1) of the Act of 1920 and sched. I to the Act of 1939.

It is then, thirdly, assumed that, after the tribunal has given its decision, (a) the rates on the whole house are further increased by £20 and (b) the landlord spends a further £200 on structural alterations to each of the flats. In order to obtain the increase referable to these considerations the landlord must, under s. 3 (1) of the Act of 1920, give his tenants a month's notice to quit, whereupon they become statutory tenants, and also give notices of increase (s. 3 (2) of the Act of 1920). The landlord, accordingly, gives these notices with the result that the permitted rent "ceilings" under the Rent Restrictions Acts are as follows:—flat A, £93, plus £7, plus £8, equals £108; flat B, £93, plus £7, plus £8, equals £108; flat C, £82, plus £6, plus £8, equals £96. The rents for flats B and C, however, having been decided by the tribunal and registered, it is unlawful for the landlord to receive anything in excess of those rents including, presumably, the increases permitted by the Act of 1920. Surely once again a "provision" of one of the Rent Restrictions Acts has been "affected," and none the less because the landlord might apply for the exercise of the tribunal's discretion on the ground of change of circumstances.

Finally, counsel assumed that, after the rent of flat B or C had been reduced by the tribunal and registered, the tenant of one of the flats leaves and the landlord re-lets without agreeing to provide any services. The result of this would be that the flat in question was no longer within the scope of the Act of 1946 at all. It would appear, however, that the registered rent remains as the "ceiling" rent by reason of the embargo imposed by s. 4 of the Act.

There is at all events no express provision to be found in the Act for expunging the entry in the register, or lifting the embargo, to meet this change of circumstances. On this view, again, a conflict would arise between the rent registered by the tribunal, on the one hand, and the provisions of the Rent Restrictions Acts for determining the standard rent, on the other.

- Other illustrations similar to those mentioned could doubtless be found. The rent tribunal's answer to them is that they are merely directed to results. That they show results is true, but the results are the legitimate offspring of the relevant statutory provisions. All these considerations can lead only to the conclusion that a reduction by a tribunal of a contractual rent to a level below that of the standard rent does affect the provisions of the Rent Restrictions Acts, namely, the provisions under which the standard rent is determined, and, if need be, apportioned, and under which it may, in certain circumstances, be increased. Those provisions are "affected" in the sense that they would be disturbed, and even over-ridden, if the rent tribunal is right. If the tribunal's argument is sound, the simple decision of the rent tribunals could substitute a lower "ceiling" of rent for the "standard" rent permitted by the Rent Restrictions Acts. The latter, as we have already said, is the subject of careful and elaborate legislation which, although drastically restrictive of landlords' rights, is not unmindful of them altogether, and the standard rent, with the permitted increases, presumably represents the return which the legislature regarded, and still regards, as proper for a landlord of controlled premises to receive. We cannot but think that, if Parliament had intended by the Act of 1946 to authorise the tribunals set up thereunder, in their discretion and by their unappealable decision, to reduce the standard rent and to override the permitted increases, they would have expressed that intention in clear and definite terms, and it is to be supposed that they would, moreover, have provided that one member at least of each tribunal should be a person having legal qualifications. We are, however, satisfied that the language of s. 7 of the Act sufficiently shows that such was not the intention of the legislature, which was, on the contrary, that the Act should be supplementary to, but (except as to ss. 9 and 10 of the Act of 1920) in no way destructive of, the Rent Restrictions Acts of 1920 to 1939. We are of opinion, accordingly, that the rent tribunal exceeded its jurisdiction in making the orders now in question and that this appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Re A DEBTOR (No. 335 OF 1947).

Ex parte H.M. THE KING v. THE DEBTOR.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Greene, M.R., Asquith and Evershed, L.JJ.), July 12, 13, 14, 16, 1948.]

- Bankruptcy—Petition—Service—Service out of the jurisdiction—Foreigner—“Act of bankruptcy”—“Carrying on business”—Bankruptcy Act, 1914 (c. 59), s. 1 (1) (d), (2) (c).*

By the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 1: “(1) A debtor commits an act of bankruptcy in each of the following cases . . . (d) If with intent to defeat or delay his creditors he does any of the following things, namely, departs out of England, or being out of England remains out of England . . . (2) In this Act, the expression ‘a debtor,’ unless the context otherwise implies, includes any person, whether a British subject or not, who at the time when any act of bankruptcy was done or suffered by him . . . (c) was carrying on business in England, personally, or by means of an agent or manager . . .”

A Rumanian citizen, who lived in England and carried on a business here, appealed against assessments in respect of unpaid excess profits tax, and, on the day on which the assessments were confirmed, he left England for Eire. He had not returned to England since, but had sent to his wife a power of attorney, in exercise of which she had sold his business. On an application by the Crown to serve out of the jurisdiction a petition in bankruptcy to which the debtor was respondent, the alleged act of bankruptcy being that defined in s. 1 (1) (d) of the Act of 1914, viz., that, with intent to defeat or delay his creditors, the debtor, being out of England, remained out of England:—

HELD: (i) since the debtor had left debts unpaid in England, he was carrying on business in England, within the meaning of s. 1 (2) (c) of the Act of 1914, notwithstanding that he had ceased actual trading.

Re Dagnall, Ex p. Soan & Morley ([1896] 2 Q.B. 407) and Re Clark, Ex p. Pope & Owles ([1914] 3 K.B. 1095), applied.

(ii) in view of the express words of s. 1 (2) of the Act that “ ‘ a debtor ’ . . . includes any person, whether a British subject or not,” a foreigner committed an “act of bankruptcy” when he did any of the acts set out in s. 1 (1), and, accordingly, on the prima facie evidence, there was jurisdiction to make an order to serve the bankruptcy petition out of the jurisdiction.

APPEAL by the Crown from an order of MR. REGISTRAR PARTON, made on Apr. 7, 1948, discharging an order giving leave to serve a bankruptcy petition out of the jurisdiction, on the ground that, as the debtor was a foreigner, there was no jurisdiction to give leave to serve out of the jurisdiction. The Court of Appeal now held that there was jurisdiction to make an order to serve the petition out of the jurisdiction and allowed the appeal. The facts appear in the judgments of LORD GREENE, M.R., and EVERSHER, L.J.

Sir Andrew Clark, K.C., J. H. Stamp and Maurice Berkeley for the Crown.
Caplan for the debtor.

LORD GREENE, M.R.: On Dec. 23, 1947, the appellant, the Crown, obtained leave to serve out of the jurisdiction a petition in bankruptcy filed on Nov. 14, 1947, to which the debtor, the present respondent, was respondent. At the time he was living in Eire. By the order now under appeal, which is dated Apr. 7, 1948, MR. REGISTRAR PARTON discharged that order giving leave to serve the petition out of the jurisdiction. He did so, not on the ground that, if it existed, the power to give leave to serve out of the jurisdiction had not been properly exercised, but on the ground that there was no power to make such an order, for reasons which will appear. It is not suggested before us that the discretion, if it existed, was improperly exercised, and the only argument put forward in support of the order now under appeal was to the effect that the original order giving leave to serve out of the jurisdiction was made without there being any jurisdiction to make it.

The debt in question was a debt owing to the Crown in respect of certain assessments—three, I think, in number—in the sum of £10,000 each for excess profits tax unpaid. The debtor was, and is, a Rumanian citizen and he carried on in this country a business connected with leather. The assessments were made in respect of profits of that business. He appealed against all three assessments, but he did not find it convenient to attend at the hearing of his appeals before the general commissioners; and by what, according to his evidence, appears to have been an odd but fortunate coincidence, he happened to find it possible to leave this country for Eire on the day on which the assessments were confirmed.

A It is said by the Crown that the debtor was a person who, within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 1 (2) (c), was carrying on business in England at the time of the alleged act of bankruptcy. The alleged act of bankruptcy is the act defined in s. 1 (1) (d), viz., that, with intent to defeat or delay his creditors, being out of England, he remained out of England. The act of departing out of England with that intent, which is also provided for by s. 1 (1) (d), was not open to the Crown in view of delay in the presentation of the petition. The case, therefore, rests on the allegation that, being out of England, he has remained out of England with intent to defeat or delay his creditors, and thereby committed an act of bankruptcy. Whether the facts B necessary to support that alleged act of bankruptcy are or are not established is, of course, a matter which will only fall to be dealt with at the hearing of the petition, but it is sufficient, in my opinion, that the petition and the facts given in support of it should raise, as they do raise—and it is not contended that they do not—a strong prima facie case on the basis of which leave to serve the petition out of the jurisdiction under the Bankruptcy Rules, 1915, r. 158, could properly be granted. Rule 158 is this :

C Where a debtor petitioned against is not in England, the court may order service to be made . . . in such manner and form as it shall think fit.

It is quite clear that that must cover a case where the question whether or not an act of bankruptcy has been committed will fall to be decided one way or the other when the petition is heard, and the discretion arises under that rule, as it seems to me, in any case where the petition presents a case which D is not, so to speak, demurrable.

The actual language which is relevant to the present controversy is to be found in s. 1 (1) (d) of the Act of 1914, read in combination with s. 1 (2) of the Act. Section 1 (1) is as follows :

E A debtor commits an act of bankruptcy in each of the following cases . . . (d) If with intent to defeat or delay his creditors he does any of the following things, namely, departs out of England, or being out of England remains out of England . . .

Section 1 (2) contains a statement of certain persons whom the expression “debtor” is to include in the absence of a context implying the contrary. It runs as follows :

F In this Act, the expression “a debtor,” unless the context otherwise implies, includes any person, whether a British subject or not, who at the time when any act of bankruptcy was done or suffered by him . . . (c) was carrying on business in England, personally, or by means of an agent or manager.

It appears to me that, if these provisions are read in their ordinary common meaning in the English language, they do quite clearly provide that in regard to this particular act of bankruptcy—of being out of the jurisdiction and remaining out with intent to defeat creditors—the act can be committed by a person who is not a British subject.

G It is argued on behalf of the debtor that, by virtue of the fact that he is not a British subject and that the act of bankruptcy relied on was committed when he was not in this country, the bankruptcy jurisdiction does not extend to him, and that he was entitled in the circumstances to remain out of this country and so escape the arm of the bankruptcy law. The grounds on which that contention rests I will deal with in a moment, but I am first concerned, without reference to alleged rules of presumption on the construction of statutes H and without reference to authority, merely to read the language of the legislature directed to this point.

An act of bankruptcy, to be effective, must of course be committed by a debtor. Before the Bankruptcy and Deeds of Arrangement Act, 1913, the word “debtor” was not defined in the Acts and the precise limitation to be placed on the general expression “a debtor” was the subject-matter of a number of decisions. In 1913 the present definition of “a debtor” was first introduced [Bankruptcy and Deeds of Arrangement Act, 1913, s. 8]. I call it “definition” for convenience, although I will assume that counsel for the debtor is right in saying that this is not strictly a definition clause. The effect of this "definition clause," as I will call it, is that, in construing the word "debtor" in s. 1 (1) of the Act of 1914, it must be read as inclusive of the persons described in s. 1 (2) of the Act. Let me so read it and see how the section will run in relation to the particular act of bankruptcy which we are considering. Before I do so, I call attention to the fact which, to my mind, is of cardinal and decisive importance, that the particular act of bankruptcy of being out of the country and remaining out of the country is an act which can only be committed out of this country. By its very character it is not capable of being committed elsewhere.

Bearing that in mind, let me see how s. 1 (1) (d) will run. In place of the words "a debtor," reading the extended meaning given to the words "a debtor" by sub-s. (2), it will run as follows: "Any person, whether a British subject or not, who, at the time when the act of bankruptcy was done or suffered by him, was carrying on business in England, commits an act of bankruptcy if, with intent to defeat or delay his creditors, being out of England, he remains out of England." The argument of counsel for the debtor, put in a nutshell, is that no foreigner can commit that particular act of bankruptcy for the simple reason that he is a foreigner. But be it observed that the section says that he can, because it provides: "a person whether a British subject or not, who, being out of England, remains out of England . . .", and that is an act which can only be done by a person who is abroad. Therefore, in my opinion, the plain meaning of the language used is to make it impossible to argue that that particular act of bankruptcy cannot be committed by a foreigner. It was interesting to see how counsel for the debtor said that the section ought to be expanded in order to convey the meaning which he argued ought to be given to it. He would read it as though at the end there was inserted a proviso that no person other than a British subject was capable of committing that particular act of bankruptcy. If, however, you have a section saying that any person, whether a British subject or not, commits an act of bankruptcy if he is out of the jurisdiction and remains out of the jurisdiction, and then put a proviso at the end saying that this does not apply to a person who is not a British subject, you make complete nonsense of the section. It is a complete contradiction; and if there is one rule of construction for statutes and other documents, it is that you must not imply anything in them which is inconsistent with the words expressly used.

If it were not for the fact that the question is mixed up with a good deal of old authority and with an alleged rule of law applicable to the construction of statutes, I should have felt no difficulty whatever about this case. Before I come, however, to the main point of the argument of counsel for the debtor, there is one matter to which I should refer which lies, so to speak, on the edge of it. It will be observed that the particular case alleged in the present proceedings was that the debtor was carrying on a business in England at the time when the alleged act of bankruptcy, viz., the act of being and remaining out of England, was committed. He had not, in fact, put up the shutters of his business, but he had apparently assigned it to his wife, and he says: "While I am remaining in Eire I am not carrying on business in England." The Crown's answer to that is that, on the true meaning of the phrase "was carrying on business in England," the debtor was carrying on business in England by reason of the fact that debts concerned with his business remained unpaid, viz., the excess profits tax due to the Crown. That has been described not inconveniently, and for the sake of brevity, as "constructive carrying on of business," and I have no particular objection in the present context and for that purpose to using that phrase. The Crown says that the fact that these debts were unpaid meant that the debtor was carrying on business in England. That allegation is based on a series of authorities dealing in particular with the case of married women carrying on business, and in the relevant provision relating to a married woman trader, the phrases used first in the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, were for all practical purposes the same as this.

The Married Women's Property Act, 1882, s. 1 (5), provides as follows:

Every married woman carrying on a trade separately from her husband shall, in respect of her separate property, be subject to the bankruptcy laws in the same way as if she were a feme sole.

In Re Dagnall, Ex p. Soan & Morley (1) a married woman had ceased to carry on business, but it was held that she was still carrying on business for the purpose of the bankruptcy laws owing to the fact that she had unpaid debts. That principle has been confirmed over and over again in relation to the position of married women traders. Counsel for the debtor said that those decisions were decisions, not under the Bankruptcy Acts, but under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882. Unfortunately for that argument—and quite apart from the fact that this section relating to married women was part of the bankruptcy code, and, therefore, one would have expected that it was in the mind of the legislature when they passed the amending definition of "a debtor" in the Act of 1913—that particular provision relating to married women is now part of the Bankruptcy Act itself. In the Bankruptcy and Deeds of Arrangement Act, 1913, the very Act which introduced this new definition of "a debtor," s. 12 (1), is :

Every married woman who carries on a trade or business, whether separately from her husband or not, shall be subject to the bankruptcy laws as if she were a feme sole. Therefore, in the bankruptcy legislation you have side by side the definition clause, s. 8 (c), as it was in the Act of 1913, with regard to a person carrying on business in England, and the reference to a married woman who carries on a trade or business ; and the legislature made those enactments in a Bankruptcy Act, with that phrase in the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, before its eyes. In the Act of 1914, in s. 125, the same provision with regard to married women appears, and the original section, s. 1 (5) of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, is repealed. In the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, therefore, we have the phrase in relation to married women carrying on business (a phrase interpreted over and over again in the courts as inclusive of the case where, having put up the shutters, so to speak, she still has unpaid debts) standing side by side with the definition of "a debtor" as a person carrying on business in this country. On that footing I find it quite impossible to take the view that the reference to carrying on business in the definition of "a debtor" is to be construed in a different way from the corresponding reference in relation to married women. And, in point of fact, there has been at any rate one case—and, I think, two cases—under the Act of 1913 itself in relation to married women. Re Clark, Ex p. Pope & Owles (2) was a decision of this court. There a married woman, having had a business which had come to an end, but having unpaid debts remaining, was held to be carrying on business within the meaning of the Bankruptcy and Deeds of Arrangement Act, 1913, s. 12. Therefore, there is that authority that, on the construction of what is now a provision of the Bankruptcy Act itself, a married woman is still carrying on a trade or business (although she has ceased to carry it on in the sense of actual trading) provided that she has unpaid debts.

The argument which claims a limited construction of the relevant sections here is based on two propositions taken together or separately. It is said, first, that there is a presumption of law that an English statute must not be construed as extending to foreigners or to acts done in a foreign country unless the contrary is expressly provided. So to legislate, it is said, would be contrary to the comity of nations, and, accordingly, there must be the very clearest language before one can treat an English statute as intended to apply to a foreigner or an act done by a foreigner out of the jurisdiction. So, it is said, these provisions of the Bankruptcy Act cannot apply to this act of bankruptcy because it was an act by a foreigner out of the jurisdiction. I have already pointed out that, in my opinion, the section, if properly construed, expressly provides for that very case, because it says in terms that this particular act of bankruptcy, which can only be committed out of the jurisdiction, is committed by a person whether he be a British subject or not. Nevertheless, it is said, the presumption is so strong as to make it proper and right to construe the Act in a limited sense so as to exclude the present case.

I think I can state the effect of this branch of the argument as clearly as it can be stated by quoting a paragraph from the judgment of JAMES, L.J., in Re Sawers, Ex p. Blain (3). This puts in a nutshell the argument of counsel for the debtor. JAMES, L.J., said (12 Ch.D. 522, 526) :

It appears to me that the whole question is governed by the broad, general, universal principle that English legislation, unless the contrary is expressly enacted or so plainly implied as to make it the duty of an English court to give effect to an English statute, is applicable only to English subjects or to foreigners who by coming into this country, whether for a long or a short time, have made themselves during that time subject to English jurisdiction.

Now, as I have said, in the present bankruptcy legislation, quite apart from what it was in the earlier legislation, which raised altogether different considerations, it is expressly enacted, or, to put it at the lowest, plainly implied, that a foreigner is comprised within the provisions of the statute and that this particular act of bankruptcy can be committed by a foreigner. I find that this alleged principle of construction does not produce the result that counsel for the debtor says it produces, because to apply it would, as I have already said, mean introducing into the section something completely inconsistent with the language used. I do not propose to say anything more about that particular branch of the argument except that on one point I must make special reference to it. It is a point connected with what I have just described as the constructive carrying on of business. Now, says counsel for the debtor, however one construes the words "carrying on business," in however extended or constructive the sense one expands those words in the case of a British subject, when dealing with a foreigner one must read them in a much more restricted way, and one is not entitled to put that extended meaning on them when applying them to the case of a foreigner. In other words, a foreigner must be actually carrying on business, and once he has put up the shutters and ceased actually to carry on business, he is not carrying on business within the meaning of s. 1 (2) (c) of the Act of 1914. I cannot for a moment accept that argument. It would mean putting on the phrase "carrying on business" a construction limited in the case of foreigners to a class of activity, viz., the actual carrying on of business with the shop open, so to speak, which is not necessary in the case of a person not a foreigner. The phrase was used by the legislature with full knowledge of the construction which the courts had placed on similar words, and it seems to me that to insert a qualification in the case of a foreigner that he must be carrying on business, not in the sense understood by the courts, but in some more limited sense, would be doing violence to the sub-section which I am not prepared to do. I think that the sub-section must be read in its ordinary straightforward meaning, bearing in mind the construction which has been put on similar words in the past.

Apart from that general proposition about the construction of an English statute, counsel for the debtor relies on certain authorities, and I must say one short word on the older authorities. In construing the older Bankruptcy Acts, i.e., the Acts earlier than the Act of 1913, which introduced the modern definition of "a debtor," the courts were confronted with a problem, the nature of which will at once appear if I read the relevant words of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (which were very similar to those of s. 6 (3) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869). Section 4 (1) of the Act of 1883 is :

Paragraph (d) of that sub-section is the same as para. (d) of s. 1 (1) of the Act of 1914. Now, in the absence of any definition of the words "a debtor," the problem with which the courts were confronted was this : Are those words to mean any debtor anywhere, taking the word "debtor" in the ordinary common meaning of the word, or are they to be construed in some limited sense ? The problem is expressed in the clearest possible language by MELLISH, L.J., delivering the judgment of himself and LORD SELBORNE, L.C., in the early case of Re Crispin, Ex p. Crispin (4). That was a case in which a non-trader who was a Portuguese domiciled in Portugal was temporarily resident in England and contracted a debt. He was served with a writ, but he left for Portugal before the action could be tried. It was held there that there was no sufficient evidence that he left England in order to defeat or delay his creditors. But MELLISH, L.J., said (8 Ch. App. 374, 378, 379) :

The first question to be considered is, had the court jurisdiction to adjudicate the appellant a bankrupt ? And this depends upon the question whether a foreigner, who is not a trader, and who comes to England for a temporary purpose, and who quits England before a petition in bankruptcy is presented against him, can be adjudicated a bankrupt, either upon an act of bankruptcy alleged to have been committed while he was in England, or upon an act of bankruptcy alleged to have been committed after he had left England. It is obvious that some limitation must be put on the general words "creditor" and "debtor" in s. 6 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869. They cannot apply to every creditor and every debtor throughout the world. It was argued on the part of the appellant that the word "debtor" must be confined to debtors subject to the laws of England, and that as the appellant was a foreigner, and had left England before a petition was presented against him, he had ceased to be subject to the laws of England, and no petition could be presented against him. We agree that the word "debtor" must be construed to mean "debtor properly subject to the laws of England"; but we are of opinion that it is the act of bankruptcy, and not the petition, which gives jurisdiction to the Court of Bankruptcy, and that if a foreigner comes to England, and contracts debts in England, and commits an act of bankruptcy in England, he thereby gives the Court of Bankruptcy jurisdiction over him.

It will be observed that the problem was to place some limit on the meaning of the word "debtor" which would be in accordance with what I agree is a prima facie view that British legislation ought not to extend to other than British subjects in respect of matters done out of the jurisdiction; and, confronted with the dilemma that it must either give the word "debtor" a wide significance or a limited significance, the court gave to it a limited significance.

In 1913 the word "debtor" was, as I have said, defined by a new section and it was defined so as to include a person whether he was a British subject or not. The cases in which a person may be made liable to the bankruptcy laws and those in which he is capable of committing an act of bankruptcy are strictly limited, and, speaking for myself, I see no ground for thinking that a jurisdiction over foreigners of the very limited kind which results from the application of the limitations in the bankruptcy law could in any way be construed as a violation of the comity of nations. It clearly would have been a violation of the comity of nations to have construed the simple word "debtor" as applying to any debtor in any country of the world; but for British legislation to claim for English courts jurisdiction over foreigners, which can only operate in the very limited class of cases which brings them within the definition of a "debtor," seems to me to be not only not contrary to any conception of the comity of nations, but to be extremely sensible and reasonable. In my opinion, the insertion of that definition clause, and, in particular, the insertion of the words "whether a British subject or not," makes it impossible now to say of a foreigner that he is not subject to the bankruptcy laws merely because he is not a British subject. The section deals with the commission of acts of bankruptcy, therefore, by a person even though he is a foreigner.

Counsel for the debtor, while feeling, I think, the stress of the argument against him that the word "debtor" must now extend to his case so far as the personality and nationality of his client are concerned, now takes up a second line of defence by saying that, even if his client is within the definition of a debtor, the act alleged against him as an act of bankruptcy is not an act of bankruptcy, because not only must a person be a debtor, but he must be committing an act of bankruptcy. Counsel for the debtor says "What is it that he is said to have done? He is said to have done something out of the jurisdiction which is an act of bankruptcy." That brings him back to the argument, which I indicated at the commencement of this judgment, that there must be implied somewhere in the relevant words a restriction of the operation of these provisions in the case of a person being out of England who is not a British subject. I have already said that, in my opinion, it is quite impossible to make any such implication, and the argument that there is a presumption that a British statute does not apply to an act done by a foreigner out of this country seems to me to be entirely displaced, because in this case the British legislature has said that it shall apply. I do not wish to say anything more about that broad argument, but counsel for the debtor reinforces it by reference to certain more recent cases, one of which, Re Debtors (No. 836 of 1935) was decided since the introduction of this new definition clause into the Bankruptcy Act. That was a case in this court and it is the case on which the learned registrar relied. Before I refer to that case, I must mention Cooke v. Charles A. Vogeler Co. (6), an earlier case in the House of Lords under the old statutes which Re Debtors (5) in the Court of Appeal followed. The act of bankruptcy which was in question in both those cases was the one described in s. 1 (1) (a) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, as follows:

If in England or elsewhere he makes a conveyance or assignment of his property to a trustee . . . for the benefit of his creditors generally.

It will be observed that in order to fall under that provision what is necessary is the making of a conveyance. In Cooke v. Charles A. Vogeler Co. (6) two American citizens, who had a branch business in England but never resided in England, but resided at Baltimore in the United States, executed in Baltimore a deed of assignment of all their property to a trustee in trust to pay their debts. The question was whether or not that constituted an act of bankruptcy. As I understand the opinions, what was decided was this—at any rate it was the decision of LORD DAVEY—that the conveyance there in question was not such a conveyance as s. 1 (1) (a) of the Act of 1914 [s. 4 (1) (a) of the Act of 1883] contemplates, for the reason that para. (a) contemplates a conveyance intended to operate under English law. The conveyance in that case was by foreigners who had quite clearly no connection with this country other than through the business. They were not domiciled here. When they executed the conveyance in the United States, they were domiciled United States citizens. Such a conveyance, being a conveyance of personal estate and not of immovables, would operate, prima facie, not under the laws of this country, but under the laws of the United States, with the result that that particular conveyance was not such a conveyance as was contemplated by para. (a), the word “conveyance” there requiring that a limitation be put on it as being a conveyance intended to operate in accordance with English law.

I must say, with regard to some of the observations in this case, that there does not seem to have been a very clear statement of the importance of domicile in such a case. What I mean is this. If a foreigner domiciled abroad executes abroad an assignment of his personal property, then, on the broad principle that mobilia sequuntur personam, the conveyance would operate, not under the laws of this country, but under the laws of his domicile. On that footing nationality would be by no means the test. The point can be put in another way. Supposing the property that he assigns is immovable property in this country, then an assignment by a foreigner of immovable property in this country must be taken to operate under the laws of this country. If the case is one of an assignment of movable property, the question which has to be discussed is whether it was the sort of assignment contemplated by para. (a). I cannot myself see any possible ground for saying that in the case of such an assignment executed by a foreigner domiciled here, who, let me say, goes across to Calais for the purpose of executing it, it would not be an assignment amounting to an act of bankruptcy, although committed by a foreign national out of the jurisdiction. The effect of the decision in Cooke v. Charles A. Vogeler Co. (6) appears to me to be now confined to the particular case of an assignment which, in order to be an act of bankruptcy under para. (a), must be an assignment intended to operate by the laws of England, and I add to that, whether the person executing it is a foreigner or not. He may or may not be. In other words, nationality is not the crucial test whether such an assignment would or would not be intended to operate by the laws of England. If it were an assignment of personal property executed abroad by a domiciled foreigner, the law intended to be applied would obviously be the law of his own country and not the law of England. However, there were undoubtedly phrases used in Cooke v. Charles A. Vogeler Co. (6) which were relevant under the then existing law, namely, that the expression “debtor” was to be limited in the way that I have mentioned, i.e., to a person who had brought himself under the British law of bankruptcy by the actions referred to (8 Ch. App. 374, 379) in the judgment of MELLISH, L.J. [in Re Crispin (4)], which really is the locus classicus on which the whole of the old jurisprudence is founded. He comes to England; he contracts debts in England; and commits an act of bankruptcy in England.

The decision and observations in Cooke v. Charles A. Vogeler Co. (6), in so far as they go beyond or are in conflict with the provisions of the new definition of a debtor, must, of course, be regarded as no longer in force; but in Re Debtors (5) in this court in which the Vogeler case (6) came up for consideration, the headnote is this:

A foreigner resident abroad but trading in England does not commit an act of bankruptcy within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 1 (1) (a), (2), by executing abroad a deed of assignment of his property for the benefit of his creditors generally, and intended to operate according to the law of that foreigner's domicile.

Now, be it observed there that domicile is quite properly introduced. There the debtors were American citizens carrying on business in a number of places on the Continent and in New York. They were living in Paris. They had a branch business in England carried on by an Englishman. They went to New York and there executed an assignment or a conveyance of their property to trustees for the benefit of their creditors. That was alleged to be an act of bankruptcy. It was said that here were foreigners who were committing an act of bankruptcy by executing a conveyance. The learned registrar in that case, having held that the limitation I have mentioned must now be based on the operation of the decision in the Vogeler case (6), took the view that the conveyance in that case was not a conveyance within the meaning of the subsection. The matter came before this court and there are passages in the judgments in this court which are particularly relied on, but which, in my opinion, when properly understood, in their context and in relation to the subject-matter then before the court, do not help counsel for the debtor at all.

In Re Debtors (5) the precise problem was stated by LORD WRIGHT, M.R. ([1936] Ch. 622, 629) :

In these circumstances, the question has to be determined whether the conveyance of Aug. 5, 1935, constitutes an act of bankruptcy within s. 1 (1) (a), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914.

He repeated that, saying (ibid., 630) :

The material question still remains—namely, whether the conveyance in this case is a conveyance or assignment of the debtor's property within the meaning of s. 1 (1) (a) . . .

He held that he was clearly bound by the decision in the House of Lords in the Vogeler case (6). He pointed out (ibid., 631) that the judgment of the House of Lords was based on two grounds, one of which (he said) was that, under the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, the then operative Act, the alleged debtors were not debtors within the meaning of the Act. That, of course, was due to the limited construction which the court had been compelled to place on the word "debtor" under the old Acts. LORD WRIGHT, M.R., then said (ibid., 631) :

. . . as I read the opinions in the House of Lords, I think they also decided the matter on an entirely different ground, which was that the conveyance or assignment was not an act of bankruptcy.

On the point as to the definition of "debtor," LORD WRIGHT, M.R., referred (ibid.) to the effect of the extended definition, and again stated that the decision in the Vogeler case (6) was still binding and effective (ibid., 632) :

. . . I think that, on what was said in Vogeler's case (6), it is impossible to say in this Court that it did constitute an act of bankruptcy, because on this particular point I think what Vogeler's case (6) laid down was that a deed of assignment or conveyance executed by a domiciled foreigner in his own country is not an act of bankruptcy within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Acts if it is to operate according to the law of the foreign country in which it is made.

LORD WRIGHT, M.R., pointed out that the EARL OF HALSBURY, L.C., dealt with the question of foreigners generally and then in the particular circumstances of that case. He said of LORD HALSBURY's speech in the Vogeler case (6) (ibid., 632) :

Then he deals specifically with the first of the two points and then quite separately, as I think, with the question of what constitutes, in circumstances of this nature, an act of bankruptcy.

I read that as referring to the circumstances which were the particular act of bankruptcy alleged in that case. Then, after quoting from LORD DAVEY's speech in the Vogeler case (6), LORD WRIGHT, M.R., said (ibid., 633) :

That is, as I understand it, saying that you cannot have an act of bankruptcy constituted by a conveyance executed abroad by a foreigner not domiciled in this country and intended to operate according to the law of the foreigner's domicile, which in this case before the House of Lords was the place where the conveyance was executed.

That appears to me to be language most carefully chosen in order to show the limitations which this court put on the operation of the decision in Vogeler's case (6). I am, of course, bound by it, and I think it will not be disrespectful if I say that it is a most happily worded definition. I say "happily," because it introduces what, to my mind, is the important question of domicile as affecting the law under which the particular conveyance is intended to operate. LORD WRIGHT, M.R., said (ibid., 634):

As I have pointed out, the language material to this particular matter, namely, the definition of an act of bankruptcy, stands the same in every one of these three Acts.

The particular matter was the particular matter of a conveyance, and I cannot read those words, or, indeed, any words in either the judgment of LORD WRIGHT, M.R., or that of ROMER, L.J., as meaning that this court was basing its decision, not on the limited construction of the word "conveyance" in s. 1 (1) (a) of the Act of 1914, but on some broader principle that any act committed by a foreigner in order to be an act of bankruptcy must be committed in this country. I read the judgments as quite properly limited to the particular question which was before the court. I think LORD WRIGHT, M.R., made that even more clear where he said (ibid.):

But I do not think, for the reasons I have stated, that that is a matter which is material here, because nothing in the language of the Act of 1914 in my judgment renders inapplicable the decision of the House of Lords defining for this purpose an act of bankruptcy.

Now, "this purpose" was the purpose of the meaning of the word "conveyance." ROMER, L.J., quoted what MELLISH, L.J., said in the Crispin case (4) about the particular case of a conveyance. In relation to the corresponding provision of the Act of 1869, MELLISH, L.J., had said (8 Ch. App. 374, 380):

This seems clearly intended to relate to a conveyance which is to operate according to English law, which a conveyance executed by a domiciled Englishman, although out of England, may do; but a conveyance executed by a domiciled foreigner in his own country must necessarily operate according to the foreign law, and we think it was never intended that such a conveyance should be an act of bankruptcy.

There, in the very origin of this particular piece of jurisprudence, we find the question formulated as being a question of the meaning of the word "conveyance" in that particular paragraph. After referring to the Vogeler case (6), ROMER, L.J., said ([1936] Ch. 622, 636):

The House of Lords held, first of all, that he was not a debtor within the meaning of the Act. That was the ground upon which LORD HALSBURY and, I think, LORD BRAMPTON, decided the case; but LORD DAVEY decided the case on this ground, that even if he were a debtor within the meaning of the Act, it was essential that the act of bankruptcy relied on should be an act of bankruptcy committed in this country . . .

Now, with the greatest possible respect to ROMER, L.J., that is not a complete statement of what LORD DAVEY had said, but it is, in any case, limited to the act of bankruptcy relied on which was the execution of a conveyance. ROMER, L.J., then said (ibid.):

. . . and, following Ex parte Crispin (4) [LORD DAVEY] held that inasmuch as in that case the assignment of all the debtor's property had been executed abroad and was intended to operate according to the foreign law, it was not such an act of bankruptcy as was described by the Act of 1883 . . .

That is again quite clearly limiting his interpretation of the decision to the particular question of what is or is not a conveyance within the meaning of para. (a) of s. 4 (1) of the Act of 1883 and s. 1 (1) of the Act of 1914. The respectful criticism I would make of the observations of ROMER, L.J., is that he omits the question of domicile, which appears to me to be important, and appears to rely too much, and more than the Vogeler case (6) justifies, on the fact of the act of bankruptcy being committed out of this country. In the case of that particular act of bankruptcy, the crucial matter, to my mind, is not where the document was executed, although that may help to answer the question: By what law was it intended to operate? The crucial question is not where it was executed, nor what was the nationality of the person executing it. The question is: What was the law by which the conveyance was intended to operate? In deciding that question, the nationality may be of importance, although it is not nearly of so much importance as the question of domicile. The place where the document was executed may assist the court in answering the question, but the conclusive thing is what is the law under which the document was intended to operate? By "intention," I mean not some spurious or ostensible intention, but the intention that the law will impute, whether he wishes it or not, to the person executing the conveyance.

In my opinion, the argument of counsel for the debtor does not in any way displace what appears to me to be the quite clear meaning of the statutory provisions applicable to the act of bankruptcy alleged in this case. The result is that the language of the statute must have its normal and natural effect, and that this appeal must be allowed.

ASQUITH, L.J. : I entirely agree. The appeal narrows down to two short points:—under s. 1 (2) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, what is meant (i) by "act of bankruptcy" in line 3, and, (ii) by "carrying on business" in para. (c). On the second of these questions I do not desire to add anything to what has fallen from my Lord. As regards the first, I would, at the risk of repetition, like to add two or three observations. The approach of counsel for the debtor to the construction of this sub-section seemed to me altogether too atomistic. He sought to construe the various limbs of the sub-section in isolation from each other, and without making due allowance for their necessary interaction. The limbs are not mere disjecta membra; they are members one of another. The phrase, "any person, whether a British subject or not," is clearly intended to assimilate British subjects and foreigners. If you ask in what respect, you must read on. What follows?—the words "who at the time when any act of bankruptcy was done or suffered by him." Read together, as they ought to be, the two phrases or limbs seem clearly to mean that British subjects and foreigners are being assimilated in respect (inter alia) of the acts of bankruptcy which these two are capable of doing or suffering, a matter in which their assimilation was previously imperfect, amounting to a broad overlap and not a complete coincidence. A British subject could then commit some acts of bankruptcy of which a foreigner, as such, was incapable. The effect, and, indeed, the object, of inserting the words, "whether a British subject or not," must be to abolish that margin of difference and to substitute a complete coincidence between the two. This seems to me to result from the language used, not as a subtle inference, but as a matter of plain grammar. To put it a little differently, a British subject commits an act of bankruptcy when he does or suffers any of the acts set out and enumerated in s. 1 (1). The insertion in s. 1 (2) of the words, "whether a British subject or not," must surely mean that a foreigner also commits an act of bankruptcy when he does any of the acts so set out and enumerated. This seems the plain and natural construction. On the other hand, the construction contended for on behalf of the debtor would compel us to read in after the words "act of bankruptcy" some such words as "not being, in the case of a person who is not a British subject, an act done or suffered by that person outside England." Can the legislature possibly have intended that such a qualification should be read in? And if it did, what becomes of the assimilation of British subjects and foreigners at which the sub-section so obviously aims? This is manifestly a case in which express words in a statute displace any special or narrow meaning which, in the absence of those express words, regard to the comity of nations might have imposed on the expression "act of bankruptcy." I agree with my Lord that the appeal should be allowed.

EVERSHED, L.J. : I also agree. As we are differing from the view of Mr. REGISTRAR PARTON, and the case is one of some novelty, I will add a few observations of my own. The question raised in the appeal is this. Is the debtor, not being a British subject, a debtor who has committed an act of bankruptcy within the meaning of s. 1 (1) of the Act of 1914? The act of bankruptcy alleged is that he, having left England, remained out of England for the purpose of defeating or delaying his creditors. It must also be shown that at that time he was a person carrying on business in England.

As regards the last point, there has been a number of decisions in which the terms "carrying on trade" or "carrying on trade or business," as applicable to married women under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, and the Bankruptcy and Deeds of Arrangement Act, 1913, have been construed thus, by this court, among others—that a person does not cease to carry on business by the operation of what has been called shutting up shop, so long as he remains indebted in respect of debts incurred while he, in the strict meaning of the words, was carrying on business. In my judgment, the statutes referred to must be treated as in pari materia with the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, and I cannot see that anything in the language of the Act of 1914 makes inapplicable the decisions on the earlier Acts, to which I have referred. In my judgment, it is impossible to say that the words "personally, or by means of an agent or manager," in s. 1 (2) (c) have the effect of limiting the effect of the previous words "carrying on business." As regards the question of fact—whether the activity relied on was one to defeat or to delay creditors—at this stage that is a matter merely of prima facie evidence. Whether in truth that was the intention of the debtor will have to be determined hereafter. But I certainly have no difficulty in concluding that, prima facie, the Crown (the petitioning creditor) has made out its case. As my Lord has pointed out, on the day when the assessments were made final, the debtor found it possible and convenient to exchange the amenities of Chelmsford, where he left his wife, for those of Connemara. A letter written by the Crown nine days afterwards elicited the reply that the debtor was away for seven to ten days. But, fourteen days later again, he appears to have entered into a document which, I understand, is described, rather surprisingly, as a deed of separation; for part of the transaction consisted of giving to his wife in Chelmsford a power of attorney, and in exercise of that power she proceeded to sell the business, which the debtor had carried on with considerable profit in Goswell Road, to a company called Goswell Leather Co., Ltd.

Now, that being so, the only question that remains is: Is the debtor a debtor who has committed this act of bankruptcy, seeing that he is a foreigner? For reasons which I do not desire to repeat, if the Act is read according to the ordinary acceptation of the words used, and bearing in mind that the word "debtor" includes both British subjects and non-British subjects, it seems to me that, as a matter of language and unembarrassed by any previous decisions, the argument for the debtor would really be wholly untenable. But it is said that the older decisions produce the result that, notwithstanding the addition in s. 1 (2) of the Act of 1914 of the phrase "whether a British subject or not," still, in the case of a non-British subject who is not domiciled in England, the act of bankruptcy must either be one committed in England or be an act intended to operate according to the laws of England. It seems to me that to put that gloss on s. 1 (2) would require very careful and elaborate formulation and I do not myself attempt it; for, in my judgment, the cases relied on do not in the circumstances produce the result claimed. Those cases, beginning with Re Crispin (4), and subject to one observation that I would wish to make about Re Debtors (5), were cases which arose out of different language—different in the material respect that, under the bankruptcy legislation then in question, the words, "whether a British subject or not," did not find any part as a qualification or description of the word "debtor," and in the absence of those words, prima facie, the word "debtor" would include every person who owed a debt. That being so, the courts thought that some limitation must be placed on the word, and, as I follow the limitation, it may be formulated thus. Since, in the absence of express terms to the contrary, English statutes only affect English subjects or foreigners who either permanently or temporarily come within the allegiance of the English Crown, a debtor who is a foreigner and not within the allegiance of the Crown is not a debtor within the intentment of the bankruptcy laws and not subject to the jurisdiction of the English Bankruptcy Court, unless the act of bankruptcy alleged is either committed in this country or is intended to operate according to the laws of this country.

It seems to me that, once you add to the word "debtor" the descriptive phrase "whether a British subject or not," the whole premiss on which that conclusion rested is, so to speak, knocked away, and it, therefore, seems to me to follow that a decision such as in Re Sawers (3) could not now be regarded as good law. On the other hand, it has been decided by this court that, where the act of bankruptcy alleged is that of a conveyance for the benefit of the creditors, then, following the decision of the House of Lords in Cooke v. Charles A. Vogeler Co. (6), it must still be shown that the conveyance is one intended to operate according to the laws of England. I think it might have been argued that the foundation of Cooke v. Charles A. Vogeler Co. (6), no less than that of the other cases, having been destroyed by the addition of the words "whether a British subject or not," that qualification to the word "conveyance" in s. 1 (1) (a) equally had departed with the Bankruptcy Act, 1914; and it was, indeed, so argued by counsel for the petitioning creditor in Re Debtors (5) in this court in 1936. But, as LORD WRIGHT, M.R., pointed out, notwithstanding that argument, the decision of the House of Lords as regards the word "conveyance" must still be regarded as binding and as good law. If Re Debtors (5) is looked at, there are, no doubt, phrases in it which at first sight might appear to give some support to the view that the old general proposition still remained applicable to some undefined extent, at any rate. But when the case is analysed, it is, in my judgment, plain that all that that case decided was that, for the purpose of s. 1 (1) (a), it is still true to say that a conveyance must mean a conveyance intended to operate according to the law of England. As LORD WRIGHT, M.R., observed ([1936] Ch. 622, 630):

The material question still remains—namely, whether the conveyance in this case is a conveyance or assignment of the debtor's property within the meaning of s. 1 (1) (a), and whatever view I might have been disposed to take if the matter had been free from authority, I am of opinion that I am clearly bound by the decision of the House of Lords in Cooke v. Charles A. Vogeler Co. (6).

That being so, and the decision being confined to that point, the view that it also, so to speak, sanctions the continued application of the wider proposition to a case such as the present would, in any case, be obiter, and, for my part, having regard to the plain terms of the section as I read them, it would need the very clearest expression to satisfy me that one must now so construe the word "debtor" or the words "act of bankruptcy" as to produce—as one would—a direct conflict between the opening words of s. 1 (1) and the language of s. 1 (1) (d). In particular, as counsel for the Crown pointed out, during his reply, if "conveyance," in s. 1 (1) (a) is construed as meaning "conveyance which operates according to the laws of England," no conflict is introduced by the addition of the words "whether a British subject or not" as a description of the word "debtor," and, therefore, no change in the law as it had been declared was required by the terms of s. 1 (2). But if one tries to apply the same principle to s. 1 (1) (d), so great a conflict is at once produced as makes it, I think, impossible sensibly to read para. (d) together with the opening sentence of s. 1 (1). It seems to me, therefore, that Re Debtors (5) must be confined to the construction put on s. 1 (1) (a) and cannot affect such a case as we are concerned with here, namely, one arising under s. 1 (1) (d). For these reasons, as well as those stated, I agree that the appeal succeeds.

Appeal allowed with costs.

EVERITT v. EVERITT.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Merriman, P., Bucknill, L.J., and Lewis, J.), May 3, 4, 5, 6, 10, 11, June 7, 8, July 26, 1948.]

Divorce—Appeal—Decree absolute—Jurisdiction of Court of Appeal—No error of court of trial—No opportunity to appeal against decree nisi—Petition not served on appellant—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (c. 49), s. 31 (1) (e)—Matrimonial Causes Rules 1944, r. 36.

A wife petitioned for a divorce on the ground of desertion. The husband did not enter an appearance. At the hearing evidence of service of the petition was given and, therefore, no error of the court of trial was alleged. A decree nisi was pronounced which was made absolute in due course. The husband applied to the Court of Appeal for leave to appeal against the decree absolute notwithstanding the time for appeal had expired, the ground on which he based the application being that the petition had never been served on him.

HELD: the husband not having appealed from the decree nisi because he had not had the time and opportunity to do so, the Court of Appeal had jurisdiction to entertain his appeal under the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 31 (1) (e).

MOTION by the husband for leave to appeal against a decree absolute notwithstanding that the time for appeal had expired.

The hearing of the motion was by consent treated as the hearing of the appeal. On July 8, 1948, the court, being satisfied that the husband had not been served with the petition in the suit, and, therefore, had had no time and opportunity to appeal against the decree nisi, gave him leave to appeal out of time, allowed the appeal, ordered that both the decree nisi and the decree absolute be set aside, and directed a new trial. Having regard to the importance to the parties to the issues of fact and the general interest of the questions of law involved, their Lordships thought it advisable to put the reasons for their decision into writing.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 26. LORD MERRIMAN, P. : I am asked by LEWIS, J., to say that he has read the judgment which I am about to deliver and agrees with it.

This was a motion by a husband for leave to appeal out of time against a decree absolute made against him on his wife's petition on the ground of desertion. The decree nisi was pronounced by Mr. Commissioner Gannon at Durham on May 19, 1947, and was made absolute on July 8, 1947. The husband bases his application on the ground that he was never served with the petition. This raises a difficult question of jurisdiction. The motion has already come before two other divisions of the Court of Appeal. On the second occasion, because of a doubt whether the Court of Appeal had jurisdiction to entertain such a motion, it was decided to invoke the assistance of the King's Proctor. The motion then came before us for decision, and we have had the advantage of hearing very helpful arguments by counsel not only for the respective spouses, but also on behalf of the King's Proctor, to all of whom we wish to express our obligation for their assistance. In the result, it became apparent that we could not come to a decision without hearing evidence on the question, which was the subject of acute controversy, whether the husband had or had not been served with the petition. We have already held that the court has jurisdiction and that the husband should have leave to appeal, and, it being agreed that the motion should be treated as the hearing of the appeal, have allowed the appeal, set aside the decree absolute, and given the necessary directions for a re-hearing of the wife's petition. But because of the importance to the parties of the issues of fact and the general interest of the questions of law involved, we thought it advisable to put the reasons for our decision into writing. Meanwhile, the petition has been re-heard, the wife has obtained a decree nisi, and the cross-charge of the husband has been dismissed.

It is well settled that a judgment obtained against a party in his absence owing to his not having been served with the process is not merely voidable for irregularity but is void as a nullity : see Craig v. Kanssen (1), and the cases there cited. Manifestly, this general principle applies with full force to a judgment affecting the status of the party : Marsh v. Marsh (2). It is argued that in such a case the judgment is not the subject of an appeal at all, but that the proper method of getting rid of it is to apply to the court by which it was given to set it aside under its inherent jurisdiction as a nullity. This principle is said to be of universal application, but it is further argued that, in the case of a

A decree of divorce or nullity of marriage, whether it be a decree nisi or a decree absolute, the Rules of Court governing appeals provide, in a case such as this, that the application may be made only to a Divisional Court of the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division to the exclusion of the Court of Appeal, although it is conceded that this may not necessarily exclude recourse, by virtue of the court's inherent jurisdiction, to a judge of the High Court or to any commissioner deemed to constitute a court of the High Court in accordance with s. 70 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, having power to determine and try a matrimonial cause. This point arises as follows, remembering always, that appeal is a creature of statute. The jurisdiction of the Court of Appeal is defined by s. 26 of the Judicature Act, 1925. It is unnecessary to quote the section at length. Suffice it to say that the terms of the section are wide enough to cover this case if it can properly be described as an appeal at all. If so, R.S.C., Ord. 58, r. 15, and Ord. 44, r. 7, enable this court to

C extend the time for appeal, although the application was not made until after the expiry of the time allowed, but by s. 27 (1) of the Judicature Act, 1925, the jurisdiction of the Court of Appeal to hear and determine appeals from any judgment or order of the High Court is expressed to be "subject as otherwise provided in this Act and to Rules of Court." By s. 99 of that Act Rules of Court may be made for :

D . . . the following purposes : (a) For regulating and prescribing the procedure (including the method of pleading) and the practice to be followed in the Court of Appeal and the High Court respectively in all causes and matters whatsoever in or with respect to which those courts respectively have for the time being jurisdiction . . . and any matters incidental to or relating to any such procedure or practice, including (but without prejudice to the generality of the foregoing provision) the manner in which, and the time within which, any applications which under this or any other Act are to be made

E to the Court of Appeal or to the High Court shall be made ; (b) for regulating and prescribing the procedure on appeals from any court or person to the Court of Appeal or the High Court . . .

Rule 36 of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1944, reads as follows :

Rehearing. (1) An application for re-hearing of a cause heard by a judge alone where no error of the court at the hearing is alleged shall be made to a Divisional Court of the Probate Division. The application shall be by notice of motion, stating the grounds

F on which it is based, filed in the Divorce Registry and served upon the opposite parties within six weeks after judgment. The notice shall be a fourteen days' notice and may be amended at any time by leave of the judge. (2) Any other application for re-hearing shall be made by way of appeal to the Court of Appeal.

It is said that, subject to a point to be mentioned in a moment, this is clearly a case in which no error of the court at the hearing is alleged in the sense in which

G those words have been interpreted by the Divisional Court of the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division. It is, undoubtedly, the case that the Divisional Court has regarded cases in which the judge has been deceived by evidence of service, the falsity of which he has no means of detecting or in which, although the process may actually have been served, it did not, albeit unintentionally, come to the notice of the party that what was being served was a petition for divorce, as coming within r. 36 of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1944 : see

H Manners v. Manners (3) and Petty v. Petty (4). Our attention, however, was called to the fact that, although the process server affixed to the affidavit of service what purported to be an acknowledgment by the husband of the receipt of the petition and a photograph of the husband as the person on whom the process was served, the transcript of the shorthand note of the hearing does not show that any evidence was received by the learned commissioner from the wife or any other witness identifying either the signature or the photograph as being that of the husband. Had the matter stood thus, it would have been necessary to consider very carefully whether it was possible to assert that no error of the court at the hearing was alleged, seeing that the Divisional Court has laid down that the question whether error is or is not alleged is one of substance and not of form: Peek v. Peek (5), recently decided by the Court of Appeal. It is, however, apparent on the face of the transcript that the short-hand note is not complete, and the wife gave evidence before us, which was not challenged, that she did, in fact, identify both the photograph and the signature at the hearing. In these circumstances we were able to proceed on the footing that service appeared to be strictly proved at the hearing and that no error in this fundamental respect could be attributed to the learned commissioner. In dealing with cases under r. 36 the Divisional Court has always been careful to avoid any semblance of trespassing on the exclusive jurisdiction of the Court of Appeal: Petty v. Petty (4) and Peek v. Peek (5); although, if the Divisional Court is satisfied that a case comes within the rule it is bound, as I pointed out in Peek v. Peek (5), to deal with it because no other court can do so: see also Smith v. Smith (6), decided in the Court of Appeal under r. 62 of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1865, as amended in 1885.

On the face of it, therefore, it might seem that r. 36 of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1944, covers this case, but there are two further points for consideration. First, whether, after a decree has been made absolute it is appropriate to describe an application to set it aside as an application for a re-hearing, or, in other words, whether r. 36 applies at all after a decree has been made absolute; and, secondly, however that may be, whether s. 31 (1) (e) of the Judicature Act, 1925, does not give a substantive right to appeal to the Court of Appeal from a decree absolute. As regards the first point, it is obvious that an application to the Divisional Court under r. 36 and an application to the Court of Appeal for a new trial have this much in common, that in both it is being asserted that a wrong conclusion has been reached and that the judgment must be set aside in order that the matter may be heard afresh: see Petty v. Petty (4). The distinction between the two depends on whether error of the court at the hearing is or is not alleged. This distinction may be paraphrased by using synonyms for the word "error." Thus in a typical application for a re-hearing under r. 36 based on non-service the applicant is asserting that the judgment is wrong, both because he has not committed the matrimonial offence of which he was found guilty and because, not having been served, he has had no opportunity of being heard, but, although the judge was mistaken in believing both that he had been served and that he had committed the matrimonial offence, the applicant does not assert that it was the judge's fault that he went wrong, whereas in an appeal to the Court of Appeal he is asserting that the judge went wrong either by misdirecting himself, or by deciding against the weight of the evidence, or as the case may be.

Little guidance, in my opinion, is to be derived from cases such as Re Giles (7), which was decided under s. 52 of the Judicature Act, 1873, and contrasts with an appeal a motion in the Chancery Division to set aside or vary an order made in chambers to a judge who has expressed a desire to hear the matter more fully in court: see also Boyd v. Bischoffsheim (8), decided under s. 52 of the same Act, or Harman v. Official Receiver (9), where LORD TOMLIN, with reference to an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal restoring an earlier adjudication of bankruptcy which had been discharged by the Court of Appeal, poses the dilemma that the appeal must either be from an order "in bankruptcy matters," in which case it was incompetent for lack of leave by the Court of Appeal, or it was a complete nullity in the sense that it was an appeal against an order made by a court which had no jurisdiction, in which case it was difficult to see how the House of Lords had jurisdiction to deal with it.

This brings me to a consideration of s. 31 of the Judicature Act, 1925, restricting appeals to the Court of Appeal. By sub-s. (1) (e):

No appeal shall lie . . . (e) from an order absolute for the dissolution or nullity of marriage in favour of any party who having had time and opportunity to appeal from the decree nisi on which the order was founded, has not appealed from that decree.

This provision, read positively, must mean that an appeal will lie from an order absolute for the dissolution of marriage in favour of a party who has not appealed from the decree nisi because he has not had the time and opportunity to do so. Manifestly, the lack of time and opportunity to appeal from the decree nisi may be due to a failure to serve the petition, so that the decree itself is a nullity : Craig v. Kanssen (1) ; but this need not be so. For example, a respondent who has been served may not have received notice of the hearing to which he is entitled if he has entered an appearance, and this, in turn, may be due either to a failure to give notice or to some accidental miscarriage. Or a respondent who has actually defended the suit may meet with an accident or be stricken with illness before he has been able to appeal. It is unnecessary to multiply examples. It seems to me that the legislature, in imposing this condition on the right to appeal against a decree absolute, cannot have intended to qualify it with reference to the nature of the particular circumstances in which the lack of time and opportunity to appeal against the decree nisi arose. In my opinion, this appeal from the decree absolute is placed by the legislature in a class by itself and is permitted whenever the statutory condition is fulfilled and not otherwise.

This view of the matter makes it unnecessary to resolve the question left open by the MASTER OF THE ROLLS in Craig v. Kanssen (1), where, in relation to an order giving leave under the Courts (Emergency Powers) Act, 1939, to proceed to the enforcement of a judgment, he says ([1943] K.B. 256, 262) :

Those cases appear to me to establish that a person who is affected by an order which can properly be described as a nullity is entitled ex debito justitiæ to have it set aside. So far as procedure is concerned, it seems to me that the court in its inherent jurisdiction can set aside its own order, and that it is not necessary to appeal from it. I say nothing on the question whether or not an appeal from the order, assuming it to be made in proper time, would be competent.

In this connection reference must be made to the provisions of s. 184 (1) of the Judicature Act, 1925. By that section, as soon as any decree for divorce is made absolute either of the parties to the marriage may, if there is no right of appeal against the decree absolute, marry again as if the prior marriage had been dissolved by death, or, if there is such a right of appeal, may so marry again if no appeal is presented against the decree, as soon as the time for appealing has expired, or, if an appeal is so presented, as soon as the appeal has been dismissed. It may be that the legislature intended that a decree absolute could only be set aside by appeal to the Court of Appeal, and that to avoid uncertainty in connection with re-marriage, a motion to a judge under the inherent jurisdiction of the court and an application to the Divisional Court under r. 36 are alike ruled out.

For a motion to a judge after decree absolute, and, indeed, after re-marriage, there is a precedent in Woolfenden v. Woolfenden ([1948] P. 27), but, as has already been seen, no precedent has been found for an application under r. 36 after decree absolute. In my view, it is unnecessary for the purposes of this case to decide whether either of these alternative methods of setting aside this decree absolute would have been open to the husband, and any opinion on the point would, therefore, be obiter. If the husband was not served with the petition it is not suggested that there are any other circumstances from which it should be inferred that he had time and opportunity to appeal from the decree nisi, and so, on that assumption, this motion is well founded.

The point at issue, therefore, being whether this petition was ever served upon the husband, it becomes necessary to examine the evidence given before us. [HIS LORDSHIP examined the evidence and concluded :—] On a careful consideration of the whole of this evidence I have come to the conclusion that the husband did not sign the acknowledgment of service. I do not feel that I am in a position to draw any certain conclusion as to how the purported signature comes to be on that document, but, in my opinion, this does not prevent me from finding, as I do, that it is established to my satisfaction that it is not the husband's signature.

CARLISH v. EAST HAM CORPORATION AND ANOTHER.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J.), July 15, 21, 1948.]

Requisition—House—Delegation of powers—Sufficiency of letter from Minister—Requisition of part of premises—Need for part to be specified in delegation—Defence (General) Regulations, 1939 (S.R. & O., 1939, No. 927 (as amended)), reg. 51 (1), (5)—Emergency Powers (Defence) Act, 1939 (c. 62), s. 7.

The Minister of Health by letter delegated to the clerk of a local authority his "functions under reg. 51 of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, for the purpose of requisitioning part of [specified] premises for re-housing purposes." In pursuance of the powers so conferred the clerk served on the owner notice of requisition of the premises "excluding shop and shop parlour."

HELD: (i) under the Emergency Powers (Defence) Act, 1939, s. 7, production of the letter was sufficient proof of the delegation.

(ii) the Minister having power to requisition part of the premises under reg. 51 could delegate power to requisition a part thereof without specifying which part, but leaving it to his delegate to requisition so much of the premises as he thought fit.

[FOR THE DEFENCE (GENERAL) REGULATIONS, 1939 (S.R. & O., 1939, No. 927 (as amended)), reg. 51, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Vol. 39, pp. 971, 972.

ACTION for a declaration and an injunction.

The plaintiff had received a notice of the requisitioning of part of his premises from the town clerk of East Ham, acting in pursuance of delegated powers conferred on him by letter by the Minister of Health. He claimed a declaration that the purported requisitioning was void and an injunction restraining the clerk and/or the East Ham corporation from taking possession of the property, his grounds being that the production of the letter was not sufficient proof of the delegation by the Minister of his powers and that the delegation was ultra vires or void because it authorised the requisitioning of part of the premises without specifying which part. The court dismissed the action with costs.

L. A. Blundell for the plaintiff.
Squibb for the defendants.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 21. LORD GODDARD, C.J., read the following judgment. The plaintiff claims a declaration that the purported requisitioning by the defendants on Sept. 3, 1947, of the premises (excluding shop and shop parlour) known as 124, Barking Road, in the county borough of East Ham, is void, and also an injunction restraining the defendants from taking possession of the premises.

It appears that on Sept. 3, 1947, a requisition notice was served by the town clerk on the plaintiff in the following terms:

Take notice that in exercise of the powers delegated to me by the Minister of Health under and by virtue of reg. 51 of the Defence Regulations, 1939, I have this day taken possession of the premises known as 124, Barking Road in the county borough of East Ham excluding shop and shop parlour.

It also appears that on Sept. 1, 1947, a letter from the Ministry of Health was sent to the town clerk of the borough in these terms:—

Sir,

Defence (General) Regulations, 1939.
124, Barking Road.

I am directed by the Minister of Health to refer to the telephone conversation between officers of the Council and this Ministry and to say that he hereby delegates to you, as clerk, his functions under reg. 51 of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, for the purpose of requisitioning part of the above-mentioned premises for re-housing purposes, and consent is hereby given to such requisitioning.

If requisitioning action is taken the dates of requisition should be notified to this department.

I am, Sir,

Your obedient Servant,

A. W. KENT.

By reg. 51 of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, a competent authority, which includes the Minister of Health, is authorised to take possession of any land, which by the regulation includes houses, and may give such directions as appear to the competent authority to be necessary or expedient in connection with the taking of possession of that land, and by para. (5) of the regulation it is provided that a competent authority may, to such extent and subject to such restrictions as it thinks proper, delegate all or any of its functions under paras. (1) to (3) of the regulation to any specified persons or class of persons.

A It is, I think, well-known that for the purpose of providing accommodation for people without homes or who are unsatisfactorily housed, the Minister of Health has delegated his powers under this regulation to local authorities and, indeed, as proved in this case, on July 20, 1945, there was a general delegation by the Minister of his power to requisition unoccupied houses to the local authority or one of their officers giving power to take possession of houses, but subject to certain conditions which it is unnecessary, I think, more particularly to specify, and these conditions have been varied from time to time. By the letter to which I have referred the Minister has purported to delegate his powers to the town clerk of East Ham in respect of the premises therein mentioned without any conditions. It is in effect an ad hoc delegation and the questions that have been argued are whether or not there has been proved a delegation by the Minister and whether the delegation is intra vires or void as being too vague.

C Counsel for the plaintiff contended that mere production of the letter is not enough to prove delegation, but, in my opinion, this point is concluded by s. 7 of the Emergency Powers (Defence) Act, 1939, which is the Act giving statutory authority to the regulations. That section provides that every document purporting to be an instrument made or issued by any Minister or other authority or person in pursuance of any provision contained in, or having effect under, Defence Regulations, and to be signed by or on behalf of the said Minister, authority or person, shall be received in evidence, and shall, until the contrary is proved, be deemed to be an instrument made or issued by that Minister, authority or person. The regulation does not require the delegation of his authority to be made in any particular form, and, in my opinion, this letter, which purports to be written on behalf of the Minister of Health, is an instrument whereby he delegates his functions to the town clerk for the purposes mentioned therein.

E It was, however, contended that this delegation is invalid because it refers to the requisitioning of part of the premises mentioned in the letter and does not say which part. In my opinion, it is clear that the Minister himself could requisition part of a house, and I can find nothing in any regulation, nor has my attention been brought to anything, which would indicate that only a complete house can be requisitioned. If, therefore, the Minister can himself requisition part of a house, it seems to me clear that he can delegate that power to a local authority or an officer of theirs. If the delegation had been for the requisitioning of the whole or any part of the house, I do not think any question could have arisen as to its validity. It seems to me, therefore, that, if he delegates his power to requisition part only, he leaves it to the person whom he has appointed as his delegate to requisition as much or as little of the house as he thinks fit. In my opinion, a valid delegation has been proved, and it was, therefore, in the power of the town clerk to issue the notice in question, and in consequence this action fails and must be dismissed with costs.

R. v. WINCHESTER AREA ASSESSMENT COMMITTEE.

Ex parte WRIGHT.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Scott and Asquith, L.J.J., and Romer, J.), June 9, 10, 11, July 19, 1948.]

Rates and Rating—Valuation list—Amendment—Proposal—Specification of grounds for proposed amendment—Rating and Valuation Act, 1925 (c. 90). A s. 37 (2) (b).

The Rating and Valuation Act, 1925, s. 37 provides: “(1) Any person (including the county valuation committee and any local authority) who is aggrieved by the incorrectness or unfairness of any matter in the valuation list for the time being in force . . . may make in manner provided by this section a proposal for the amendment of the list (in this section referred to as ‘a proposal’) . . . (2) Every proposal made under this section must—(a) be made in writing . . . (b) specify the grounds on which the proposed amendment is supported.” B

A rating authority made a written proposal for the consideration of the assessment committee, sending a copy to the occupier of the two hereditaments with which the proposal was concerned. The proposal stated that the rating authority was “aggrieved by the incorrectness or unfairness of the valuation and assessment of each hereditament in the valuation list.” The schedule stated the amounts of the existing and the proposed valuations, and opposite the words “Grounds of proposal” on the form used were the words “Revised assessments.” It was contended that the proposal was invalid under s. 37 (2) because it did not specify the grounds on which the proposed amendments were supported. C

Held: the schedule made clear the respect and extent to which it was alleged that the existing valuations were incorrect or unfair and, therefore, the proposal satisfied s. 37 (2) (b). D

Upper Agbrigg Assessment Committee v. Gartsides (Brookside Brewery), Ltd. and Bents Brewery Co., Ltd., ([1945] 1 All E.R. 338), distinguished.

Per cur.: the authorities establish that the proposal must give sufficient information to enable the assessment committee to know (1) whether an increase or a decrease is asked for, it not being necessary for the producer to state in his proposal the precise figure to which the relevant valuation should be increased or reduced; (2) to which of the existing valuations in the rate book the proposal refers; and (3) what is the ground of complaint as to the existing valuation on that head. It is enough to state “incorrect or unfair” unless there is some unusual ground, in which case it ought to be specified. E

APPEAL by the Winchester Area Assessment Committee from a decision of the Divisional Court of the King's Bench Division that an order of certiorari should issue to quash a proposal for the amendment of certain rating valuations made by the rating authority for the borough of Eastleigh. The Court of Appeal allowed the appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of SCOTT, L.J., and in the headnote.

H. B. Williams, K.C., and Squibb for the applicant, Wright.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 19. SCOTT, L.J., read the following judgment. This appeal turns on the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925, s. 37 (2), but to appreciate the full meaning of that sub-section it is necessary to consider the relevant part of the first sub-section; I will read both:

(1) Any person (including the county valuation committee and any local authority) who is aggrieved by the incorrectness or unfairness of any matter in the valuation list for the time being in force, . . . may make in manner provided by this section a proposal for the amendment of the list (in this section referred to as "a proposal"), and where a rating authority in pursuance of the provisions of this Act make any amendment in a rate other than the correction of a clerical or arithmetical error, or the correction of an erroneous insertion, omission, or misdescription, the authority shall forthwith make a proposal for any necessary amendment of the list. (2) Every proposal made under this section must—(a) be made in writing and, except where it is made by the rating authority, be served on the rating authority; (b) specify the grounds on which the proposed amendment is supported.

The rating authority for the borough of Eastleigh in the Winchester Assessment area made a written proposal for consideration at the meeting of the assessment committee at Winchester fixed for May 7, 1947, and caused a copy to be transmitted to Mr. G. A. Wright, the occupier of the two cinemas mentioned in the notice. He took the view that the proposal was bad in law because it did not "specify the grounds on which the proposed amendment was supported," and obtained from the King's Bench Division an order by way of a certiorari quashing the proposal. The appeal is from that order. The first judgment of that court was delivered by LORD GODDARD, C.J., and, as the court, without discussing the legal merits of the argument addressed to it by the applicant, were of opinion that the facts of the case before it were indistinguishable from those of Bents Brewery Co., Ltd. v. Upper Agbrigg Assessment Committee (1), they made the order, LORD GODDARD, C.J., saying that, as he could not distinguish the present proposal from the proposal in that case, which was a King's Bench decision binding on them, he refrained from expressing any opinion of his own and hoped the case would be taken to this court.

It has been judicially recognised that, in passing the Act, it was the intention of Parliament that aggrieved persons should be able to act on many of its provisions, including s. 37, without legal assistance: see R. v. West Norfolk Assessment Committee (2) per GREER, L.J. (94 J.P. 203):

. . . it is not intended by the statute that his difficulties should be such that he would have to go to an expert or to a lawyer to draw up his proposal.

The language of proposals, by whomsoever made, should, therefore, be read without too much legal strictness. None the less, the requirements of sub-ss. (1) and (2) must be substantially satisfied if the "proposal" is to be effective and valid. Some sort of "specification" of grounds of the proposal is demanded, e.g., it must be clear whether it is an increase or a decrease of the assessment that is proposed. The actual figures need not be stated, but the grounds for proposing a change must be "specified"—and that means clearly stated and stated with some definiteness or particularity. On the one hand, if an increase or decrease is plainly proposed, it is not necessary to quantify it, as the opposer must be presumed ready to justify before the assessment committee his resistance to change. On the other hand, the proposer must give a reason of sufficient legal validity and relevance to constitute a good ground in law for some increase or decrease, as the case may be, and under that head I think the trend of the decisions is that it will suffice if the proposal makes it clear that, unless the change is made of the valuation of the hereditament with which the proposal is concerned, it will be either "incorrect" or "unfair," i.e., within the meaning of those words in rating law.

In Bents' case (1) the insufficiency of the statement of grounds seemed to the court to be obvious, first, because it gave no indication at all of the reasons why an alteration was proposed, the only stated ground being "annual revision," which was meaningless since the Act of 1925 only called for general revision every five years, and, secondly, because there was in the proposal no allegation of unfairness or incorrectness. In my view, therefore, that case was rightly decided, but the present case differs from it in two respects. The schedule shows that an increase is proposed and also what exact increases of both gross and rateable valuations are proposed. It begins with the statement that the rating authority is "aggrieved by the incorrectness or unfairness of the valuation and assessment of each hereditament in the valuation list," i.e., alternative grounds are there stated, and in the space on the form used, opposite the words "Grounds of proposal," there appear the words "Revised assessments." LORD GODDARD, C.J., thought those words were synonymous with, or contained no more information than, the words "annual revision" put forward as the "specification of grounds" in Bents' case (1), but, with diffidence, I incline to the view that, even by themselves, they mean rather more than that, as they seem to me to import an intention to ask, at the then prospective meeting of the assessment committee, for revision, and the schedule makes it clear that it is an upward revision which is proposed, but, even if that is too kind a reading of the words, taken alone, the charge of "incorrectness" or "unfairness," predicated in the earlier part of the proposal, must be read into the ungrammatical phrase "Revised assessments." For these reasons, apart from authorities, I think that this proposal does satisfy s. 37 (2) (b).

It is not necessary to discuss all the cases cited to us, but we have considered them. In R. v. West Norfolk Assessment Committee (2) the Court of Appeal, consisting of SCRUTTON, GREER and SLESSER, L.JJ., expressed opinions about s. 37 which (although not all of them were the basis of the decision) are entitled to great respect, and the case did decide that a quantitative statement in the proposal of the figure of increase or decrease is unnecessary. The opinion was expressed that the old practice about objections, so far as their reasons were concerned, was, so to speak, carried forward into the new provisions about proposals. GREER, L.J., took the view (ibid.), which I have already quoted, that because "objections of this sort most frequently have to be made by the occupier, who is paying a rent for premises" strict requirements about the form in which the proposal was to be expressed could not have been intended by Parliament. That view was, I think, a mere application of the principles relevant to objections under the old practice as affirmed by the House of Lords in Gateshead Assessment Committee v. Redheugh Colliery, Ltd. (3): see per VISCOUNT CAVE, L.C. ([1925] A.C. 317); per VISCOUNT FINLAY (ibid., 325), and per LORD SHAW (ibid., 329). It should be borne in mind that "unfairness or incorrectness" constituted prima facie a sufficient specification of grounds for objection under the Union Assessment Committee Act, 1862, s. 18.

In R. v. Thanet and District Assessment Committee (4), a Divisional Court case, the proposal of the valuation committee was in these terms ([1939] 2 K.B. 640):

I, the undersigned, on behalf of the Kent County Valuation Committee, which is aggrieved by the incorrectness of the valuation list of your rating area, hereby make a proposal for amendment of such list in respect of the property shown in the schedule hereunder written, on the ground that the present assessments are unfair and incorrect.

Then followed a description of the applicants' property and its then assessed value, and at the foot of the proposal, under the heading "amendment proposed," appeared the words:

To such an amount as may be determined on an approved apportionment of the cumulo value of the undertaking having regard to the accounts relating thereto in respect of the year ended Dec. 31, 1937.

The court held that the last four lines of the proposal made it impossible to discover what was proposed: see per HUMPHREYS, J. (ibid., 648):

When I look at this document which is called a proposal for the amendment of the list, I find that it gives no information at all as to what is the answer to the natural question which would be put by a person to whom such a document was addressed: "What is your proposed amendment?" It appears to me the answer is: "We are not going to tell you for the very good reason that we do not know, but, that some proposed amendment is desirable, we maintain." In my view, that is quite contrary to the requirement of sub-s. (2) (b) of s. 37, and to the plain meaning and the whole intention of this statute.

A In the present case the schedule is quite explicit as it states precisely the respect and extent in which it is alleged that the existing valuations are incorrect or unfair. In R. v. Heston and Isleworth Rating Authority (5) a Divisional Court considered the West Norfolk case (2) and the Thanet case (4) and followed the view expressed by the Court of Appeal in the former, viz., that it is not necessary for the proposer to state in his proposal the precise figure to which the relevant valuation should be reduced or—as the case may be—increased.

B Then came the Bents Brewery case (1) with which I have already dealt. The litigation between the parties in that case came before the Court of Appeal in 1945, but it was on a totally different point and has no bearing on the present appeal. The next case cited to us was R. v. Reading Assessment Committee (6), another decision of a Divisional Court. There the proposal stated the grounds as "existing assessment unfair incorrect and insufficient";

C but in a column headed "proposed assessment" there appeared opposite the details of the existing valuations only the words "to be amended." The hereditament in that case was partly industrial and partly non-industrial, each rated separately. The court held that the added words did not give sufficiently definite information, and, treating the case as governed by the Thanet decision (4), disallowed the proposal. In R. v. Surrey Assessment Committee (7), before a Divisional Court consisting of LORD GODDARD, C.J.,

D HUMPHREYS and PRITCHARD, JJ., the proposal form gave as grounds "insufficient incorrect and unfair"; and, while stating the existing assessment, added "The precise assessment desired will be notified at a later date." The court held that the proposal was sufficient on the ground that an increase was being asked for and that the other particulars gave sufficient information.

E I find it difficult to harmonise all these decisions, but state my conclusions thus: The proposal must give sufficient information to enable the assessment committee to know (1) whether an increase or a decrease is asked for; (2) to which of the existing valuations in the rate book the proposal refers; (3) what is the ground of complaint as to the existing valuation on that head; and it is enough to state "incorrect or unfair" unless there is some unusual ground, in which case it ought to be specified. The proposal before us satisfies those criteria. There must be judgment accordingly; the appeal will be allowed; and the order of certiorari made by the Divisional Court rescinded with costs.

F to the applicant here and below.

ASQUITH, L.J.: I agree with the judgment delivered by my Lord. It is true that the only words appearing in the proposal in the space opposite the words "Grounds of proposal" is "Revised assessments." If the actual grounds had to be sought in this space exclusively, the words "Revised assessments" would, in my view, have been plainly insufficient. To say: "My assessments ought to be revised because they ought to be revised," is not to state any ground for their revision, but it has been laid down emphatically that a proposal need not be a strict or formal document, and I think statements contained in parts of the proposal other than the space opposite "Grounds of proposal" can be prayed in aid to eke out insufficiency at that point. With these supplementary materials admitted, I agree with SCOTT, L.J., that the rather unexact criteria laid down in the cases are satisfied, and that

H the appeal should be allowed.

SCOTT, L.J.: My brother ROMER, J., says he agrees with the two judgments delivered.

Appeal allowed with costs.

CHAPMAN v. KIRKE.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Singleton and Denning, JJ.), July 29, 1948.]

Stage Carriage—Electric tramway car—"Injuring property of owner"—Negligence not amounting to "wanton and furious driving"—Stage Carriages Act, 1832 (c. 120), s. 48.

The appellant was driving an electric tramway car, the property of his employers. Owing to lack of care and skill amounting to negligence, but not to wanton and furious driving, the car collided with a lorry and was damaged. The appellant was found guilty of the offence, under s. 48 of the Stage Carriages Act, 1832, of injuring the property of the owner of a stage carriage.

HELD : (i) an electric tramcar, being a vehicle which proceeds from stage to stage at regular, or more or less regular, intervals, and carries passengers who pay separate fares, was a stage carriage.

(ii) it was sufficient to render the appellant liable to conviction under s. 48 of the Act, if he was proved through negligence to have caused injury to the property of the owner of the vehicle, it not being necessary to prove that he had been guilty of wanton and furious driving.

[AS TO STAGE CARRIAGES, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 31, pp. 702, 703, paras. 1051, 1052; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 42, p. 851, Nos. 56-58.]

CASE STATED by stipendiary magistrate of Bradford.

On Apr. 6, 1948, the appellant, Albert Chapman, was convicted by the stipendiary magistrate on an information, preferred by the respondent, Police-sergeant Kirke, charging that on or about Jan. 31, 1948, he being the driver of a certain stage carriage, to wit, tramway car No. 255, on a certain street there called Leeds Road did through negligence unlawfully injure the property of the owners of the said carriage, contrary to s. 48 of the Stage Carriages Act, 1832. The magistrate imposed a fine of £1 on the appellant who now appealed. The Divisional Court dismissed the appeal.

M. R. Nicholas for the appellant.

G. Norman Black for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J. : It appears that the learned magistrate came to the conclusion that the appellant had been guilty of negligence in not applying his brakes soon enough to prevent a collision with a lorry which was in front of him. We are not concerned with whether or not there was negligence. That was entirely for the magistrate. The two points which have been argued are (i) whether or not the tramway car was a stage carriage, and (ii) whether, before the appellant could be convicted in connection with the driving of the car, his conduct must amount to wanton and furious driving.

The Stage Carriages Act, 1832, under which the appellant was charged contains, in s. 5, the following definition of a stage carriage :

Every carriage used or employed for the purpose of conveying passengers for hire to or from any place in Great Britain, and which when passing along any highway or other road shall travel at the rate of three miles or more in the hour, shall, without regard to the form or construction thereof, be deemed and taken to be a stage carriage within the meaning of this Act; provided the passengers, or any one or more of them, thereby conveyed, shall be charged or shall pay separate and distinct fares or a separate and distinct fare, or shall be charged or pay at the rate of separate and distinct fares, for their respective places or seats or his place or seat therein or conveyance thereby; and in all proceedings at law or otherwise, and upon all occasions whatsoever, it shall be sufficient to describe any carriage used or employed as aforesaid by the term "stage carriage" without further or otherwise describing the same: Provided always, that the said term "stage carriage" shall not be deemed to extend to or to include any carriage used or employed as aforesaid wholly upon any railway, nor to any carriage drawn or impelled by the power of steam or otherwise than by animal power.

- That definition was repealed by s. 39 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1869, but s. 48 was not repealed, and it remains an offence to this day if the driver of a stage carriage does certain things which are set out in that section. It is said that, the definition being repealed, a man cannot be prosecuted as the driver of a stage carriage because there is no means of showing what a stage carriage is. The phrase, it is argued, must be confined to those things which were stage carriages in 1832, and, of course, an electric tramway car was not invented then. I do not think that is a sound argument. In my view, while it is true that the court has to approach the interpretation of s. 48 without the assistance of the definition in s. 5, it seems clear from R. v. Ruscoe (1) that the courts in those days (1838) knew perfectly well what a stage carriage was. The judgments all show that the court did not want any assistance in defining the expression "stage carriage." The court knew what a stage carriage was just as it is taken to know any other ordinary expression in the English language.
- It is not uninteresting to see that in the argument in that case the definition of "stage carriage" given in DR. JOHNSON'S DICTIONARY was cited. Dr. Johnson died a good many years before 1832. In my opinion, there is no doubt that a vehicle which proceeds from stage to stage at regular, or more or less regular, intervals, and carries passengers who pay separate fares, is a stage coach or a stage carriage, whichever expression you like to use. Therefore, it was for the magistrate to decide whether the vehicle which the appellant was driving was one which could properly be described as a stage carriage. Without going into the great research and discussion which the learned magistrate went into, I think the case is concluded by R. v. Ruscoe (1), which shows that "stage carriage" is an expression known to the common law.

- Then it was said that as wanton and furious driving is expressly mentioned in s. 48, a man cannot be convicted of anything in relation to the driving of a stage carriage unless his driving amounts to wanton or furious driving. The words of the section, however, seem to me to be perfectly clear. They are :

- If the driver or conductor or guard of any stage carriage . . . shall through intoxication or negligence, or by wanton and furious driving, or by or through any other misconduct, endanger the safety of any passenger or other person, or shall injure or endanger the property of the owner or proprietor of such stage carriage or of any other person, every such person so offending shall forfeit £5.
- If it is found that the driver injured the property of his master through negligence, and there is evidence on which the magistrate could so find, we cannot say that wanton or furious driving must be proved before he can be convicted. For these reasons, I think the magistrate came to a correct determination in point of law and this appeal must be dismissed.

- SINGLETON, J. : I agree.

- DENNING, J. : I do not wish it to be supposed that when a section of an Act is repealed it cannot thereafter be considered when other provisions in the Act fall to be interpreted, but in this particular instance I regard s. 5 of the Act of 1832 as putting artificial limitations on what would otherwise be a stage carriage. The effect of the Act of 1869 was to remove those artificial limitations, leaving the term "stage carriage" in its full scope, which is sufficiently wide to cover this case. I agree that this appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

JACKSON STANSFIELD AND SONS v. BUTTERWORTH.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Scott and Asquith, L.JJ., and Jenkins, J.), May 7, June 14, 22, July 19, 1948.]

Building—Control—Licence—Need to be in writing—Permitted cost of work exceeded—Oral permission covering excess—Retrospective effect of licence—Defence (General) Regulations, 1939 (S.R. & O., 1939, No. 927 (as amended)), reg. 56A (2), (6).

By the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, reg. 56A (2), the carrying out of any building specified in sched. VI, pt. III, to the regulations "shall be unlawful except in so far as there is in force in respect thereof a licence granted by" the Minister of Works. By para. (6): "If any . . . work is carried out in contravention of" inter alia para. (2) "the person at whose expense . . . the work is carried out, and . . . the person undertaking . . . the carrying out of the work . . . shall each be guilty of an offence against this regulation." Paragraph (6A) imposes a fine and imprisonment for a contravention of the regulation.

On May 10, 1946, the plaintiffs, a firm of builders, obtained a licence under reg. 56A (2), on behalf of the defendant, for work (described as "repairs to garages") to be carried out at a total cost not exceeding £35. The licence was in writing, in the form prescribed by the Minister of Works, and was granted by the borough surveyor on behalf of the local authority which was empowered to act for the Minister in the matter. While carrying out the work, the plaintiffs found that the total cost would exceed £35 and they obtained oral permission from the borough surveyor to complete the work, provided that the total cost did not exceed £100. The work was, accordingly, completed, the total cost amounting to £69 18s. 2d. Some months later, in response to a written application by the plaintiffs, the borough surveyor issued a written licence, expressed to be supplementary to the licence of May 10, 1946, for "further repairs to garages" at a total cost not exceeding £34 18s. In an action by the plaintiffs to recover the cost of the work, the defendant contended that the plaintiffs were debarred from recovering the excess over the £35 as there was no licence in force in respect thereof as required by reg. 56A (2), and the additional work, was, therefore, illegal.

HELD: (i) the "supplementary" licence was of no effect, because the wording of reg. 56A (2) prevented a licence having any retrospective effect and required the licence to precede the work.

(ii) [JENKINS, J., dissenting]: in view of the fact that persons contravening reg. 56A were liable to prosecution and that the effective enforcement of the licensing system could not be achieved except by means of written licences, the licence contemplated by reg. 56A (2) must be a written document, and, accordingly, the oral permission given to the plaintiffs did not amount to a licence within the meaning of the regulation.

(iii) therefore, the additional work was illegal and the plaintiffs were debarred from claiming payment for it.

Per SCOTT, L.J.: Observations on (a) the desirability of publicity in regard to anything that amounts in law to sub-delegated legislation, and (b) the validity of the practice of delegating to the Minister of Health or to local authorities the powers given to the Minister of Works.

APPEAL by the defendant from an order of His Honour JUDGE BATT, made at Todmorden County Court on Sept. 23, 1947, allowing the plaintiffs' claim for the cost of building work done by them for the defendant. While carrying out the work under a written licence, issued under the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, reg. 56A (2), the plaintiffs found that the total cost of the work would exceed the amount covered by the licence. They obtained oral permission from the local authority to proceed with the work and later, after the work was completed, they obtained a written licence in respect of the additional work. In an action by the plaintiffs to recover the cost of the work done, the defendant claimed that the plaintiffs were debarred from recovering the cost of the additional work as there was no licence in respect of it, and, therefore, it was illegal. The Court of Appeal (JENKINS, J., dissenting) now allowed the appeal by the defendant from the judgment of the county court judge in favour of the plaintiffs. The facts appear in the judgment of

Cur. adv. vult.

July 19. The following judgments were read.

B

SCOTT, L.J. : This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment of His Honour JUDGE BATT sitting in the Todmorden county court in which he gave judgment in favour of the plaintiffs for £69 18s. 2d. and costs in respect of work done for the defendant during a fortnight ending July 11, 1946, on alterations or repairs to his garage. That work fell within the category of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, reg. 56A (2), and sched. VI, pt. III, of the then current Defence Regulations. The paragraph provides that such work :

... shall be unlawful except in so far as there is in force in respect thereof a licence granted by the Minister.

Under para. (1) (c) of that regulation the Minister was identified as the Minister of Works. On May 10, 1946, a licence in respect of the work then proposed to be done, described as "repairs to garages," was issued by one S. Greenwood, the borough surveyor of Todmorden, purporting to sign on behalf of the Minister of Works, at a "total cost not exceeding £35." The licence was addressed on its face to the defendant "per" the plaintiffs. The work done and sued for amounted to £69 18s. 2d., exceeding the licence limit by £34 18s. 2d. and was, therefore, made unlawful by the express provision of reg. 56A. There were certain other issues raised below, but they turned on questions of fact, were decided in favour of the plaintiffs, and are now not open before us. The only issue we have to decide is the defence of illegality. For the defendant, I gather, it was contended below that the provision I have quoted made the whole work unlawful, and, therefore, debarred the plaintiffs from recovering even up to £35, but before us the defendant was content to limit his contention to the excess over £35. Regulation 56A (6) provides :

If any . . . work is carried out in contravention of any of the first three paragraphs of this regulation the person at whose expense . . . the work is carried out, and (where he is not the same person) the person undertaking . . . the carrying out of the work, and . . . any architect, engineer or other person employed in an advisory or supervisory capacity in connection with . . . the carrying out of the work shall each be guilty of an offence against this regulation . . .

F

Paragraph (6A) imposes liability to fine and imprisonment. On Jan. 16, 1946, the Minister of Works, in exercise of his sub-delegated powers to legislate by order conferred by reg. 56A, para. (2), made the Control of Building Operations (No. 6) Order, 1946 (S.R. & O., 1946, No. 86), which permitted such work to be carried out without a licence during the period running from Feb. 1 to July 31, 1946, up to £2 per month, and, in addition, allowed unlicensed work up to a further £10. The whole of the work was carried out in a fortnight, it being finished by July 11, 1946. The limit for unlicensed work was, therefore, £12, but there is no provision, either in that order or in the regulation which authorised the addition, of any amount for such unlicensed work to the licensed limit. I read the regulation and order together as meaning that, when the figure for work proposed exceeds the limit allowed by the order, the whole has to be licensed. That order, therefore, has no relevance. At some stage during the carrying out of the work, after it was clear that the total was going to exceed £35, the plaintiffs saw the borough surveyor and received an unwritten assurance from him that "if the work did not exceed £100 they might carry it out." I suspect that this assurance was due to a misreading by him of a circular by the Minister of Health, to which I shall refer presently, but his reason is irrelevant. It was contended for the plaintiffs (i) that this assurance amounted to an oral licence, and (ii) that there was nothing in the delegated legislation to require the licence to be in writing. For reasons which I will state later, I think the licence contemplated in the regulation must be a written document. I, therefore, reject the second contention, but I accept the first.

G

Finally, on Apr. 25, 1947, long after the work had all been carried out, the plaintiffs obtained from the same surveyor a further licence, viz., for £34 18s. 2d., the unlicensed balance over the £35. It was marked "supplementary to" the earlier licence. The wording, however, of reg. 56A, para. (2), prevents any such licence having any retrospective effect, because it makes the doing of the work unlawful "except in so far as there is in force" the necessary licence, and that obviously means "there then is." The licence must precede the work.

The appeal, therefore, resolves itself into the one question whether the oral permission given by the borough surveyor had the legal effect of a licence issued by or on behalf of the Minister of Works. The regulation contains no express provision on the point, but it makes four different persons standing in different relationships to the work guilty of a criminal offence, punishable by fine and imprisonment, if there is not, while the work is being done, in existence a valid licence. That provision seems to me necessarily to pre-suppose the absence of any difficulty in ascertaining from the licence itself exactly what the work was in respect of which each of those persons is liable to be prosecuted. In addition, it must be borne in mind that the work may be very extensive. If the licence were merely an unrecorded oral permission, the certainty needed for a criminal prosecution would not be a practical possibility. Finally, the expression, "a licence," contemplates a concrete thing, i.e., a document. Had oral permission been the intended condition, different language would have been used. For these reasons I think that the only reasonable construction to put on the words in the regulation is that the licence must be written.

That a written licence was called for by reg. 56A was, I think, certainly assumed by the Minister of Works when making the orders under it. I do not, of course, suggest that the mere fact that he construed the words "a licence" in a particular way has any legal relevance to the problem of interpretation which we have to determine, but the literature issued to the local authorities of the country on the subject by the Minister of Health, evidently acting in co-operation with the Minister of Works, and also by the Minister of Works, may have a bearing on that problem, if, as I think is plainly the case, the contents of that literature throw light on the nature of the mischief to which the legislation contained in the regulations and order was addressed. As I have already said, I see personally no ambiguity in their language in regard to the point at issue, but my brother JENKINS does, and he solves the problem in the opposite way to mine. That being so, I recognise at once that I may be wrong in thinking the phrase unambiguous, and, if it is ambiguous, the contents of that literature, put before us by the parties as showing the way in which the legislation was being administered, may properly be looked at if it throws light on the nature of the mischief to which the licensing system was directed. That, in my view, is, in fact, the position. I, therefore, turn to it as an aid in the interpretation of the words, which, for that purpose, I will assume are ambiguous. I am satisfied that the method of administering reg. 56A through the local authorities, in fact adopted by the government, was satisfactory in itself—indeed, I think it was the best and, possibly, the only practicable way of doing it. Its relevance to the single issue in the appeal lies in the one fact which emerges from my detailed examination of it, namely, that the effective enforcement of the licensing system could never be achieved except by means of written licences. The description of the work licensed and the prosecution of offenders who departed from the specification of the work described were essential if the system was to achieve the purpose of controlling the use of materials and labour as intended by the regulation. That is my answer to the view taken by my brother JENKINS. I regret the length of my judgment, but I hope that the few incidental comments which I feel bound to make may be of public use.

Our attention was called to the many orders made by the Minister of Works.

They are all mentioned in BUTTERWORTH'S EMERGENCY LEGISLATION SERVICE. In BUTTERWORTH'S note to the Control of Building Operations (No. 10) Order, 1947, (which appears to have been the eighth successive order issued under reg. 56A and the second following on the revocation of the Control of Building Operations (No. 6) Order, 1946), immediately after the epitome of orders by the Minister of Works there appear, under the title of "Licensing by Local Authorities," references to "circulars" issued by the Minister of

A Health. At the hearing we were puzzled as to how the Minister of Health came into the statutory picture of sub-delegated legislation under reg. 56A, and as to how local authorities were empowered to act as licensing authorities. We, therefore, adjourned the hearing for the parties to obtain the necessary information and copies of the relevant documents, including that Minister's "circulars." As a result, we have gradually received from the solicitors to the parties, with the courteous assistance of the Treasury Solicitor, a sufficiently complete set of documents. It includes the actual licence of 1946 and the belated one of 1947. In the collection are a series of successive circulars issued by the Minister of Health to all local authorities, starting with No. 123 of July 5, 1945, and ending with No. 8 of Jan. 20, 1947. Of these, circular No. 50/1946 is the one directly applicable to work done in June and July, 1946. In addition, we have been supplied with two printed forms issued by the Minister of Works, whether directly or through the Minister of Health, to all local authorities, one being entitled "Application for a Building Licence," and the other being the form of the licence itself. These two forms were, I infer, used universally in connection with the directions and instructions contained in the circulars. We have also received three printed booklets, issued by the Minister of Works to local authorities, either direct or through the Minister of Health, the first two entitled "Notes for Guidance of Local Authorities" and "Notes for Guidance of Applicants." Like the Minister of Health's "circulars," the "Notes for Guidance of Local Authorities" were issued from time to time by the Minister of Works and given serial numbers "C.L.A.1 to 5," No. 3 being the one in force in June, 1946, and No. 5 having been issued in April, 1947. No. 5 is headed "Confidential: for circulation to local authorities only." The "Notes for Guidance of Applicants" appear not to have been issued till September, 1946, and, therefore, do not throw any light on this appeal. It would seem, therefore, that at the time material for our consideration there was nothing published for the information of the public. The copies of the "circulars" supplied to us were type-written, so, perhaps, they were never printed. Circular 123 of 1945 makes it clear beyond all doubt that the Minister of Health understood reg. 56A as requiring a written licence, and I take it for granted, as the Minister of Health had no statutory powers entrusted to him by the regulation, that his circulars purporting to relate to reg. 56A were drafted by the Minister of Works, or, at least, in direct collaboration with his department and with his approval, so that this court may assume complete knowledge by him of their contents. The circulars are so important, especially in the information they contain about the machinery of licensing (which was, apparently, withheld from the public) that I think I ought to cite illustrative passages. I begin with No. 123/45 which, though cancelled, led up to No. 50 of 1946:

1. I am directed by the Minister of Health to say that, as local authorities generally will be aware, the licensing limit prescribed under Defence Regulation 56A has already been reduced by statutory orders from £100 to £10 in the London Civil Defence Region and in certain other specified districts in the Home Counties. The reductions were made primarily with a view to concentrating all available labour in the hands of the local authorities concerned for the urgent repair of war damage to houses. 2. When the reductions were made the local authorities agreed to undertake the licensing of work generally between the limits of £10 and £100 per year in their respective areas. 3. Apart from the repair of war damage, there are other essential needs, especially those of housing, which have to be met throughout the whole country, and it is necessary to make building and civil engineering labour available for these to the utmost practicable extent. It has been decided, therefore, to extend the reduction (subject to what is said below) throughout England and Wales, and, after consultation with the Association of Local Authorities, to invite all local authorities to undertake the necessary licensing of work up to £100 in the same way as it is now undertaken by local authorities in the London Civil Defence Region and the other districts referred to in para. 1 above. Local authorities, because of their knowledge of local needs, are in the best position to judge to what extent licences can be allowed from time to time without prejudice to housing and other essential work; and their handling of licensing applications will give them the power themselves to ensure the necessary concentration of local labour on such work. 4. The arrangements set out in this circular will relate to the period from Aug. 1, 1945, to Jan. 31, 1946. They will be subject to review in respect of subsequent periods . . . 7. The Minister feels sure that the local authorities whose districts are now being affected by the reduction for the first time will be willing to undertake the licensing of work up to £100 per annum, in the same way as the local authorities referred to in para. 1 above have undertaken the task. The Minister of Works accordingly authorises the clerk of the council or other officer properly appointed by the council to issue licences on his behalf for building and civil engineering work on any property, whether residential or not, situated within the area of the council, the cost of which exceeds the "free allowances" as set out in para. 5 above, and does not exceed £100. 8. All applications to carry out building, etc., work the cost of which exceeds £100, will be dealt with as heretofore by the Ministry of Works. 9. It is anticipated that in practice the local authorities will deal with the vast majority of applications up to £100, but it will be necessary for the Minister of Works to retain, at least for the present, his right to issue licences up to that sum concurrently with the council, for example, in cases where work must be done at the request of a government department . . . 11. The broad policy in regard to licensing is that the amount of work allowed in each area should be related to the labour available after the needs of all works of higher priority have been met, in such a way as to ensure that all the available labour in the district is absorbed and that unemployment is prevented. Local authorities are requested to keep in close touch with the local officers of the Ministry of Works and the Ministry of Labour so far as necessary to secure that this object is attained. In conformity with this principle the works to which local authorities should grant priority for licences would include the urgent repair of war damage to both houses and other property, the provision of other immediate housing needs, including maintenance, repair and conversion, the safeguarding of health, the prevention of danger to the public, and for dealing with emergencies arising in connection with building structures.

The next document in order of date is "Notes to Local Authorities," No. C.L.A.3, issued in July, 1945. It contains the following references to licences:

8. Issue of Licences. The circumstances to be applied in the issue of licences are given in the Ministry of Health circular No. 123/45. The licence is a legal document, and in the event of failure to observe its provisions, it will be used as the basis of proceedings. The licence must therefore describe clearly the work to which it relates, and impose a limit on the cost thereof. It must always be made out to the building owner and, where any other person has signed the application form on behalf of the owner, c/o that person. Licences should be signed "on behalf of the Minister of Works" by the duly authorised officer of the council and should be rubber stamped to indicate the name of the local authority. Licences should not bear facsimile or "per pro" signatures . . . 15. Returns. It is not desired that local authorities should keep elaborate records of applications they receive for licences, but it is suggested that a separate reference number shall be allocated to each case and that an alphabetical record of addresses should be kept so that the position in regard to the building work on the properties concerned can be readily ascertained. Each licence should show in bold letters in the top right-hand corner whichever of the following symbols is appropriate: [indicating class of work]. Two carbon copies of the licence should be taken.

The "C.L.A." series emanated direct from the Ministry of Works.

We get further light thrown retrospectively on the reasons why a written licence was essential, even at the time when reg. 56A was passed, from para. 8 ("Issue of Licences") and para. 9 ("Issue of Supplementary Licences") contained in C.L.A.5, issued in April, 1947. That edition of "Notes to Local Authorities" was for some curious reason headed: "Confidential (for circulation to local authorities only)."

8. In the event of failure to observe the provisions of a licence, the licence may be required to be used as the basis for proceedings. It is, therefore, vital for the exact work that is permitted by the licence to be described in detail in the licence itself or in a schedule or specification expressly referred to in the licence. In describing the work the use of vague expressions such as "etc." must be avoided. Licences should be signed "on behalf of the Minister of Works" by the duly authorised officer of the council, and should be rubber stamped with the name of the local authority. Licences should not bear facsimile or "per pro" signatures. 9. If, through unforeseen circumstances, it is found that additional work is necessary during the progress of the job, or that the cost will exceed the expenditure authorised by the licence, a supplementary licence will be needed. In order to avoid the excuse frequently put forward in prosecution cases in the past that work in excess of the licence was carried out because, it is alleged, verbal permission was obtained from the licensing authority, the public has been informed that provided application for a supplementary licence is made by registered post work may continue pending the decision of the licensing authority (see paras. 26 and 27 of the Notes for Guidance of Applicants (P.L.49)).

I now come to the directly relevant circular 50 of 1946. It is addressed to "All Local Authorities," and begins thus :

A I am directed by the Minister of Health to say that following the extension for a further period of their licensing functions referred to in circular 237/45, local authorities continue to be responsible for the licensing of the following classes of civil building work—(a) all work costing not more than £100 whether connected with new houses or not, provided of course that such work is not within the "free" limits of £10 and £2 per month.

B Between paras. 10 and 11 appears a sub-heading "Licences for Maintenance and Repairs." Paragraph 11 ends with this sub-paragraph :

The Minister's attention has been drawn to the fact that many licences have been issued for vague unspecified work. It is imperative that the nature of the work should be described on the licence in sufficient detail to enable the contractor and the licensee to appreciate the extent of the approved work.

C The three italicised words of themselves prove for certain that on that date the Minister of Health and the Minister of Works both understood the regulations and orders to require a written licence.

D The bundle supplied to us also contains a third circular—8/47 of Jan. 20, 1947, presumably included in the bundle because of the so-called licence issued, in the present case ex post facto, on Apr. 25, 1947. That circular emphasises still further the impossibility of reg. 56A curing the mischief without a written licence. The first paragraph of appendix A attached to that circular begins thus :

E All local authorities—especially now they have prosecution duties—will appreciate the necessity for ensuring that building licences are carefully worded. Building licences are legal documents which may at any time become the subject of judicial scrutiny. It is, therefore, important that the licence should clearly state the work which it covers and that it should not contain any ambiguity of expression. The following points may afford guidance to local authorities in the issue of licences : 1. The licence should be made out in the name of the building owner (i.e., the person paying the cost of the work) and care should be taken that it is properly completed. A copy of the licence should be sent to the builder indicated on the application form and the original licence should be sent to the building owner. An exact copy of the licence should be retained in the local authority's file of the case and a copy should be sent to the regional licensing officer of the Ministry of Works in the usual way. 2. The work intended to be covered by the licence should be described in detail on the licence itself or on a schedule or specification annexed to, and expressly referred to in the licence . . . 4. Loose or ambiguous wording of a licence may completely stop the possibility of proceedings in the event of failure to observe its provisions.

The bundle of circulars supplied to the court ends with a letter dated May 24, 1948, written on behalf of the Treasury Solicitor to the solicitor to the defendant. It contains this passage (referring to the Minister of Works) :

G Local authorities do not grant building licences and the Minister has not delegated authority to them to do so. Building licences are granted by the Minister, but he has authorised officers appointed for this purpose by local authorities to signify his granting of the licences. Such officers sign licences on behalf and in the name of the Minister and s. 7 of the Emergency Powers (Defence) Act, 1939, would apply.

H There are important further matters for consideration about the position both of the Minister of Health and of the local authorities in relation to licensing. ✓ The circulars are, in character, mainly administrative, but I think that in some aspects they go beyond administration and become legislative. If I am right in so thinking, whence did either Minister derive the latter power ? A somewhat similar question about legislative circulars of the Ministry of Health came before this court for consideration in Blackpool Corporation v. Locker (1) where the defendant, a private individual, was told by the local authority and by the regional officer of the Ministry of Health that the circular of the Minister of Health (which, in fact, contained the sub-delegated legislation) was confidential and not open to his inspection as of right. Indeed, in the corporation's affidavit of documents privilege was claimed for the Minister of Health's circular to local authorities as mere "professional communications." The "circulars" of the Minister of Health in the present case have been withheld from publication by His Majesty's Stationery Office as Statutory Rules and Orders, presumably because they are merely administrative in character, or, where legislative, because they constitute sub-delegated legislation falling outside the purview of the Statutory Instruments Act, 1946, and previous practice. It is to be observed that not one of the three circulars contains any reference to any legislation, Parliamentary or delegated, conferring on the Minister of Health power to play any part at all in operating reg. 56A, nor have we been told of any enactment allowing the Minister of Works to transfer or delegate his powers to the Minister of Health. A

The position seemed to us so confused that we invited the assistance of the Law Officers, and the Attorney-General kindly himself appeared, and in his address to us as amicus curiae submitted his interpretation. I think I do no injustice to his exposition if I say that it amounted to the broad contention (i) that the Minister of Works is entitled to choose his agents for the office of licensing as he likes: (ii) that he used the existing organisation of local authorities, and the existing constitutional relationship between them and the Minister of Health, as a channel of communication by which he selected as his agents persons in the employment of the local authorities and selected by them at his request. In a broad sense I think that does represent the actual practice, and I concede without hesitation or qualification that it is on the whole the most convenient and the most practical system for the government and the public alike, but subject to two qualifications—(A) its secrecy and (B) its doubtful validity. C

(A) Its secrecy. At the date material to the present proceedings, namely, June, 1946, there were no means at all open to the public affected by which a private owner whether an individual or a company, even with the assistance of his lawyer, could, as of right, ascertain what the detailed provisions were which in practice governed and limited his right or effective power to get a licence, nor whether they were legislative or merely administrative. In that respect the position is similar to that exposed in the Blackpool case (1). The truth is that, as emphasised in the Report of the Committee on Ministers' Powers (Cmd. 4060 of 1932), while in our modern constitutional practice delegated legislation is both necessary, convenient and desirable—for the reasons there mentioned—safeguards are essential, especially that its content should always be within public knowledge. In my view, compulsory publicity is the only preventive of many of those evils which most people have in mind when they speak of "bureaucracy" with an accent of censure. And where—as, in my opinion, is, in certain respects, the case as to parts of the official literature now before the court—administration is mixed up with sub-delegated legislation and none of the mixture is made public, it is really unfair and, indeed, unjust to the public. D

(B) Its doubtful validity. Regulation 56A is delegated legislation, but it, in turn, delegates, within certain narrow limits, power to the Minister of Works to make sub-delegated legislation by order. Parenthetically I observe that such orders, being sub-delegation, do not call for publication under the Statutory Instruments Act, 1946, but the Minister of Works very properly had them so published, though not bound to do so, thus recognising the interest of the public in publication. But I regard the Minister of Health's "circulars" and the Minister of Works' "notes for guidance of local authorities" as also containing sub-delegated legislation in two respects—(i) in the elaboration of the instructions about licences (a) in the circulars and (b) in the "notes" for guidance, and (ii) in the effective delegation of power and discretion to the local authorities to perform the function of licensing which the regulation had entrusted to the Minister of Works, and to no other authority. As to (i) it is patent that the licensing instructions in the circulars and "notes" were intended to be enforced—in other words, to bind the public, and that means legislation. As to (ii) the position is this. The regulation authorised the Minister of Works and no one else to operate its provisions. Those provisions, of course, authorised him to choose his own servants for the detailed tasks involved, but they did not authorise him to transfer his own functions either to the Minister of Health or to the local authorities, and it is interesting to observe in the E F G H letter from the Treasury Solicitor's office, which I have quoted, that a denial appears of any such transfer to local authorities. But, in my opinion, both the "circulars" to the local authorities from the Minister of Health and the "notes" for their guidance from the Minister of Works in fact do that; for they confer a very wide discretion on the local authorities themselves, and in the circulars and "notes," throughout the series, and especially in those of 1947, the function of prosecuting is plainly entrusted to the local authorities. For these reasons I am satisfied, in spite of the argument of the Attorney-General, that some of the directions there contained were intended to have legislative effect, although I accept the Attorney-General's contention that the regulation contained no such power of delegation. If it be argued that the Minister of Works could choose his licensing officers, I reply that he could have, but did not purport to do so. The delegation to another Minister or to local authorities of powers of administration and discretion was not within the authority of the Minister of Works. Delegatus delegare non potest, but the intention to delegate power and discretion to the local authorities is clear. The method chosen was convenient and desirable, but the power so to legislate was, unfortunately, not there.

I have discussed these aspects at length, because, if the legislative language of the circulars had, under sub-delegated powers, possessed legislative force, the one issue in the appeal (of written versus oral licence) would have been decided forthwith by that language in favour of the defendant. As it is, I have prayed in aid the facts which appear in the circulars and "notes" in order to establish the real nature of the process and requirements of licensing, and thereby to demonstrate the mischief to which the regulation by His Majesty in Council was addressed. The remedy for that mischief, in my view, necessitated a written licence, and, therefore, if, contrary to my own view, the phrase "a licence" does not, in its context, unambiguously demand a written licence, I pray in aid the mischief to solve its ambiguity and so arrive at the same result.

I have said all that is necessary to decide the appeal in the defendant's favour, but there is a public aspect on which I feel bound to add a few observations. Both the circulars of the Minister of Health and the "notes" of the Minister of Works are largely mandatory in character, and they purpose to sub-delegate to the local authorities the whole statutory function of licensing, including the right to choose any servant of their own to act as licensing officer as long as he signs in the name of the Minister of Works. Whether and where the contents pass from the administrative to the legislative it may not always be easy to say, but the whole of the procedure was in practice obligatory from the point of view of the uninformed public, who could not lawfully do any building work without first getting a licence, and till September, 1946, that public had no access to published information beyond reg. 56A and the laudably concise orders thereunder of the Minister of Works. That position of enforced ignorance was very hard and, I venture to think, constitutionally improper. The official of the local authority who issued the licence purported to sign as agent for the Minister of Works, but except for that nominal observance of reg. 56A, the whole elaborate system of compulsory control was handed over to the discretion of the Minister of Health, who had no statutory position whatever, though that disability would not be guessed by the local authorities. Indeed, how could Parliament itself hold the Minister of Health responsible for the misdeeds of a local authority under reg. 56A? And a fortiori how could Parliament hold the Minister of Works responsible for the misdeeds of a local authority whose responsibility to the central government under our constitution is purely statutory, and owed only to the Minister of Health, the successor of the old Local Government Board? The basic theory of the English constitution seems, on the face of those inter-departmental arrangements, to have been disregarded.

The Attorney-General urged that the Minister of Works could appoint what servants or agents he liked to act as licensing officers. That is no doubt correct, but the facts seem to show that he did not do anything of the kind. He seems to have told the Minister of Health that he authorised him to hand over the licensing of the minor building work (below £100) lock, stock and barrel to the local authorities, for that is what the Minister of Health's circulars, if not the Minister of Works' "notes," in fact say. The gravamen of these criticisms is that when, especially in times of crisis, the government has to seek a solution of its difficulties in an elaborate system of delegated and sub-delegated legislation, it is essential that there should always be publicity. I do not think there is much to criticise in the expediency or reasonableness of the secret instructions sent out by the Minister of Works or the Minister of Health to the local authorities beyond their doubtful validity under the two heads I have mentioned, but secrecy is wrong, for there seems to me to be a strong case for saying that the system of the Statutory Instruments Act, 1946, should be extended to cover anything that in law amounts to sub-delegated legislation. The appeal must be allowed with costs here and below in regard to the excess beyond the £35 of the valid licence.

ASQUITH, L.J. : I have come to the same conclusion as my Lord. Excluding from consideration anything outside the four corners of reg. 56A, and looking merely at the language it employs and the nature of the mischief at which (judging from such language) it is aimed, it seems to me that a written licence is contemplated, and that for the following reasons. The expression "a licence granted by the Minister" seems to me plainly to envisage a physical object—a written instrument—like a motor licence, a gun licence, or a dog licence. The case might have been different if the regulation had said work beyond a certain value should not proceed without "leave or licence" of the Minister, a phrase which has far less physical connotation. In the second place, the mischief struck at by the regulation is by plain implication the uneconomic use of building materials and labour at a time of war scarcity. It cannot be reasonably construed as requiring a type of licence which would be wholly unsuitable for the purpose where, as in multitudes of cases, permission is sought for elaborate and complex building operations—a type of licence which would make proof of offences, such as the regulation creates, in such cases almost impracticable. I do not underrate the importance of the presumption (on which my brother JENKINS lays stress in a dissenting judgment, which I have had the advantage of reading) that, if a provision creates an offence and its language is ambiguous, the ambiguity should be resolved in favour of the subject, but in the present case the factors I have referred to appear to me to outweigh this consideration. Like SCOTT, L.J., I would allow the appeal.

JENKINS, J., [having stated the facts] : The sole question in the appeal is whether this defence of illegality is well founded or not. If the matter rested on the written licence of May 10, 1946, alone, it would, I think, be plain that the defence of illegality would be unanswerable as regards this excess. In support of this conclusion it is only necessary to refer to the recent decision of the Court of Appeal in Bostel Brothers, Ltd. v. Hurlock (2) which is precisely in point. But at the material time the plaintiffs, in addition to the written licence of May 10, 1946, had in the form of the oral permission obtained from the borough surveyor what, in my view, clearly amounted to an oral licence covering the excess. The defence of illegality must, therefore, fail unless it can be shown that reg. 56A (2) not merely makes the carrying out of the work of the specified kinds "unlawful except in so far as there is in force in respect thereof a licence granted by the Minister," but makes the carrying out of such work unlawful except in so far as there is in force in respect thereof a licence in writing granted by the Minister.

On this question we have had the assistance of the Attorney-General who has submitted that the regulation does not require the licence to be in writing, and, accordingly, that an oral licence is sufficient to prevent the work in respect of which it is given from being unlawful under the regulation, although, no doubt, as a matter of administrative practice, writing would normally be used, and the administrative instructions issued by the Minister are framed on the footing that licences are, as a general rule, at all events, to be in writing. For my part, I accept this submission. I can find nothing in reg. 56A which either expressly or by necessary implication constrains me to construe para. (2) as demanding that the licence from the Minister required in order to prevent the carrying out of the work of the specified kinds from being unlawful should be in writing. The regulation creates a wholly new offence punishable by fine and imprisonment, and I think it should be construed strictly in favour of the subject. No doubt anyone who relies on an oral licence does so at his peril, owing to the difficulty which may arise of proving that what was said did, in fact, amount to a licence, or of proving that the work, in fact, done was covered by the terms of the licence orally given, but where it is proved that at the time when the work in question was being carried out an oral licence from the Minister (or his authorised agent) covering it was, in fact, in force, it seems to me that to hold that the person doing the work on the faith of and within the terms of that licence has committed an offence punishable by fine and imprisonment, merely because the licence granted by the Minister in respect of the work, and admittedly in force at the material time, was not expressed or recorded in writing, would involve an extension of this penal regulation beyond what is either warranted by its terms or demanded by the nature of the mischief at which it is aimed.

I do not think the desirability, or, indeed, the necessity, from an administrative point of view, of expressing or recording such a licence in writing suffices to displace the conclusion indicated above. That seems to me to be a matter for the Minister and those operating the control on his behalf. I see no reason why a person who, in fact, obtains an oral licence and, therefore, does all that the regulation literally requires him to do, should be held to have broken the law because the Minister, or those acting for him, have departed from the principles of sound administration in failing to express or record the licence in writing. In the present case there is no doubt that an oral licence to cover work on the garages in excess of £35, provided the total cost did not exceed £100, was in fact given, and although the terms of reg. 56A (2) prevent the supplementary licence of Apr. 25, 1947, from having any retrospective effect, I think at all events it can be taken as confirmation of the fact that the oral licence did relate to the particular work as actually carried through to completion.

On any view, the defence of illegality in the circumstances of the present case is reduced to a pure question of form. The plaintiffs did nothing against the public interest, since it must be assumed that the borough surveyor, before granting the oral licence, had satisfied himself that the case was one in which work up to a maximum of £100 ought to be allowed on the principles laid down by the Minister for the guidance of local authorities, and this is, I think, confirmed by the formal supplementary licence. Bearing in mind the fact that the defendant has had the benefit of the work done, and the desirability in the public interest that contracts should be observed, I ask myself whether the court should regard a purely technical breach of the regulation, involving nothing against the public interest, as sufficient ground for absolving the defendant from his otherwise undoubted obligation to pay for work done on his property and at his request. It is, however, unnecessary for me to attempt an answer to this question, as, for the reasons I have endeavoured to state, I do not think there was any breach of the regulation in this case. I am, accordingly, of opinion that the defence of illegality fails, and, therefore, for my part I would dismiss the appeal.

Appeal allowed with costs, the plaintiffs to have their costs in the court below.

Re No. 12, REGENT STREET, OXFORD.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Jenkins, J.), July 14, 1948.]

Charities—Educational charity—Assurance to charity exempt from law of mortmain—Assurance or copy not sent to Minister of Education—Whether void after six months from taking effect—Education Act, 1944 (c. 31), s. 87 (1) (2).

The Education Act, 1944, s. 87, provides: “(1) The Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1888, the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1891, and the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act Amendment Act, 1892, (which impose restrictions upon assurances of land and personal estate to corporations and to charitable uses) shall not have effect with respect to any assurance of land or of personal estate to be laid out in the purchase of land if the land or the income thereof is to be used for educational purposes. (2) Every assurance of land or of personal estate to be laid out in the purchase of land, including every assurance of land to any local education authority, shall, if the land or the income thereof is to be used for educational purposes, be void unless the assurance or a copy thereof is sent to the Minister [of Education] within six months after the date upon which the assurance takes effect . . .”

The applicants, the president and scholars of Magdalen College, Oxford (a charity exempt from the ordinary laws of mortmain), expended money in the purchase of No. 12, Regent Street, Oxford, but sent neither the assurance nor a copy thereof to the Minister. The Chief Land Registrar refused to register the assurance and, pursuant to his direction, the applicants issued this summons.

HELD: property assured for the purposes of the college was assured “for educational purposes” within s. 87 (2); “assurance” in s. 87 (2) was not to be limited to assurances which had previously been subject to restriction under the Mortmain Acts; and, therefore, the assurance was void unless the notice was given within the stipulated time.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS.

Application by the president and scholars of Magdalen College, Oxford, under R.S.C., Ord. 54D, r. 6, pursuant to a direction of the Chief Land Registrar under the Land Registration Act, 1925, s. 140, and the Land Registration Rules, 1925, r. 298 (2). The applicants asked whether an assurance dated Nov. 3, 1947, of premises known as No. 12, Regent Street, Oxford, by the registered proprietor to the applicants, would become void under the Education Act, 1944, s. 87, if neither the assurance nor a copy was sent to the Minister of Education within 6 months after the date on which the assurance took effect. JENKINS, J., held that s. 87 would so operate.

Geoffrey Cross for the applicants, the president and scholars of Magdalen College, Oxford.

JENKINS, J.: This is a reference under the Land Registration Act, 1925, s. 140, and the relevant Land Registration Rules, concerning the acquisition by the president and scholars of Magdalen College, Oxford, of registered land comprising No. 12, Regent Street, Oxford. The question I have to decide is whether the transfer of that property to Magdalen College ought to be sent to the Minister of Education to be recorded under the provisions of the Education Act, 1944, s. 87. It is contended, on behalf of the college, that s. 87 has no application to the transfer in question. The respondent to the summons is the Attorney-General who, for the assistance of the court, has put forward reasons why the contention of the college should not prevail.

Section 87 of the Education Act, 1944, in in these terms :

A (1) The Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1888, the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1891, and the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act Amendment Act, 1892, (which impose restrictions upon assurances of land and personal estate to corporations and to charitable uses) shall not have effect with respect to any assurance of land or of personal estate to be laid out in the purchase of land if the land or the income thereof is to be used for educational purposes. (2) Every assurance of land or of personal estate to be laid out in the purchase of land, including every assurance of land to any local education authority, shall, if the land or the income thereof is to be used for educational purposes, be void unless the assurance or a copy thereof is sent to the Minister within six months after the date upon which the assurance takes effect : Provided that the Minister may, either before or after the expiration thereof, extend the said period of six months in any particular case, and if the assurance or a copy thereof is sent to the Minister within the extended period the assurance shall not be void or shall be deemed not to have been voided, as the case may be. (3) The Minister shall cause to be kept a record of every assurance which, or a copy of which, is sent to him in compliance with the provisions of this section. (4) In this section the expression "assurance" has the meaning assigned to it by s. 10 of the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1888. (5) Nothing in sub-s. (2) of this section shall affect the validity of any assurance which has taken effect before the date of the commencement of Part II of this Act.

C It is, I think, material to notice that the Education Act, 1944, s. 87, had been preceded by the Education Act, 1918, s. 46, and the Education Act, 1921, s. 117. Those sections successively dealt with the same subject-matter as s. 87 in substantially similar terms, with the important difference that the precursors of s. 87 did not include a provision avoiding assurances not sent to the Minister to be recorded, so that they contained a statutory requirement with no sanction, if I may use that expression, to ensure that it should be complied with.

D It seems to me that, reading s. 87 by itself and as it stands, it is reasonably plain that an assurance to a foundation such as Magdalen College would fall within its terms. I think there is no doubt that the assurance here in question is an assurance of land which, or the income of which, is to be used for educational purposes, the college being, undoubtedly, in the nature of an educational charity.

E But it is said that, if the section is read in the light of the legislation which preceded it, a necessary implication is raised to the effect that the requirements of the section are not to apply to the college. The argument depends on the exemption accorded to the universities of Oxford and Cambridge and the colleges therein, and incidentally to other foundations as well, from the provisions of the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1888, and the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1891. It is said that, reading the section with knowledge of those already existing exemptions, one is constrained to come to the conclusion that the new requirements imposed by the section are only applicable to assurances which were previously subject to the requirements of the Acts mentioned in sub-s. (1). It is said that a new exemption is given, and in exchange a new requirement as regards sending the assurance or a copy thereof to the Minister to be recorded is imposed on the assurances to which the new exemption applies, and that there could have been no object in imposing on assurances already exempt the new requirements which the section indicates.

G It will be remembered that pt. I of the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1888, concerns the acquisition of land by a corporation in mortmain, i.e., it relates to the law of mortmain properly so called. The universities of Oxford and Cambridge and their colleges had enjoyed a partial exemption from the ordinary law of mortmain, which was an exemption of long standing. That was ultimately made general by the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge Act, 1923, s. 9. Part II of the Act of 1888 relates to assurances of land to or for the benefit of any charitable use, and it imposes certain well known requirements, the scheme of this Part of the Act being to avoid assurances to or for the benefit of charitable uses unless they accord with the requirements therein set out ; i.e., by s. 4 (2) the assurance must take effect immediately on possession, and by sub-s. (3), except as provided by that section, it must be without any power of revocation. Sub-section (6) provides that the assurance must be made by deed executed in the presence of at least two witnesses. Sub-section (7) provides that it must be made at least twelve months before the death of the assurer. Sub-section (9) provides that if the assurance is of land by a personal estate other than stock in the public funds it must be enrolled in the Central Office. Part III of the Act deals with exemptions and includes, in particular, this exemption in s. 7 :

Part II of this Act shall not apply to the following assurances : (i) An assurance of land, or personal estate to be laid out in the purchase of land, to or in trust for any of the universities of Oxford, Cambridge, London, Durham, and the Victoria University, or any of the colleges or houses of learning within any of those universities, or to or in trust for any of the colleges of Eton, Winchester, and Westminster, for the better support and maintenance of the scholars only upon the foundations of those last-mentioned colleges, or to or in trust for the warden, council, and scholars of Keble College.

The only other provision of the Act of 1888 to which I need refer is the definition of "assurance" in s. 10, which provides :

"Assurance" includes a gift, conveyance, appointment, lease, transfer, settlement, mortgage, charge, incumbrance, devise, bequest, and every other assurance by deed, will, or other instrument ; and "assure" and "assuror" have meanings corresponding with assurance.

Reverting for a moment to the Education Act, 1944, s. 87, one finds that "assurance" in that section has the comprehensive meaning which I have just read from the definition clause in the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1888. I should next refer to the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1891. That is the Act which enabled land to be assured by will for charitable purposes on certain conditions. The most important section is s. 5 :

Land may be assured by will to or for the benefit of any charitable use, but, except as hereinafter provided, such land shall, notwithstanding anything in the will contained to the contrary, be sold within one year from the death of the testator, or such extended period as may be determined by the High Court, or any judge thereof sitting at chambers, or by the Charity Commissioners.

Section 10 of the Act of 1891 contains this exempting provision : "Nothing in this Act contained shall limit or affect the exemptions contained in Part III of the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1888."

The Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act Amendment Act, 1892, provides by s. 1 as follows :

Section 6 of the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1888, except so much of sub-s. (2) thereof as provides that an assurance by deed, made otherwise than in good faith for full and valuable consideration, must be executed not less than twelve months before the death of the assuror, shall apply to any assurance by deed of land to any local authority for any purpose or purposes for which such authority is empowered by any Act of Parliament to acquire land.

The effect of that Act, therefore, was to accord to local authorities a qualified exemption from the provisions of the Act of 1888. It exempted such assurances from the requirement that assurances must be executed not less than twelve months before the death of the assurer, but not, as I understand it, from the requirements as to enrolment. It is also, I think, material to note that s. 62 of the Charitable Trusts Act, 1853, exempts from the operation of that Act, among other bodies, the universities of Oxford and Cambridge and any college or hall in the said universities of Oxford or Cambridge.

As a matter of history I should next mention that the powers of the Charity Commissioners in relation to educational purposes were transferred to the Board of Education by the joint effect of the Board of Education Act, 1899, and the Board of Education Powers Order in Council, 1900. Therefore, the Minister of Education became the appropriate minister for such matters as the recording of assurances of land to be used for educational purposes, dealt with by s. 87 of the Act of 1944.

The Settled Land Act, 1925, s. 29 (4), altered the procedure as regards the recording of assurances for charitable uses by providing as follows :

Every assurance of land or of personal estate, within the meaning of s. 4 of the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1888, or if the charitable uses are declared by a separate instrument, then that instrument, shall, in place of the requirements respecting attestation and enrolment prescribed by sub-ss. (6) and (9) of that section, be sent to the offices of the Charity Commissioners within six months after the execution thereof or within such extended period as the said commissioners may, either before or after the expiration of the six months, in any particular case allow, for the purpose of being recorded in the books of the said commissioners. Where the original cannot be produced, an attested or office copy may be sent instead of the original. This sub-section does not apply to registered dispositions of registered land, or to assurances or instruments required by s. 117 of the Education Act, 1921, to be sent to the Board of Education, and only applies to instruments executed after the commencement of this Act.

- A It will be remembered that s. 117 of the Education Act, 1921, was the then current precursor of s. 87 of the Act of 1944.

The Settled Land Act, 1925, s. 29 (6), then provides this exemption:

This section applies (save as otherwise provided) whether the trust was created before or after the commencement of this Act, but does not apply to land to which the Universities and College Estates Act, 1925, applies.

- B Therefore there is an express exemption from the provisions of the Settled Land Act, 1925, s. 29, which extends to the universities of Oxford and Cambridge and their colleges. Under the Universities and Colleges Estates Act, 1925, the consent of the Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries is required to the acquisition of land by the universities of Oxford and Cambridge and their colleges. That is one of the circumstances relied on by Magdalen College in the present case, in support of the argument that s. 87 of the Act of 1944 does not apply to them.

I have already mentioned the exemption from the ordinary law of mortmain accorded to the universities of Oxford and Cambridge and the colleges therein by the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge Act, 1923. The relevant section is s. 9, which is in these terms:

- D The exemption from the obligation to obtain a licence in mortmain which is given by s. 60 of the universities of Oxford and Cambridge Act, 1877, in respect of certain purchases of land by the university or a college shall extend, and be deemed always to have extended, to all assurances of land to the university or a college.

My attention was also called to a provision in the University of Reading Act, 1926, which provided, I understand, by s. 8 that Reading University should be deemed to have been included in the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1888, s. 7.

- E Those, I think, are all the relevant statutory provisions to which I have been referred, and I am invited, on the strength of them and on the general principles applicable to the construction of statutes, with respect to which I would refer to the Rhondda Peerage case (Viscountess Rhondda's Claim) (1), to construe s. 87 as excluding from its operation assurances to the universities of Oxford and Cambridge or the colleges therein for educational purposes on the ground that the intention of the enactment, which is to be gathered, not only from its terms but also from the state of the law when it was enacted, makes it manifest that the section is not designed to extend to these bodies. The bodies, assurances to which are by implication on this argument exempted from the provisions of s. 87, are, as I understand, all bodies which previously enjoyed the exemption from the enactments mentioned in sub-s. (1). The argument turns, first of all, on the meaning of the words "any assurance" in sub-s. (1) of s. 87. The sub-section commences by referring to the various Acts and goes on to describe them in a bracket in this way: "which impose restrictions upon assurances of land and personal estate to corporations and to charitable uses." It is said that the reference in the bracket must be to assurances which are subject to the restrictions imposed by the Acts referred to, and with that I think I am disposed to agree. The sub-section then continues to say that the Act:

- H . . . shall not have effect with respect to any assurance of land or of personal estate to be laid out in the purchase of land if the land or the income thereof is to be used for educational purposes.

It is said, again, that in that passage "any assurance" must refer to assurances previously subject to the restriction. There, again, I think I agree, because the sub-section is granting an exemption, and ex hypothesi the assurances to which it applies must be assurances which previously were subject to restrictions which the sub-section is designed to remove. From those arguments as to the meaning of "assurance" in s. 1, a conclusion is adduced that "every assurance" in sub-s. (2) must have a similar limited meaning. I am invited to construe "every assurance of land and personal estate," and so on, in sub-s. (2), as meaning: "every such assurance as aforesaid of land and personal estate to be laid out in the purchase of land"—in other words, every assurance exempted by sub-s. (1) from the provisions of the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Acts. If, as a matter of construction, I could accept that contention, the result would be that the argument for Magdalen College in the present case must prevail; but I find myself unable to accept it. Sub-section (2) is an independent sub-section which provides, in perfectly general terms, that:

Every assurance of land or of personal estate to be laid out in the purchase of land, . . . shall, if the land or the income thereof is to be used for educational purposes, be void unless the assurance or a copy thereof is sent to the Minister within [the stipulated time].

I can see no ground for construing that, simply as a matter of construction, as limited to the assurances which benefit by the exemption accorded by sub-s. (1). Sub-section (2) seems to me to be perfectly general in its terms, and, so far, therefore, I come to the conclusion that the assurance in the present case, being an assurance of land which, or the income of which, is to be used for educational purposes, is one which is made void by sub-s. (2) unless the requirements of that sub-section are complied with.

Next, it was said that some limited meaning must be placed on the words "for educational purposes" in s. 87. It was suggested that, although an Oxford college is essentially an educational foundation, property assured for the purposes of the college would not be assured for educational purposes within the meaning of that expression in this particular section. That is an argument to which I find myself unable to accede. There are various references in the Education Act, 1944, for instance, in s. 84 of that Act, which show quite clearly that the references in the Act to "education" are in no way limited necessarily to educational establishments which are under the jurisdiction of the Minister. I was referred to the Harrow School case (2) in which it was held that the Education Act, 1918, s. 46, reproduced by the Education Act, 1921, s. 117, applied generally to all schools, including public schools. Of course, a public school is a different thing from an Oxford college, but I think that the decision in that case and the reasoning on which ASTBURY, J.'s judgment proceeded, supports my view that the words "for educational purposes" in the Act of 1944 are wide enough to include purposes of an Oxford college.

I can, therefore, find nothing in the construction of the section to warrant my introducing into it the limitation or qualification which I am invited to introduce, nor, as it seems to me, is there anything so unexpected or surprising or absurd in including assurances to these universities and colleges in the provisions of s. 87 as to make it possible for the court to impose such a qualification. I see nothing unreasonable in a section which replaces exemptions accorded to various educational foundations by a general exemption applicable to all assurances for educational purposes. I see nothing unreasonable in a provision which, as a corollary to that new and all-embracing exemption, imposes a new obligation which is to extend to all assurances for educational purpose, whether the particular assurances would have been exempt under some earlier provision or not.

It was suggested that strong support could be found for the argument on behalf of the college in the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge Act, 1923, s. 9, and in the University of Reading Act, 1926, s. 8. The argument founded on those sections proceeds thus. It is said that both s. 9 of the Act of 1923 and s. 8 of the private University of Reading Act, 1926, assume that there was still some virtue in the exemption from the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1888, and the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1891, in relation to educational charities. It follows from that, that the draftsman of these sections must have taken the view, and the legislature must have taken the view, that s. 87 of the Education Act, 1944, or the corresponding sections of the Act of 1918 and the Act of 1921, did not apply to the institutions already covered by the old exemptions. That argument, as it seems to me, really goes no further than to raise a doubt whether it was appreciated that s. 87 had the effect of including in its operation the bodies already exempted from the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Acts. I do not think the argument goes any further than that, and I certainly do not regard it as enough to displace what seems to me to be the meaning of the language used in s. 87. Reliance was also placed on the inclusion in sub-s. (2) of an express reference to assurances of land to local education authorities. The argument based on that, as I understand it, was that local education authorities, independently of s. 87, enjoy a personal exemption from the provisions of the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Acts, and for that reason the draftsman considered it necessary to include an express reference to local education authorities. It is said that that shows that if it had been intended also to include the universities of Oxford and Cambridge and the colleges therein, the draftsman would have referred to them specifically also. For my part, I do not think there is really very much force in that argument. It seems to me that the express reference to local education authorities can be accounted for by the fact that the Act of 1892 contains special provisions relating to assurances to local authorities, not merely for educational purposes but also for any purpose or purposes for which the authority was empowered by any Act of Parliament to acquire land. That being so, it seems to me quite natural to include the reference to "local education authority" so as to make it clear that the appropriate recording authority as regards assurances to local authorities, when for educational purposes, but not otherwise, was to be the Minister of Education. I cannot, therefore, regard that argument as having any real bearing on the question which I have to decide.

Looking at the matter as a whole, I think the very most one can say is that that it is, perhaps, doubtful whether it was really intended to impose the requirements of sub-s. (2) of s. 87 on assurances which under the old law were subject to no restriction at all. A study of the previous legislation does seem to me to raise a doubt about that, but, in my judgment, a mere doubt is not enough to justify the court in departing from what seems to me to be really the plain meaning of the language used. Before the court would be justified in doing that, I think one must find in the previous legislation something so manifestly inconsistent with the section which one is construing, if construed by itself simply in accordance with its ordinary meaning, as to constrain the court to say that that cannot be what the legislature meant. The circumstances here fall far short of anything of that kind. Accordingly, the conclusion to which I have come is that the transfer of Nov. 3, 1947, of the land in question will become void under the provisions of s. 87 of the Education Act, 1944, if neither it nor a copy of it is sent to the Minister of Education within six months, or within such extended period as the Minister should allow, from the date on which the applicants are entered on the register as proprietors of the land thereby transferred.

Declaration accordingly. No order as to costs.

CURTIS v. WILCOX.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Scott and Wrottesley, L.JJ., and Wynn-Parry, J.), July 6, 19, 1948.]

Husband and Wife—Legal proceedings—Protection of separate property—Tort by husband before marriage—"Thing in action"—Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (c. 75), ss. 12, 24.

An unmarried woman sustained injuries in a motor car accident which was caused by the negligence of the man she subsequently married.

H HELD: the right of action which accrued before marriage was a "thing in action" within the meaning of s. 24 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, and was, therefore, the wife's property within the meaning of s. 12 of the Act, for the protection and security of which she was entitled to maintain an action against her husband.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from an order of OLIVER, J., dated Nov. 4, 1947, refusing general damages for injuries sustained by her, before marriage, in a motor accident caused by the negligence of the defendant, whom she married after the issue of the writ in the action. The appeal was allowed. The facts appear in the judgment of the court.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 19. WYNN-PARRY, J., read the following judgment of the court. This is an appeal from the judgment of OLIVER, J., given by him at the trial of the action on Nov. 4, 1947. The facts, so far as relevant, are as follows. On Jan. 12, 1947, the plaintiff was injured in an accident in which a motor car driven by the defendant, in which she was a passenger, collided with another motor car. Negligence on the part of the defendant was admitted. On May 2, 1947, the writ in the action was issued whereby the plaintiff claimed damages from the defendant for his negligence. By her statement of claim, which was delivered on June 11, 1947, the plaintiff claimed general damages for pain and suffering and in addition special damages for damage to her property, expenses and loss of earnings. On May 26, 1947, the plaintiff married the defendant. On July 21, 1947, the defence in this action, which in substance is being defended by the insurance company with whom the defendant is insured in respect of his motor car, was delivered. By para. 2 of that defence it was pleaded that the plaintiff had become the wife of the defendant, and that she was thereby barred from all remedy sought in the action. At the trial OLIVER, J., whose attention was drawn to the considered judgment of MCCARDIE, J., in Gottliffe v. Edelston (1) regarded himself as bound by that decision, and on the reasoning of that judgment gave judgment for the plaintiff for £72 13s. 0d., the amount of the special damage claimed, but gave the plaintiff no sum by way of general damages. It is from the learned judge's refusal to award any sum by way of general damages that the plaintiff appeals to this court.

It will thus be seen that this is in substance an appeal challenging the correctness of MCCARDIE, J.'s decision in Gottliffe v. Edelston (1) which was applied, and the reasoning in which was approved by HALLETT, J., in Chant v. Read (2). The facts in Gottliffe v. Edelston (1) were in all material respects similar to the facts in this case. There the plaintiff, an unmarried woman, sustained injuries through the defendant's negligent driving, and issued a writ against him claiming damages in respect thereof. Before the trial of the action she married him. It was held that her right of action was not such a thing in action as would become her separate property within the meaning of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, but was barred by the general disability of husband and wife to sue each other. It is clear, as MCCARDIE, J., held, that at common law a wife cannot sue her husband for a tort committed before the marriage. If, therefore, the wife had a cause of action which she could pursue after the marriage it must have been because her right of action in tort, which arose before the marriage, was a thing in action forming part of her estate, which she could reduce into possession by action before marriage, which, by virtue of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, became part of her separate estate on her marriage, and which, therefore, she could reduce into possession by action after marriage, such action being pursued for the purpose of securing that part of her separate estate. The reasoning of MCCARDIE, J., proceeded on the basis of recognising that a right of action for damages for tort is a thing in action. He says ([1930] 2 K.B. 378, 390) :

Undoubtedly the phrase "thing in action," when taken in its broadest possible sense, may be used to cover such a right as that to bring an action for a pure tort, such, for example, as for negligence or assault.

He held, however, that the phrase "thing in action" as used in the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, was used in a limited sense only and did not cover a right of action in the wife to sue her husband for a tort committed before marriage.

A We agree with the view of the learned judge that a right of action in tort is a thing in action. On this point a number of legal dictionaries and abridgements, some of them of considerable antiquity, were referred to by McCARDIE, J., in his judgment and we were referred to some of these and a number of others by counsel. We do not propose to refer to them in any detail. It is sufficient to say that, apart from a statement in BLACKSTONE'S COMMENTARIES, vol. II, p. 397, that all property in action depends on contracts, either express or implied (a statement on which the editor of the 21st edition makes the comment "This is too limited, since a right to recover damages for a wrong is a chose in action which does not arise out of any contract"), all the books to which we were referred treat a right of action to recover damages for a tort as being a thing in action. This view has the great authority of SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., to support it. In Re Park Gate Waggon Works Co. (3), he said (17 Ch.D. 234, 239):

C The questions raised in this discussion are two. The first is whether a chose in action of this kind can be assigned by an official liquidator by virtue of the 95th section of the Companies Act, 1862, or otherwise. I think that the case is clearly within the 95th section. There is in that section no limit whatever in words upon what can be sold. It enables the liquidator "to sell the real and personal and heritable and movable property, effects, and things in action of the company, by public auction or private contract, with power to transfer the whole thereof to any person or company, or to sell the same in parcels." The two demands in question are certainly things in action of the company. One is said to arise in this way. It is alleged that the directors, or some of them, sold property belonging to the company at an undervalue, and the company, through their liquidator, claims the amount of the loss. That is a demand for so much money due from the directors to the company, and is an asset of the company. The other demand is very similar. It is a case in which the directors are said to have bought for the company, at the price of £8,000, some property which one of them had bought a few months before for £4,081 5s. The company claims the difference between these two sums, as being money of the company improperly expended by the directors. I have no doubt both those sums are portions of the property which the company or the liquidator could dispose of.

D It was argued on behalf of the defendant that the test of whether or not a right is a thing in action is whether or not it is assignable, and reliance was placed on s. 25 of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, now embodied in s. 196 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, and ss. 38 and 45 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914. In our view, there is no substance in this argument. No assistance for it can be derived from s. 196 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, which, like s. 25 of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, is a procedural section, nor from ss. 38 or 45 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, which deal with the assignment of certain things in action for the special purposes of that Act. F The existence of things in action as a form of personal property was established long before the right to assign any kind of thing in action was admitted, and it would be strange, indeed, if it were now the law that the crucial test of whether or not a right was a thing in action was whether or not it was capable of assignment. G

The question, therefore, remains whether McCARDIE, J., was correct in his view that "thing in action" as used in the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, has the limited meaning which he attributed to it. The point before us turns on the true construction of the relevant sections of that Act and is unaffected by the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935, which, subject to s. 12 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, treats a married woman in regard to her property as a feme sole. Section 1 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, (so far as material) provided as follows: H

(1) A married woman shall, in accordance with the provisions of this Act, be capable of acquiring, holding, and disposing by will or otherwise, of any real or personal property as her separate property, in the same manner as if she were a feme sole, without the intervention of any trustee. (2) A married woman shall be capable of entering into and rendering herself liable in respect of and to the extent of her separate property on any contract, and of suing and being sued, either in contract or in tort, or otherwise, in all respects as if she were a feme sole, and her husband need not be joined with her as plaintiff or defendant, or be made a party to any action or other legal proceeding brought by or taken against her; and any damages or costs recovered by her in any such action or proceeding shall be her separate property; and any damages or costs recovered against her in any such action or proceeding shall be payable out of her separate property, and not otherwise.

Section 2 :

Every woman who marries after the commencement of this Act shall be entitled to have and to hold as her separate property and to dispose of in manner aforesaid all real and personal property which shall belong to her at the time of marriage, or shall be acquired by or devolve upon her after marriage.

Section 12 (as amended by the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935), sched. II :

Every woman, whether married before or after this Act, shall have in her own name against all persons whomsoever, including her husband, the same civil remedies, and also (subject, as regards her husband, to the proviso hereinafter contained) the same remedies and redress by way of criminal proceedings for the protection and security of her own property, as if such property belonged to her as a feme sole, but, except as aforesaid, no husband or wife shall be entitled to sue the other for a tort . . .

Section 24 (the definition clause) says : "The word 'property' in this Act includes a thing in action."

The effect of s. 2, the language of which is unambiguous, is that in her separate property there is or can be included without exception all the real and personal property which belongs to her at the time of the marriage, while the definition of property in s. 24 makes it clear beyond doubt that, as the language of s. 2 itself indicates, her personal property includes her things in action. Under s. 12 the right of suing which is given to a married woman extends, so far as concerns what may be the subject-matter of the action, to all her property. The limitation which is imposed by the section is not on the kind of property which may be the subject of an action by her, but only on the purpose for which the action may be brought; it must be for the protection or security of her property. It follows, in our judgment, that there is no ground to be discovered in the language of the relevant sections of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, for holding that "thing in action" is used in that Act in any limited sense. In our judgment, therefore, Gottliffe v. Edelston (1) was wrongly decided and is not good law.

It was suggested in argument that the words in s. 12 "but, except as aforesaid, no husband or wife shall be entitled to sue the other in tort," were mere surplusage. In a sense this is true, but they serve to emphasise that the section constitutes an exception to the common law rule, which otherwise still applies and would still prevent a married woman from pursuing a purely personal claim against her husband, e.g., for damages for libel or slander or assault. In the result, the appeal will be allowed with costs here and below.

Appeal allowed with costs in both courts.

SYAL v. HEYWARD AND ANOTHER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Scott, Cohen and Wrottesley, L.JJ.), July 23, 29, 1948.]

Foreign Judgment—Registration in High Court—Setting aside registration—Judgment obtained by fraud on foreign court—Facts relied on known to defendants at time of proceedings in foreign court—Order for trial of issue of fraud—Condition that defendants should bring money into court—Foreign Judgments (Reciprocal Enforcement) Act, 1933 (c. 13), s. 4 (1) (a) (iv)—R.S.C., Ord. 41B, r. 3.

On Feb. 12, 1947, the plaintiff obtained against the defendants in India a judgment on a plaint in which he alleged that he had lent the defendants rupees 20,000. On Nov. 28, 1947, by order of a master, that judgment was registered as a judgment in the King's Bench Division under s. 2 (1) of the Foreign Judgments (Reciprocal Enforcement) Act, 1933. The defendants applied for an order that the registration of the judgment be set aside pursuant to s. 4 (1) (a) (iv) of the Act on the ground that it had been obtained by fraud. They alleged that the plaintiff had deceived the court in India in that the amount lent to them by the plaintiff was rupees 10,800 and not, as the plaintiff had stated, rupees 20,000, the difference being made up by commission and interest paid in advance, and that thereby the plaintiff had concealed from the Indian court the possibility that the defendants might have a defence under the Indian usury laws.

HELD : it was immaterial that the facts on which the defendants relied to establish a prima facie case of fraud were known to them at all material times and could have been raised by them by way of defence in the Indian proceedings, and, therefore, the defendants were entitled to have tried the issue of fraud.

Abouloff v. Oppenheimer (1882) (10 Q.B.D. 295), applied.

HELD, further : in proceedings under s. 4 (1) (a) (iv) of the Act of 1933 in which it is sought to set aside a judgment on the ground of fraud the court has no power to impose as a condition of directing the issue of fraud to be tried that the defendants should bring money into court.

INTERLOCUTORY APPEAL by the defendants from an order of JONES, J., dated June 11, 1948.

A judgment of an Indian court having been registered under the Foreign Judgments (Reciprocal Enforcement) Act, 1933, as a judgment of the King's Bench Division on the application of the plaintiff, the defendants applied for the registration to be set aside on the ground that the judgment had been obtained by fraud. The master dismissed this application on the ground that all the facts on which the defendants relied could have been raised by them in defence in the Indian proceedings. On appeal by the defendants, the judge directed the issue of fraud to be tried on condition that the defendants paid into court the amount of the judgment debt. On an appeal by the defendants, the Court of Appeal held that the defendants were entitled to have tried the issue of fraud and that the judge had no power to impose the condition as to payment into court.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 29. COHEN, L.J., read the following judgment of the court. This appeal arises under the Foreign Judgments (Reciprocal Enforcement) Act, 1933, and R.S.C., Ord. 41B, made pursuant to the power conferred by s. 3 of that Act. On Feb. 12, 1947, the plaintiff obtained a judgment from the First Civil Judge at Saharanpur, India, on a plaint dated Nov. 19, 1946, in which he alleged that the defendants had borrowed rupees 20,000 from him on Oct. 7, 1946, and had executed a promissory note for that amount. On Nov. 28, 1947, Master Baker made an order that the said judgment be registered as a judgment in the King's Bench Division. The defendants, Col. Heyward and Col. David, then applied for an order that the registration of the said judgment be set aside pursuant to s. 4 (1) (iv) of the Act on the ground that the judgment had been obtained by fraud. In support of that application they filed an affidavit in which they alleged that the amount which they borrowed from the plaintiff was not rupees 20,000, as alleged by him in the action in Saharanpur, but only rupees 10,800, the difference being made up in part of commission and in part of interest which they alleged the plaintiff had insisted on being paid in advance. They had to face the fact that they had not defended the proceedings in India. Col. David relied on a promise alleged to have been made by the plaintiff early in December, 1946, not to take any further proceedings against the defendants and to consent to the proceedings being adjourned for a period of 6 months from that December. Col. Heyward relied on the same promise and also on the fact that he had left India at the end of December on repatriation. Col. David exhibited some documents from one of which it appeared that on Nov. 25, 1946, the defendants had been served with notice of the suit for rupees 20,420, and that the date fixed for hearing was Jan. 10, 1947. Another document showed that on Dec. 31, 1946, the defendants wrote to the court at Saharanpur applying for an adjournment for 6 months in accordance with the plaintiff's promise, while a third document (which was dated Jan. 13, 1947) was a notice from the court that the case had been adjourned to Jan. 20, 1947, and that, in default of the defendants' appearance, it would be heard ex parte. Col. David, at any rate, must have known what the court's intentions were. Col. Heyward may have been ignorant of them as he had left for England. To that affidavit the plaintiff put in a reply in which he denied the material allegations made by the defendants, and alleged that the whole rupees 20,000 had been advanced by him. He also exhibited a number of documents including the plaint to which we have already referred. The plaint was verified by the plaintiff on oath. It was not confined to an allegation that the defendants were indebted to the plaintiff in rupees 20,000 on the promissory note, but asserted that the defendants had borrowed that sum. The main basis of the defendants' allegation of fraud was that the plaintiff had deceived the court by pretending that he had lent rupees 20,000, whereas, in fact, he had only lent rupees 10,800, thus concealing from the court the possibility that the defendants might have a defence under the Indian Usurious Loans Act. The plaintiff also filed other affidavits dealing with subsidiary matters raised by the defendants to which we do not think it necessary to refer.

On this evidence the case came before the master, and on June 1, 1948, the master dismissed the application on the ground, as we were informed, that all the facts on which the defendants relied were known to them at all material times and could have been raised by way of defence in the Indian proceedings. From this order the defendants appealed to the judge. Before the matter came before the judge, they filed evidence in answer to the affidavits filed on behalf of the plaintiff. We need not refer to this evidence in detail. It is sufficient to read the last sentence of para. 1 of the affidavit of the defendant, David, sworn on June 9, 1948, in which he says :

I further say that the plaint dated Nov. 19, 1946, which is exhibited to the said affidavit of the said Syal was a fraud upon the court to which it was presented inasmuch as it stated that Lieut. Colonel Heyward and I received the full consideration of rupees 20,000 when in fact to the knowledge of the said Syal we only received rupees 10,800. The matter came before the learned judge on June 11, 1948, and he made an order as follows :

It is ordered that if the sum of £1,800 (such sum being the amount of the judgment debt and the balance being as security for costs) be paid into court by the said Lieut. Col. Paul Henry Maurice Heyward and Lieut. Col. I. A. David within fourteen days from the date hereof an issue is directed to be tried and be referred to the master for directions and that in such event the costs of the application to the master to set aside the registration of the above mentioned judgment and the costs of this appeal be costs in the issue. And it is further ordered that if the said sum of £1,800 be not paid into court within the time limited by this order the said appeal be dismissed with costs to be taxed and paid to the said Soth Gurnparshad Syal by the said Lieut. Col. Paul Henry Maurice Heyward and Lieut. Col. I. A. David.

From this order the defendants appealed with the leave of this court. They were willing as a matter of grace to bring into court the sterling equivalent of the sum of rupees 10,800 which they admitted they owed, but they contended that the court had no jurisdiction to impose conditions if it decided to direct an issue. When the matter came before us, the plaintiff had not applied either to the learned judge or to this court for leave to appeal, but he had given notice out of time under Ord. 58, r. 6, that he intended on the hearing of the appeal to contend that the order of the master was right and the order of the learned judge wrong. Counsel for the defendants submitted that Ord. 58, r. 6, was merely machinery and did not get rid of the necessity for leave, if under the rules leave to appeal would be required. Accordingly, he submitted that application for leave should have been made in the first instance to the learned judge in the court below. He desired us, however, to deal with the matter on its merits and, accordingly, without deciding whether leave was necessary, we gave leave to counsel for the plaintiff to argue his appeal. As this appeal, if successful, would dispose of the whole matter, it will be convenient to deal with it first.

Counsel for the plaintiff, in his able argument, submitted that : (i) The fraud contemplated by s. 4 of the Act is fraud on the court. Unless the court has been deceived, the section is not applicable. (ii) An application under s. 4 should be treated in the same way as, before the Act of 1933 came into force, an action to set aside a judgment would have been treated. (iii) Precisely the same tests apply whether the judgment sought to be set aside is a foreign judgment or an English judgment. (iv) Where a judgment is sought to be set aside on the ground of fraud, the fraud must have been discovered by the applicants since the date of the judgment. (v) It was plain that the facts relied on in the present case were all known to the defendants before the date of the Indian judgment. Counsel for the defendants agreed with the first of these propositions and he did not, we think, dispute the second. The third is supported by the observations of LINDLEY, L.J., in Vadala v. Lawes (1) (25 Q.B.D. 310, 316), where he says :

First of all, there is the rule which is perfectly well established and well known, that a party to an action can impeach the judgment in it for fraud. Whether it is the judgment of an English court or of a foreign court does not matter ; using general language, that is a general proposition unconditional and undisputed.

It is unnecessary for us on this appeal to consider how far those observations go. The fifth proposition is also plainly correct if counsel means only that the defendants knew they were being sued for a sum in excess of rupees 20,000 and that in the plaint verified by affidavit the plaintiff was alleging that they had borrowed rupees 20,000, but there is no evidence that they knew that the plaint so verified would be the only evidence before the court if, in fact, that was the position.

Be that as it may, counsel's real difficulty is in his fourth proposition. For it he relied on Boswell v. Coaks (2), a decision of the House of Lords applied in Birch v. Birch (3). These cases, no doubt, establish that in proceedings to set aside an English judgment the defendants cannot ask for a re-trial of the issue of fraud as between them and the plaintiff on facts known to them at the date of the earlier judgment, but in cases under s. 4, the question is not one of fraud on the plaintiff, but of fraud on the court, and it seems to us to be clearly established by authority binding on us that, if the defendant shows a prima facie case that the court was deceived, he is entitled to have that issue tried even though, in trying it, the court may have to go into defences which could have been raised at the first trial : see Abouloff v. Oppenheimer (4), as explained in Vadala v. Lawes (1), where LINDLEY, L.J., immediately after the passage we have already cited, says :

Another general proposition which, speaking in equally general language, is perfectly well settled, is, that when you bring an action on a foreign judgment, you cannot go into the merits which have been tried in the foreign court. But you have to combine those two rules and apply them in the case where you cannot go into the alleged fraud without going into the merits. Which rule is to prevail ? That point appears to me to have been one of very great difficulty before the case of Abouloff v. Oppenheimer (4). At the time when that case was decided, namely, in 1882, there was a long line of authorities including Bank of Australasia v. Nias (5), Ochsenbein v. Papelier (6), and Cammell v. Sewell (7), all recognising and enforcing the general proposition, that in an action on a foreign judgment you cannot re-try the merits. But until Abouloff's case (4) the difficulty of combining the two rules and saying what ought to be done where you could not enter into the question of fraud to prove it without re-opening the merits, had never come forward for explicit decision. That point was raised directly in the case of Abouloff v. Oppenheimer (4), and it was decided. I cannot fritter away that judgment, and I cannot read the judgments without seeing that they amount to this: that if the fraud upon the foreign court consists in the fact that the plaintiff has induced that court by fraud to come to a wrong conclusion, you can re-open the whole case even although you will have in this court to go into the very facts which were investigated, and which were in issue in the foreign court. The technical objection that the issue is the same is technically answered by the technical reply that the issue is not the same, because in this court you have to consider whether the foreign court has been imposed upon. That, to my mind, is only meeting technical argument by a technical answer, and I do not attach much importance to it; but in that case the court faced the difficulty that you could not give effect to the defence without re-trying the merits. The fraud practised on the court, or alleged to have been practised on the court, was the misleading of the court by evidence known by the plaintiff to be false. That was the whole fraud. The question of fact, whether what the plaintiff had said in the court below was or was not false, was the very question of fact that had been adjudicated on in the foreign court; and, notwithstanding that was so, when the court came to consider how the two rules, to which I have alluded, could be worked together, they said: "Well, if that foreign judgment was obtained fraudulently, and if it is necessary, in order to prove that fraud, to re-try the merits, you are entitled to do so according to the law of this country." I cannot read that case in any other way.

In the present case it is plain that the defendants are alleging a fraud on the court, and it is, therefore, immaterial that to establish their allegation they will have to adduce evidence which was available to them before the date of the Indian judgment.

As a subsidiary point, counsel for the plaintiff contended that the defendants had failed to establish a prima facie case of fraud. We are unable to accede to this argument. It may well be that the plaintiff will rebut that prima facie case, but we think that the evidence filed by the defendants discloses sufficient evidence of a case to entitle them to an issue.

We turn, therefore, to the defendants' appeal. Their counsel argued that under the Act and the rules the court had no power to impose as a condition of directing an issue that the defendants should bring money into court. In our opinion, this contention is well founded. Neither the Act nor the rules in terms confer such a power. In this respect the contrast with Ord. 14, r. 6, and with Ord. 27, r. 15, both of which expressly empower the court to impose terms as a condition, in the first case of giving leave to defend under Ord. 14, and in the second case of setting aside a judgment, is marked. In proceedings under the Act of 1933 the court is not bound to direct an issue. It should not do so in the case of an application based on an allegation of fraud unless it is satisfied that a prima facie case of fraud on the court is established, but, if it is so satisfied, we can see no justification for such an order as JONES, J., has made in this case. In this connection it is not immaterial to observe that in a proper case the court may require security from a plaintiff seeking to enforce his judgment: see s. 3 (1) (a) of the Act, and Ord. 41B, r. 3. It is to be observed that under that rule the plaintiff may be ordered to find security to include the cost of proceedings to set aside the registration. For these reasons at the conclusion of the hearing we dismissed the plaintiff's cross-appeal and varied the order of JONES, J., in the manner asked for by the defendants, namely, by directing an issue subject only to the defendants bringing into court £810, the agreed sterling equivalent of rupees 10,800, an offer they had made in the court below and repeated in this court.

Order varied. Cross-appeal dismissed.

R. v. PONTYPRIDD LICENSING JUSTICES.

Ex parte ELY BREWERY CO., LTD.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Singleton and Denning, JJ.), July 28, 1948.]

Intoxicating Liquor—Justices' consent to structural alterations—Destruction of identity of premises—Relevant consideration—Change from hotel to public house—Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910 (c. 24), s. 71.

A Some 50 years ago the P. hotel was constructed, with 32 bedrooms. It had on the ground floor two bars, an hotel bar, primarily intended for the use of people staying in the hotel, and a vaults bar, which was something in the nature of a public bar with a separate entrance into the street. The hotel was not a financial success, and the E. brewery company, to which it belonged, wished to discontinue using it as a hotel and to let the premises, with the exception of the vaults bar, to a government department as offices. For this purpose they wished to stop up the entrance into the vaults bar so that there would be no communication between the ground floor where the bar was situate and the upper floors of the building. There was one other hotel in the same town.

B
C HELD: in considering an application for leave to make the proposed structural alterations the justices were entitled to take into account that they would prevent the upper part of the premises being used as a residential hotel.

E MOTION for mandamus.

On Mar. 31, 1948, the Pontypridd licensing justices at the adjourned annual licensing meeting refused an application by the applicants, Ely Brewery Co., Ltd., under s. 71 of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, for permission to make certain alterations in the licensed premises known as Park Hotel, Pontypridd, Glamorgan, on the ground that the alterations (a) would entail the destruction of the identity of the premises in respect of which the licence was held; and (b) would leave Pontypridd with only one residential hotel, thus reducing the facilities for refreshment and prevent the legitimate and reasonable requirements of the public being met. The applicants moved for an order of mandamus directed to the justices calling on them to hear and determine the application according to law. The motion was refused. The facts appear in the headnote.

G Edmund Davies, K.C., and Cennydd Traherne for the applicants.

Sir David Maxwell Fyfe, K.C., and Roderic Bowen for the respondent justices.

H LORD GODDARD, C.J.: In this case counsel for the applicants moves for an order of mandamus directed to the licensing justices of Pontypridd calling on them to hear and determine according to law an application made to them by the Ely Brewery Co., Ltd., to approve certain alterations in licensed premises. I approach the case with the knowledge that this court ought not lightly to interfere with the discretion of licensing justices, and also that the fact that this court might have come to a different conclusion if they had been sitting as licensing justices is no ground for granting a mandamus directed to the justices if they have heard and determined the case.

The main grounds on which the justices have refused this application is that, in their opinion, it is desirable that there should be additional accommodation for travellers and greater catering facilities in Pontypridd, though hitherto very few persons have shown any desire to stay there for the night. Perhaps it is. The justices are far better judges of that than we can be, and it is not a matter on which we are entitled to express any opinion, except that the justices cannot force the Ely Brewery Co. to continue carrying on the business as an hotel and losing money by so doing. The justices have stated three grounds for their refusal. The first is that :

The granting of the said application would have entailed the destruction of the identity of the premises in respect of which the licence is held, in that it involved the alteration of the premises from that of a substantial residential hotel capable of providing sleeping accommodation, general catering, and, particularly, catering for social functions, into premises materially different in size and solely confined in function to the sale of exciseable goods. A

With some considerable hesitation I have come to the conclusion that it is impossible to say that the justices took into account a matter which they ought not to have taken into account. I cannot ignore the decision of this court in R. v. Watford Licensing Justices, Ex p. Trust Houses, Ltd. (1). That is a case which I have some difficulty in understanding, and it may yet come before another court, but, sitting in this court, I am bound by the decision which was that where an application is made under s. 71 for the approval by justices of alterations, they can consider any questions they like whether or not they have any regard to the alterations for which their consent is necessary. The only occasions on which the owner of licensed premises has to ask for the consent of justices to alterations is where the alteration :

... gives increased facilities for drinking, or conceals from observation any part of the premises used for drinking, or which affects the communication between the part of the premises where intoxicating liquor is sold and any other part of the premises, or any street or other public way.

R. v. Watford Licensing Justices, Ex p. Trust Houses, Ltd. (1) decided that if an alteration of one of these classes comes before the justices for their consent, the justices, in dealing with it, are not limited to the consideration of the alteration itself solely from the point of view of the descriptive words contained in the sub-section. The justices are entitled, and are bound, to take into account whatever matters are relevant to the whole inquiry. My difficulty in accepting that case, though I am bound by it, is that when one comes to examine the facts one finds that the justices were considering one of the points dealt with in the section, and whether or not the words which I have referred to were obiter is a matter which may be discussed hereafter. However that may be, that case has stood since 1929, and I think we must follow it. If that is so, it gives the justices, on an application to approve an alteration, the widest possible discretion to consider any matters they like, although in R. v. Wandsworth Licensing Justices, Ex p. Whitbread & Co. (2) ([1921] 3 K.B. 487, at p. 496) SIR ALFRED LAWRENCE, C.J., said that the justices had :

... to consider the needs of the neighbourhood for the supply of intoxicating liquor, and the nature of these proposed improvements, and to come to a decision on the merits of the proposed improvements, whether they ought or ought not to be allowed.

I do not, however, think we can say, at any rate since R. v. Watford Licensing Justices, Ex p. Trust Houses, Ltd. (1), that those are the only grounds the justices may take into account. Therefore, it seems to me to follow that the justices could, in considering the alterations in the present case, say : "This alteration will prevent the upper part of these premises being used as a residential hotel. We will, therefore, refuse our consent to it."

The second ground on which the justices based their decision seems to me to be no more than a repetition of the first, because they said :

The said alteration ... would leave Pontypridd with only one licensed residential hotel, reduce the facilities for refreshment, and prevent the legitimate and reasonable requirements of the public being met.

Again, while I have some difficulty in seeing how the refusal of this application will in any way increase the facilities, that is a matter which the justices know better than I do. It seems to me that that really comes within the ambit of the first ground, and that the considerations which apply to the first ground apply to the second. For these reasons I have come to the conclusion that this application must fail and be dismissed with costs. H

SINGLETON, J.: I agree that this application fails. The applicants were anxious to make certain alterations to the Park Hotel, Pontypridd, and by reason of s. 71 of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act of 1910, they required the consent of the licensing justices before the alterations could be made. I agree entirely with what my Lord said as to this court being slow to interfere with the discretion of licensing justices. We have no right to interfere with them so long as they act according to the law. The licensing justices have put in an affidavit in which they express their reasons for acting as they did. They say the first reason was that:

The granting of the said application would have entailed the destruction of the identity of the premises in respect of which the licence is held, in that it involved the alteration of the premises from that of a substantial residential hotel capable of providing sleeping accommodation, general catering, and, particularly, catering for social functions, into premises materially different in size and solely confined in function to the sale of exciseable goods.

In R. v. Weston-super-Mare Licensing Justices, Ex p. Powell (3), the Court of Appeal expressed the view that licensing justices could consent to alterations so long as those alterations would not destroy the identity of the premises as already existing. I can understand that licensing justices might think that the taking away of the whole, or practically the whole, of the hotel accommodation and entertaining accommodation, leaving just the bars would be the destruction of the identity of the premises. That was the view which they formed. They were entitled to form it, and I do not think this court can interfere. At the same time, I share the regret expressed by my Lord because I should have been very glad if this case could have gone back for reconsideration by the licensing justices. I have before me figures which show what happened in pre-war days in this hotel in regard to the use of bedroom accommodation. There were 32 bedrooms, and the figures show that in 1937 the takings for the letting of apartments amounted to £70, in 1938 to £201 and in 1946 to £246. Obviously, the living or hotel part could not be made to pay on that basis, and one has no reason to assume that things are any better in that respect at the present time. I wonder how far the licensing justices considered that fact, but I do not think we are in a position to say they did not. The justices seem to think that they can compel the applicants to spend thousands of pounds on re-decorating and re-furnishing the hotel part of the premises and to go on using it as a hotel. I do not think they can do that.

Rates and Rating—Recovery of rate—Distress—Application for issue of warrant—Defence—Allegation that assessment increased on defective proposal.

The present case applies the ratio decidendi in that case to one where the ratepayer alleges that the rate was bad because it was based on an increased assessment which had been made as the result of a defective proposal.

CASE STATED by Hertfordshire justices.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Barnet a complaint was preferred by Gilbert Baldwin, acting as assistant collector of and agent for the appellants, the East Barnet Urban District Council, alleging that the respondent ratepayers had not paid £9 10s., payable by virtue of a general rate made on Mar. 17, 1947, in respect of offices, buildings and yard situate at 27, Cat Hill, in the East Barnet urban district. The premises rated had been assessed in the valuation list at £17 gross value and £10 rateable value, and they were subject to a general rate at the rate of 19s. in the £ made on Mar. 17, 1947, for the year from Apr. 1, 1947, to Mar. 31, 1948, payable in two instalments. The ratepayers paid the first instalment of £4 15s. on Aug. 13, 1947. On July 31, 1947, the appellant council made a proposal for the amendment of the valuation list by increasing the gross value and rateable value of the premises to £40 and £30 respectively. On Sept. 9, 1947, the assessment committee heard the proposal and determined to amend the valuation list in accordance therewith. The rateable value appearing in the rate book was amended to £30, and on Sept. 29, 1947, the appellants demanded the sum of £9 10s. arrears of the first instalment in respect of the increase of rateable value and £14 5s. in respect of the second instalment. The ratepayers paid the second instalment, but refused to pay the first on the ground that the proposal was invalid in that it did not sufficiently specify the grounds on which it was made and that there was no power to amend, in pursuance of the proposal, the valuation list or the rate in respect of the premises. The complaint was dismissed on Mar. 10, 1948, when the court refused to issue a distress warrant. The council now appealed. The court allowed the appeal and held that this question could not be raised on an application for the issue of a distress warrant.

Squibb for the appellants.

The respondents did not appear and were not represented.

LORD GODDARD, C.J. : This case must be remitted to the magistrates with the expression of opinion that they had no jurisdiction to consider the contentions which were put forward by the ratepayers, but that it was their duty to issue a distress warrant, which must now be issued. I do not think it necessary to go through the facts because Shillito v. Hinchliffe (1) is clear authority that the magistrates, in refusing to issue the distress warrant, were wrong. The case will be remitted to the magistrates with a direction to issue a distress warrant.

SINGLETON, J. : I agree.

Re BARNATO (deceased). JOEL AND ANOTHER v. SANGES AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Harman, J.), July 6, 7, 21, 1948.]

Practice—Originating summons—Joinder of Crown as party—Future liability to estate duty—Crown Proceedings Act, 1947 (c. 44), ss. 13, 23 (2) (b)—R.S.C., Ord. 1A, r. 1, Ord. 54A, r. 1A, Ord. 55, r. 3, Ord. 55, r. 5.

By his will a testator bequeathed a fund to trustees to hold for L.A. for life on protective trusts with various remainders over and with power to the trustees, with the consent of L.A., to make advances in favour of the issue of L.A. The trustees desired to ascertain whether, if a certain advance was made, they would be liable for estate duty in respect thereof on the death of L.A., and they, therefore, issued a summons joining the Inland Revenue Commissioners as defendants. The commissioners applied under R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 11, to be struck out as having been improperly joined. It was accepted that procedure under the Administration of Justice (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1933, s. 3, was inappropriate.

HELD: (i) there was no general right in the subject to oblige the Crown to become a defendant to proceedings by way of originating summons not provided for by statute.

Dyson v. A.-G. ([1911] 1 K.B. 410), distinguished.

(ii) the effect of the Crown Proceedings Act, 1947, ss. 13 and 23 (2) (b), and Ord. 1A, r. 1, was to make the procedure by originating summons available to the subject against the Crown in any case where it would be available between subject and subject, but the question asked could not be brought within the rules, since it was not within Ord. 54A, r. 1A, because no claim for duty at present existed, nor was it within Ord. 55, r. 3, because the Crown was not included in the categories to be served under Ord. 55, r. 5, and, therefore, the commissioners were improperly joined.

J. H. Stamp (R. L. Edwards with him) for the Inland Revenue Commissioners.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 21. HARMAN, J., read the following judgment. The plaintiffs in the originating summons in this matter are trustees in whom is vested a large settled legacy and other property settled by the will of Henry Isaacs Barnato, but long since segregated from his estate. It appears that under the limitations of the will the fund stands limited in favour of one Lily Asher for a protected life interest, with various remainders over under which the defendants (other than the last defendant) have beneficial interests. In particular, a power of advancement is vested in the plaintiffs as trustees, with the consent of Mrs. Asher, in favour of her issue, who are represented here.

By the originating summons, which was issued on June 3, 1948, the plaintiffs raise two questions of construction and administration respectively in connection with the said power of advancement and the application of any sums to be advanced. In neither of these questions is the Crown in any way interested or concerned. By question 3, however, the originating summons seeks to have determined the question whether, if a proposed advance be made, the plaintiffs will remain accountable to the Crown on the death of Mrs. Asher for any estate duty exigible in respect of the sum advanced. It is said that estate duty may become payable by virtue of the Finance Act, 1940, s. 43, and that liability for it of the plaintiffs may arise under the Finance Act, 1894, s. 8. The plaintiffs, quite naturally, are desirous of knowing whether this claim can in law be established against them, for that may be a vital factor in considering whether they will part with the money to be advanced, and, accordingly, before the issue of the originating summons, they communicated through their solicitors with the solicitor to the Inland Revenue Commissioners submitting a draft of the summons to him and asking whether the Attorney-General should be joined. By his answer, made on Mar. 25 last, the solicitor to the Inland Revenue Commissioners made, among others, the following observations :

Should the proposed advance be made, it would seem that the death of Mrs. Lily Asher would give rise to a claim for estate duty (additional to that on the funds retained by the trustees till her death) . . . the official view is the proposed plaintiffs to the summons will be accountable for any estate duty payable.

By the same letter, the solicitor to the commissioners objected to the joinder of the Attorney-General for reasons which I need not elaborate. Notwithstanding this, the plaintiffs have seen fit to join the Inland Revenue Commissioners as the last defendants to the originating summons, they having been joined to represent the Crown instead of the Attorney-General by reason of the Crown Proceedings Act, 1947, s. 17 (3). The Inland Revenue Commissioners now apply by summons under R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 11, to be struck out as having been improperly joined as parties.

The first question which arises is whether proceedings of this nature are available to the subject against the Crown. The estate duty was created by the Finance Act, 1894, and under that Act certain machinery was set up for determining questions between the subject and the Crown. Thus, under s. 10 an appeal was provided from a decision of the commissioners to the High Court, and under rules made in 1895 such proceedings must be taken by way of petition in the Queen's Remembrancer's Department. The Act of 1894 was considerably altered by the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, and, under s. 33 of that Act, further machinery for deciding questions was provided, the procedure being again by petition. So far as I am aware, before 1933 questions of liability to estate duty between the Crown and the subject were always decided either under the before mentioned machinery or on English information of the Attorney-General. It was, however, realised that it would be extremely convenient if questions of this sort could be decided by a less cumbrous procedure than petition or information, and, accordingly, there was included in the Administration of Justice (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1933, a section (s. 3) providing for the determination by the High Court in a summary way of such questions of liability. The section provided for rules of court. None has ever been made, but ever since the passing of that Act the procedure by originating summons under Ord. 54A, r. 1A, has been frequently resorted to and has proved convenient and efficient. To such summonses, the Attorney-General or the commissioners are made defendants.

It is admitted that that section has no application here because (to adopt the language of the section) no "claim has been made by the Crown" nor is any claim apprehended in respect of "duties which have or are alleged to have become chargeable" by reason of the death of any person. Mrs. Asher is still alive. The plaintiffs, nevertheless, allege that there is a general right in the subject to oblige the Crown to become a defendant to proceedings by way of originating summons not provided for by any statute, and that, in fact, a remedy of this sort has always been open ever since 1894, though never before resorted to. This is a bold claim, and I do not accept it. The summary procedure by way of originating summons is not, in my judgment (unless under the Crown Proceedings Act, 1947, with which I will deal in a moment) available against the Crown for the determination of a question of liability to estate duty except insofar as is provided by s. 3 of the Act of 1933. There may have been cases, for aught I know, where the Crown has been willing to accede to the request of the subject to submit to the jurisdiction of the court for the purpose of deciding such a question of liability, but I do not think that the Crown can be obliged to take this course, and, indeed, it would often be highly inconvenient that the Crown should be made a defendant to proceedings of a domestic character between beneficiaries under a will or settlement simply because the result of the answer to one of them might be supposed to affect some question of liability to estate duty, or, for that matter, to income tax.

The plaintiffs justify this claim on the authority of Dyson v. Attorney-General (1), where the Court of Appeal held that a declaratory judgment under Ord. 25, r. 5, could be made against the Attorney-General. Those, however, were proceedings by writ, and, in my judgment, the decision in that case does not apply to the summary procedure by originating summons. FARWELL, L.J., in that case pointed out that when the interests of the Crown were only indirectly affected, the old courts of equity, whether the Court of Chancery or the Court of Exchequer, did make declaratory orders which affected the rights of the Crown. Whether the plaintiffs would have been in a better position if they had started the present proceedings by writ I need not determine, but as at present advised it seems to me that there would have been very great difficulties in their way in framing a claim that could not be struck out in limine. Moreover, the making of a declaration in such proceedings was always a matter of discretion: see Smeeton v. Attorney-General (2). The Attorney-General is, of course, frequently added as a defendant to originating summonses which raise questions where charitable bequests or donations are or may be involved, but these are not, in my judgment, a precedent for present purposes. In charity cases the Attorney-General is joined to represent the Crown as pater patriae, and to enable him to intervene for the protection of charities and to assist the court. No question of the liability of the subject to tax is involved. The Crown is concerned in a fiduciary capacity.

I must next consider whether the position in this respect has been altered by the Crown Proceedings Act, 1947. It is to be observed that s. 3 of the Act of 1933 already referred to has not been repealed by the Act of 1947 which does repeal other sections in the same Act. It is, therefore, clear that the procedure already referred to for the decision of estate duty claims is not abolished, and s. 1 of the Act of 1947 which refers to proceedings under any statutory provision repealed by the Act does not apply. The Crown Proceedings Act, 1947, s. 13, provides that all civil proceedings against the Crown "shall be instituted and proceeded with in accordance with rules of court." Section 23 (2) provides that any reference in the Act to civil proceedings against the Crown:

... shall be construed as a reference to . . . (b) proceedings for . . . the obtaining of any relief which, if this Act had not been passed, might have been . . . obtained by an action against the Attorney-General . . .

By R.S.C., Ord. 1A, r. 1:

(a) The Rules of the Supreme Court . . . shall, so far as may be, apply to all civil proceedings by or against the Crown instituted in the High Court on or after Jan. 1, 1948; (b) such civil proceedings as aforesaid shall, so far as may be, take the same form as civil proceedings between subjects, and shall, if no special form is applicable, take the form of an action commenced by writ of summons.

At an early stage of the hearing both parties appearing before me disclaimed the notion that this Act had anything to do with the present proceedings, but counsel for the plaintiffs later resiled from that view. In my judgment, he was right, and the effect of the sections and the rules, to which I have referred, is to make the procedure by originating summons available to the subject against the Crown in any case where it would be available between subject and subject. I must, therefore, consider whether question 3 of the summonses is one that comes within the rules of court, for procedure by way of originating summons, being a creature of statute, can only be resorted to in cases provided for by the rules. The plaintiffs allege that question 3 of the originating summons is justified either by R.S.C., Ord. 54A, r. 1A, or by Ord. 55, r. 3. As to the first of these the plaintiffs must be persons claiming a "legal or equitable right," such right depending on a question of construction of a statute. In my judgment, the plaintiffs in this respect are not claiming any legal or equitable right, for no claim for duty at present exists. The plaintiffs are merely asking the court to assume that hereafter, when Mrs. Asher dies, they may acquire such a right. Moreover, the statute to be considered—i.e., the Finance Act, 1894, s. 8—may not be in existence at the relevant date. This rule, therefore, does not help the plaintiffs. As to Ord. 55, r. 3, that clearly justifies the taking out of a summons in respect of questions 1 and 2 and the joinder of the defendants other than the Crown, but when one turns to Ord. 55, r. 5, to find who are the persons to be served, I do not find that the Crown comes into any of the categories set out in the rule. It is true that the commissioners have alleged that their present view is that a claim may hereafter arise, but no present claim has been made, nor has any right or interest yet arisen in the Crown which is sought to be effected. Re Clay (3) shows that there was no jurisdiction to make a declaratory order in a case where the defendant had put forward no present claim. Moreover, the decision in Re King (4) shows that a person not a beneficiary under a trust cannot be brought before the court on an originating summons for the purpose of deciding a future contingent claim where the alleged claimant has not asserted any right presently enforceable either at law or in equity.

It was urged by the plaintiffs that a question of this sort ought to be left to be decided at the hearing and not dealt with by an interlocutory order, but I do not feel the force of this. The point could be taken as a preliminary point at the hearing, but there is no object in leaving it undecided now that it has been raised and argued. Moreover, Re Davies (5) shows that the court favours the taking of such a point at an early stage, and, indeed, may penalise a defendant who fails to do so. Consequently, on this ground I am of opinion that the commissioners have been improperly joined and ought to be struck out.

Order accordingly. The plaintiffs to pay the costs of the Crown as between party and party, and the costs of all other parties to be costs in the cause on the originating summons.

HELMAN v. HORSHAM AND WORTHING ASSESSMENT COMMITTEE.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Singleton and Slade, JJ.), July 23, 1948.]

Rates and Rating—Assessment—Building occupied in part—Occupation by lodger or tenant—Owner occupying rest of house—Presumption that other occupant a lodger—Right to assess part separately—Rating and Valuation Act, 1925 (c. 90), s. 23 (1).

The owner of a house, who himself occupied three rooms and a kitchen-scullery on the ground floor and one room on the first floor, let to one M. two rooms and a kitchen-scullery on the first floor, with the right to use, in common with himself, the combined bathroom and W.C. on that floor, the upper landings, the entrance hall, the front and back doors and the yard and outside W.C., to get to which there was a right to go through the downstairs rooms. The rent included payment for the use of the carpet on the stairs and in the hall and of linoleum in the rooms let, and the owner kept the hall and landings clean.

HELD : the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925, s. 23 (1) did not give the rating authorities an unfettered discretion in such a case either to divide the house into two hereditaments for rating purposes or to rate it as one hereditament, but, the owner being resident on the premises, there was a presumption that M. was a lodger only, and, there being no evidence to show that the relationship of landlord and tenant had been created between the owner and M., the owner must be deemed to be in occupation of the whole house as a single hereditament and chargeable to rates as such.

CASE STATED by West Sussex Quarter Sessions.

D On a hearing of a proposal for the amendment of the valuation list for the borough of Worthing, the respondent assessment committee determined that a house should be assessed in parts—one part as being in the occupation of the appellant, Helman, the owner of the house and resident therein, and the other part, which comprised two rooms and a kitchen-scullery let off to one Miles (with a right to use the bathroom, water closet, landings, staircase, entrances, etc.) as being in the occupation of the said Miles. The appellant appealed to quarter sessions who dismissed the appeal, and he now appealed to the High Court by Case Stated. He contended that the occupant of the part let off was in the position of a lodger, and, therefore, that the part let to him was not separately rateable. The court allowed the appeal.

Casswell, K.C., and H. J. Brown for the assessment committee.

F LORD GODDARD, C.J. : This is a Special Case stated by the Rating and Valuation Committee of the West Sussex Quarter Sessions, who affirmed a decision of the assessment committee of the Horsham and Worthing area whereby they divided for rating purposes a house known as 78, Brighton Road, Worthing, rating three rooms on the first floor of the hereditament as a separate hereditament and the rooms on the ground floor and one room on the first floor also as a separate hereditament. The Case is signed by the learned chairman of quarter sessions, for whose opinion I have the most profound respect, but I feel myself bound to take a different view from that to which quarter sessions came.

G The Case states that the appellant is the owner of these premises. To my mind it is a most important fact that not only is he the owner but also that he lives on the premises. "The said dwelling-house was originally designed as a single dwelling . . ."—I read those words because I think they give some indication why quarter sessions came to the decision they did—" . . . the accommodation being three living rooms, a kitchen-scullery and a combined bathroom and W.C. on the first floor, and three living rooms, a kitchen-scullery and outside W.C. on the ground floor." The Case finds that on Mar. 8, 1947, the appellant entered into a verbal agreement with Miles, the other occupant of the house, the material terms of which were that Miles was to have the sole use and occupation of two living rooms and the kitchen-scullery on the first floor, the appellant remaining in occupation of the rooms on the ground floor and the other room on the first floor. There was, therefore, no demise of a complete floor. Miles was to have a right in common with the appellant to use the bathroom and both W.C.'s, and a right of passage through the entrance hall and over two upper landings and through the rooms on the ground floor as and when he required for the purpose of using the outside W.C. and gaining access to the yard at the rear, to the use of which he had a right in common with the appellant. The front and the back doors were to be used in common, there being no separate entrance to the first floor of the house. Miles was to pay the sum of 37s. 6d. a week, which was the rent fixed by the tribunal appointed under the Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946, and included the use of carpets on the stairs and in the hall and of linoleum laid in the rooms which he occupied. The hall and landings were to be kept clean by the appellant.

The first argument which counsel for the assessment committee put forward was that the committee had an unfettered discretion given to them by s. 23 (1) of the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925, to rate any premises of which there were two occupiers as two hereditaments if the house had been originally constructed as a separate dwelling. In my opinion, that is a mistaken reading of s. 23. I do not think s. 23 (1) gives the rating authority or the assessment committee the uncontrolled discretion which it is contended it does. It is a somewhat involved sub-section, but the concluding words, which are :

a building or portion of a building so treated as a single hereditament shall, for the purposes of rating, be deemed to be a single hereditament in the occupation of the person who receives the rents payable in respect of the parts are perfectly intelligible if they are confined to treating a house which may be divided into different lettings of one sort or another as being a single hereditament so that the person who receives the rents is the person to be rated. But in this case it seems to me that a different set of circumstances arises because the appellant landlord remained on the premises and received no rent for that part of the premises which he occupied. He only received rent for the part which Miles occupied. I think the doubt which is expressed in RYDE ON RATING 6th ed., at p. 48, "whether, if the owner or tenant of the whole building himself occupies a part of it, he can be described in these words, or whether there is anyone who can be so described," is well founded. I do not think that on any construction s. 23 (1) can be regarded as having the effect of overriding a long line of authorities beginning, more particularly, with Bradley v. Baylis (1), which is one of three cases all raising the same point. That case, like many of the cases which raise the point whether a person is to be regarded as a lodger or a tenant, arose under the Representation of the People Act, 1918, and the question was whether a person could claim a vote as an occupier in the days before lodgers' votes. That was followed and considered in subsequent cases, and more especially in Kent v. Fittall (2). As I understand those cases, they come to this. The distinction between a lodger and a weekly tenant is often exceedingly difficult to define and it is a matter of very considerable difficulty where one is to draw the line, but one matter has always been treated in the later decisions, not as conclusive, but never as an element to be ignored, namely, whether the landlord remains resident on the premises himself. If a landlord has a house which is structurally altered, as many houses are now and have been since these decisions, so that there is one floor or two floors converted into a separate flat, often having its own door on a landing, the fact that the landlord occupies the lower part of the house as his own flat would certainly not be in any way conclusive that he did not intend the person who was, to use a neutral expression, in the upper part of the house, to be a tenant in the true sense of the word and to have an estate in that upper part. But in a house where no structural alteration is made, so that it remains just as it was built and people can walk up and down the stairs freely and go in and out of the rooms freely from a physical point of view, the fact that the landlord is living on the premises does seem to me to raise the presumption, and has always been treated in these cases as raising a presumption, that he intends to retain control of the whole of the premises. And if the landlord intends to retain control of the whole of the premises, that, I think, prima facie at least negatives the fact that the person who is occupying rooms in the other part of the house than that in which the landlord lives is a tenant in the true sense and not a lodger.

I refer briefly to Allan v. Liverpool, Inman and Kirkdale (3) which was decided before Bradley v. Baylis (1). In that case BLACKBURN, J., said (L.R. 9 Q.B. 180, 191) :

A lodger in a house, although he has the exclusive use of rooms in the house, in the sense that nobody else is to be there, and though his goods are stowed there, yet he is not in exclusive occupation in that sense [i.e., for rating purposes], because the landlord is there for the purpose of being able, as landlords commonly do in the case of lodgings, to have his own servants to look after the house and the furniture, and has retained to himself the occupation, though he has agreed to give the exclusive enjoyment of the occupation to the lodger.

In Kent v. Fittall (2) PICKFORD, J., said ([1911] 2 K.B. 1102, 1111):

A It has been established by many cases that if a man lets off rooms in a house in which he himself resides, although he may give to other persons exclusive occupation of parts of the house and render no services to those inmates, he nevertheless prima facie retains control, and the inmates are lodgers and not occupying tenants.

B In the present case we have, among other things, the fact that there was a bathroom in this house and that that bathroom was to be used both by the landlord and by Miles. The assessment committee, in treating these premises as two separate hereditaments, did not apparently, include the bathroom. They have taken as one hereditament the two rooms on the first floor, with what is called the kitchenette, and attributed that to one hereditament, and to the other hereditament they have attributed the other room on the first floor and the rooms on the ground floor. I do not suppose they intend the bathroom to be treated as a separate hereditament in itself. They have simply ignored it, but Miles is given the right to use the bathroom, and that does not mean he is to have the exclusive use of it. The control of the bathroom remains in the appellant, and there is nothing which I can see which goes to show that the appellant, who is living on the premises and has certainly only parted with—I am using that phrase in the popular, and not in the strictly legal, sense—two rooms and a kitchenette (which may for all I know be nothing more than a room with a cupboard and a gas stove in it), intended to part with the general control of those premises. He could, as I conceive, claim the right to go into these rooms to make any necessary repairs. Miles is not put under any obligation to repair, and if something happened to the roof, the windows or the walls, and the wet was being let in, I should think that the landlord would have the right to enter so that his property, in which he is living, would be properly preserved. He is taking a weekly rent. It is very common for lodgers to pay so much a week. Unfurnished lodgings are perfectly well known; lodgings are not always furnished. In this case the rooms come within the Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946, but that is not conclusive in any way because both lodgings and tenancies come within that Act.

E It seems to me if, as I think, the line of cases to which I have referred have not been impliedly overruled by s. 23, the position is this. Although the presence of the landlord in the hereditament is not of itself conclusive that the other occupant must be a lodger, it is not only a fact of great weight but is also one which calls for the production of further facts which show that the landlord has renounced the right of control in the house, and it is on that point I think that quarter sessions have gone wrong. I can find no fact found which suggests that the landlord has renounced his control over these premises. In fact, I think the facts found indicate that the landlord has not renounced his rights over the premises. Moreover, if it was intended to vest an estate in Miles, giving him certain rights in the nature of an easement for the better enjoyment of what had been demised to him, it is most unlikely that that would have been done by a merely verbal agreement even although it was only a weekly tenancy. In the circumstances I come to the conclusion that I am bound to differ from quarter sessions because I think the proper inference to be drawn from the facts here is that Miles was no more than a lodger and it can never have been intended by s. 23 (1) of the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925, that, if a man lets lodgings to one or more persons, the rating authorities in their discretion can treat all those people as separate tenants and rate them in respect of their rooms as being in occupation of separate hereditaments. I, therefore, come to the conclusion that this house remained one hereditament, and that the facts found by quarter sessions are not enough to show that any estate was created and granted to Miles who was a lodger only. I arrive at that conclusion mainly because I can find nothing to indicate that the landlord, the appellant, had in any shape or form renounced the control which he exercised, and, so long as he remained in control of the premises, the premises must be regarded as one hereditament.

I have only one other word to say with regard to a case which counsel for the assessment committee cited to us, Allchurch v. Hendon Assessment Committee (4). That case seems to me to differ on its facts in the most material respects. There the landlord of a house let part of it to A and part to B. He himself did not live on the premises at all. The assessment committee treated the whole house as jointly occupied by these two people so that each of them became liable for the rates of the whole. They appealed and it was held they were entitled to be assessed separately, but neither could pretend that he was a lodger of the landlord, who had parted with the whole house to them in consideration of the rent, and they were certainly not lodgers the one of the other. The house was let in part to the one person and in part to the other, and, therefore, it was rightly treated as two separate hereditaments. That seems to me to be an entirely different case from the one we are now considering.

SINGLETON, J. : I agree that this appeal should be allowed. Before us the first point taken by counsel for the assessment committee was under s. 23 (1) of the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925, which Act was :

An Act to simplify and amend the law with respect to the making and collection of rates by the consolidation of rates and otherwise, to promote uniformity in the valuation of property for the purpose of rates, to amend the law with respect to the valuation of machinery . . .

The submission which counsel made was that the effect of s. 23 was that it matters not, once a house is in the occupation of more than one person, whether the position of the person other than the owner is that of lodger or tenant. There were separate occupations, and it was for the rating authority or the assessment committee to say whether they would assess the hereditament all in one or in different pieces. I do not think that that is the effect of s. 23. In so far as material it reads as follows :

Where a building . . . is occupied in parts, the rating authority or the assessment committee . . . may, if they think fit, . . . treat the building or any portion thereof as a single hereditament, and a building or portion of a building so treated as a single hereditament shall, for the purposes of rating, be deemed to be a single hereditament in the occupation of the person who receives the rents payable in respect of the parts.

The word "occupied" is used in the earlier part of the section. The occupier is the person to be rated, and has been since the statute of Elizabeth. The word "occupied," when used in s. 23 of the Act of 1925, is, I believe, used in the sense of rateable occupation and the effect of the section is to give the rating authority an easy and a simple way to collect the rates where a house is occupied in parts. They may say : "We treat it as one hereditament and we will collect the rates from the occupier, the person who receives the rent payable in respect of the parts." The argument of counsel for the assessment committee was that s. 23 had made a change in the law of rating and it mattered not whether the persons in occupation of the different parts of the hereditament were lodgers or tenants. I cannot think that that view of the section is right. The authorities, to some of which my Lord has referred, are set out in the current edition of RYDE ON RATING and every text book on the matter. They still stand for the purpose of applying the provisions of the Act of 1925. I agree that the appeal must be allowed.

SLADE, J. : Although I have considerable doubt in this case, I am not prepared to dissent from the conclusion at which my brethren have arrived. The liability to be rated rests on rateable occupation, and it has been held that a lodger is not an occupier in that sense, but that, generally speaking, a tenant is. The sole question, therefore, which seems to me to arise on this Case is whether there was evidence before quarter sessions which justified them in arriving at the conclusion that the relationship between the appellant and Miles was that of landlord and tenant or was merely that of landlord and lodger. I am prepared to assume that where a landlord retains part of a hereditament in his own occupation, there is a presumption that he intends to retain control over the whole of the premises, and it seems to me that the best way in which such a presumption can be rebutted is by showing that, in fact, he has created the relationship of landlord and tenant between himself and some other person in respect of part of the premises, because if he has, not only does he retain no control over the part which he has demised, but, on the contrary, the tenant of the demised part can turn the landlord out or bring trespass or a writ of elegit if the landlord attempts to enter that part of the premises. Therefore, I think the presumption carries us no further, and the sole point resolves itself into the question: Aye or no, was there or was there not evidence which entitled quarter sessions to come to the conclusion on the facts stated in this Case that the contract which was entered into between the appellant and Miles did or did not make the relationship of landlord and tenant. If there was evidence on which quarter sessions was entitled to come to the conclusion that the agreement entered into between the appellant and Miles created the relationship of landlord and tenant, this court could not, in my opinion, interfere with that decision. That is the matter on which I have felt doubt, but it is not one on which I feel justified in dissenting from the conclusion which my brethren have reached.

Appeal allowed with costs.

Re CHATTERLEY-WHITFIELD COLLIERIES, LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Greene, M.R., Asquith and Evershed, L.JJ.), July 14, 15, 16, 19, 20, 30, 1948.]

Coal—Nationalisation of industry—Colliery company—Reduction of capital—Rights of shareholders under Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946 (c. 59), s. 25 (1).

A colliery company, whose capital of £400,000 was divided into 20,000 six per cent. preference shares of £10 each and the same number of ordinary shares of a like nominal value, passed a special resolution, as empowered by its articles of association, to reduce its capital to £200,000 by returning to the preference shareholders the whole capital paid up on their shares. The articles conferred on the preference shareholders a right to a cumulative preference dividend of 6 per cent., and, on winding-up, in priority to ordinary shareholders, to repayment of capital and an amount equal to the difference between the total amount of dividends paid on their shares and 6 per cent. per annum on the capital paid up thereon as from the time of payment of such capital, but to no other participation in the assets. On Jan. 1, 1947, under the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946, the company's colliery undertaking became vested in the National Coal Board, and, pending the payment of compensation, the company was entitled under s. 22 (3) of the Act to interim income, and, under s. 22 (2), to interest on the amount of the compensation. The Act provides by s. 25: "(1) Provision shall be made by regulations for due regard being had, as between classes . . . of members . . . of a company being an owner of transferred interests, to what their relative expectations of income yield from their respective interests in the company would have been if this Act had not been passed, and for that purpose the regulations shall provide facilities for adjusting the respective interests of such classes in the company's assets as affected by the substitution of the compensation under this Act for the transferred interests of the company so as to give effect, so far as may be, on the one hand to the said expectations and on the other hand to the rights of priority conferred on such classes respectively by . . . the memorandum and articles of association of the company." Certain preference shareholders dissented from the resolution to reduce capital in the proposed manner and opposed the petition to confirm it. It appeared that the company was not contemplating liquidation, but was prospecting for coal in Ireland, and had other activities.

HELD (EVERSHED, L.J., dissentiente): it was a principle recognised and accepted by the courts and by business men that where shareholders are entitled to priority in a winding-up, but not to participation in surplus assets, they are to be paid off first on a reduction of capital, and s. 25 did not purport expressly or impliedly to limit or affect that principle in any way; having regard to all the circumstances, the proposed reduction was not rendered unfair by excluding the preference shareholders from consideration under s. 25; and it should be confirmed.

APPEAL by a company from a judgment of His Honour JUDGE PEEL, K.C., Deputy Vice-Chancellor of the Duchy and County Palatine of Lancaster, reported [1948] 1 All E.R. 911, refusing confirmation of a special resolution of the company to reduce its capital by returning to the preference shareholders all capital paid up on their shares. JUDGE PEEL held that the court was bound to take into account, as one of the material circumstances in considering the fairness of the proposed reduction, the prospect of the preference shareholders obtaining an adjustment under the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946, s. 25, of their contractual rights under the articles. The Court of Appeal by a majority now reversed JUDGE PEEL's decision and confirmed the reduction. The facts appear in the judgments of LORD GREENE, M.R., and EVERSHED, L.J.

Christie, K.C., and Eric Griffith for the company.

Ungoed-Thomas, K.C., and Raymond Walton for dissentient preference shareholders.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 30. The following judgments were read.

LORD GREENE, M.R.: The question for decision on this appeal is whether and to what extent an obscurely drafted section of the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946, is to be regarded as affecting the power of the court to confirm a reduction of capital under the Companies Act, 1929, s. 55 (1) (c). It must be observed at the outset that, if the section in question does operate in the manner suggested, it does so without there being present in it any reference whatever to the power of the court or to the provisions of the Companies Act, 1929, relating to reduction of capital. What is said is that the section brings about such a state of affairs as to compel the court, in the exercise of its power to confirm a reduction, to act in a manner in which it would not otherwise have acted: It is, perhaps, not unfair to say that, if this was the intention of the legislature, it might in fairness to all concerned have expressed it with some clarity instead of leaving it to be inferred. The power of the court to confirm reduction of capital is after all a very important part of our system of company organisation and finance, and might, one would have thought, have deserved at least a mention in a section designed, as it is said, to affect its exercise.

The issued capital of the company is £400,000, divided into 40,000 shares of £10 each, one half of which are 6 per cent. preference shares and one half ordinary shares. The preference shares are entitled in a winding-up to priority of capital and arrears of dividend but to no further participation in assets. The company is a private company which had for a number of years before the Nationalisation Act carried on with success the business of coal-mining. This was its principal undertaking, and on Jan. 1, 1947, this undertaking passed out of the company and vested in the National Coal Board.

In spite of the loss of its principal business in this manner, the company does not propose to go into liquidation. It proposes to embark in certain new

A businesses, one of them that of coal mining in Eire and Northern Ireland if prospecting operations in which it is engaged turn out to be successful, and another (carried on through a subsidiary company) the business of digging for clay in Northern Ireland and manufacturing tiles, drain pipes, etc. Appreciation of the fact that the company is going to continue an active existence is essential for the proper understanding of this case. In respect of the loss of its coal mining business under nationalisation, the company will eventually become entitled to compensation fixed in accordance with the Nationalisation Act. So far as the evidence goes, its future foreseeable sources of income will consist of (a) income (if any) from the proposed coal mining business in Ireland; (b) dividends from the subsidiary company which carries on the clay and tile manufacturing business above referred to; (c) income from any investments it may hold, including any investments of compensation moneys which may not be embarked in the businesses mentioned in (a) and (b); (d) interim income payable under the Nationalisation Act, viz., (1) during the first two years a sum (calculated to amount to £83,000 a year after deduction of tax) representing half of the profits of the nationalised undertaking during the year ended Dec. 31, 1945; (2) such interest as the Treasury, under s. 22 (2) (a) of the Act, may retrospectively allow when compensation is finally paid. I am unable to infer from this that the company in the future will be likely to earn anything like the large profits which it had been in the habit of earning before nationalisation.

C The process of ascertaining the share of the global figure of compensation to which an individual company will become entitled is admitted on all sides to be a lengthy one. This ascertainment is the third of the processes of valuation prescribed by the Act, and it is notorious that the second of those processes is not as yet anywhere near completion. It may be expected, therefore, that the company will not receive its compensation until after the expiration of a considerable time, running perhaps into several years. In the meanwhile the company is faced with the following situation. Its principal business has gone and it is proposing to embark on certain new activities which may or may not turn out to be successful. So long as it was possessed of its colliery it clearly required to keep all its issued capital in the business—there was no question of its having capital surplus to its business requirements. The reduced form of its activities is, however, such that it has a great deal more capital than it requires, and it is not unimportant to observe that it finds itself in this position quite apart from any compensation which it may receive when its share of the compensation is ultimately ascertained and paid. The repayment can be made without recourse to the compensation.

What is a company in that situation to do? The business answer to this question does not admit of doubt, particularly where a substantial part of its capital consists of preference shares bearing a higher rate of dividend than the company is reasonably likely to earn in the future. It will do what this company seeks to do, i.e., reduce its capital by paying off as much of its preference capital as it is able to pay off out of its surplus. A company which satisfies its capital requirements by issuing preference shares only does so where it is satisfied that the new capital will earn at least the promised rate of dividend. A company which has issued preference shares carrying a high rate of dividend and finds its business so curtailed that it has capital surplus to its requirements and sees the likelihood, or at any rate the possibility, that its preference capital will not, if I may use the expression, “earn its keep,” would be guilty of financial ineptitude if it did not take steps to reduce its capital by paying off preference capital so far as the law allowed it to do so. That is mere common-place in company finance.

There has been a tendency, indeed more than a tendency, to represent a company confronted by this sort of practical question as though it were nothing but an uneasy and warring combination of hostile classes of shareholders. In a sense, no doubt, it is. But it is more than this. The position of the company itself as an economic entity must be considered, and nothing can be more destructive of a company's financial equilibrium than to have to carry the burden of capital which it does not need, bearing a high rate of dividend which it cannot earn. In a company so situated, the ordinary shareholders will be unfairly treated vis-a-vis the preference shareholders, and the company may well fall into the situation when its preference dividends will begin to fall into irretrievable arrears. It is a fallacy to suppose that because ordinary shareholders will benefit, the transaction ought to be vetoed as being unfair to the preference shareholders.

It is a clearly recognised principle that the court, in confirming a reduction by the payment off of capital surplus to a company's needs, will allow, or rather require, that the reduction shall be effected in the first instance by payment off of capital which is entitled to priority in a winding-up. Apart from special cases where by agreement between classes the incidence of reduction is arranged in a different manner, this is and has for years been the normal and recognised practice of the courts, accepted by the courts and by business men as the fair and equitable method of carrying out a reduction by payment off of surplus capital. I know of no case where this method has, apart from agreement, been departed from. Every person who acquires shares in a company has only himself to blame if he does not know this, and I have no doubt that it is well recognised by business men. The following passage from LORD WRENBURY'S book accurately states the practice (BUCKLEY ON THE COMPANIES ACTS, 11th ed., p. 120):

Subject to the power of the court to sanction any reduction which is fair and equitable the inference to be drawn from the fact that the Act is silent as to the manner in which, in case of reduction, loss is to be borne or money is to be returned as among the several shareholders, is that, if it be loss, it is to be borne among them in such manner as under the constitution of the company loss in respect of capital is to be borne, and, if it be money to be returned, it is in like manner to be returned as capital is returnable.

In the argument before us there seemed to me at times to be involved some idea that preference shareholders, so far from being entitled to be paid off first, ought to be regarded as being entitled not to be paid off first, i.e., that a company, having once issued preference shares, is bound either to keep them for ever, irrespective of the fact that it has surplus capital sufficient to pay them off, or at any rate is only entitled to reduce its capital by spreading the reduction rateably over its preference and its ordinary capital, with the result that the company will always be left with a certain amount of preference capital. The theory at the bottom of this idea appears to be that a preference shareholder subscribes his capital on the basis that he is to receive a preferential dividend of an agreed amount and that it is unfair to him to oust him from the company and thus deprive him of his contractual expectation of dividend. Apart from the fact that no such principle has ever been recognised by the court, it is, in my opinion, unsound for the reason that it ignores the facts (1) that the risk of a reduction of capital taking place is as much an element in the bargain as the right to a preferential dividend, and (2) that the well known practice of the courts involves what (as I have endeavoured to point out) is really in accordance with sound business practice and, moreover, is based on the recognised analogy of priorities as to capital in a winding-up, viz., that, at any rate where preference shares are not entitled to participate in surplus assets, they are to be paid off first on a reduction, and references to the reasonable expectations of preference shareholders which are intended to suggest that there is something inequitable in this form of treatment, have, in my judgment, no support either in practice or on principle, and are unsound.

It is, in my opinion, important to start the consideration of the present question from this firm ground, viz., that reduction by payment off of surplus capital is a sound and desirable operation in maintaining the financial health of limited companies, and that the recognised method of effecting it, of which I have been speaking, is the one which has always received the approval of the court. The occasions which may lead a company to pay off capital are, of course, many and various. A company which has provided itself with capital for the purpose of exploiting a patent may find that the patent is valueless or that the market for its product has disappeared. Unless it proposes to embark on some other operation it will desire to disembarass itself of unwanted capital. Or a company may carry on part of its business in a foreign country and suffer the misfortune of the cancellation of its concession or the expropriation of its undertaking. It will want to repay capital thus set free and no longer required. Indeed, the shareholders will in such circumstances normally desire to be paid off, and preference shareholders would normally have resisted any proposal to pay off junior capital in priority to themselves. There appeared to be a suggestion that, owing to the fall in interest rates, preference shareholders ought now to be allowed to make a complete volte face, and to insist on remaining in the company in order that they may continue to receive their preference dividend, and that, irrespective of the question whether the company is in a position to earn it.

A In the present case the occurrence which has happened to this company is the extinction of its colliery business by nationalisation. If there had been nothing else in the case, I should have had no hesitation in holding that the preference shareholders ought to be paid off first, and would not have been entitled to object to such repayment. Indeed, I do not think that in the end the contrary was seriously suggested, but it was said, and in the judgment under appeal it was held, that the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946, s. 25, compelled the court to hold that what would be the usual method of affecting the reduction ought not to be confirmed as being unfair and inequitable. B The only alternative suggested is a pari passu reduction falling equally on the two classes of shares. No such proposal is, of course, before the court and our only power is to confirm or refuse to confirm the actual proposal. A pari passu reduction would leave the company saddled with £100,000 of 6 per cent. preference capital.

C A point was made that the voting on the resolution for reduction is no guide to the ascertainment of the real views of the preference shareholders as a class, having regard to the large proportion of these shareholders who hold an even greater quantity of ordinary shares, and that the views of the present opponents are the only sure guide, they being the only really independent preference shareholders. I do not find that this consideration is a helpful one. We are not considering whether some bargain between different classes of shareholders D is one which has been approved by business men. No such approval appears to me to be necessary. The question, so far as analysis of the voting is concerned, is whether a method of reduction which has always been regarded by the courts as fair and equitable ought to be regarded as unfair and inequitable because a particular large preference shareholder does not like it. I am particularly unimpressed by the dislike of this shareholder since in its affidavit it places no reliance on, and, indeed, makes no mention of, s. 25, but appears to complain E merely because it is being asked to accept £10 in place of a share which, by a method of highly questionable applicability, it values at £12. This method of approach was not that of counsel for the opponents who based his case on s. 25.

I have deferred too long in coming to what is really the crux of the case, and I must now examine s. 25. Unfortunately, a preliminary consideration of certain other matters is required, and in order to understand the section I F must say something about the nature of the compensation for which the Act makes provision. The compensation is made to the colliery-owning companies, not to the individual shareholders. It would not have been possible in the case of these companies to adopt the method of compensation adopted in other cases of nationalisation (e.g., that of railways) when the compensation is given not to the companies but to the shareholders and is fixed by reference to stock G exchange values. Under that type of compensation provision, the shareholder, if he holds a well secured preference share the stock exchange value of which stands at above par, can be given compensation in, e.g., government stock of an equivalent nominal value. The result of such a scheme is that, theoretically, the shareholder gets government stock of a nominal value equivalent to the stock exchange value of his investment. This, of course, applies to capital values only, and preference shareholders in such companies have been heard H to complain that the compensation received does not provide them with an income equivalent to what they previously enjoyed. The theoretical answer to this is that this is made up to them in the higher quality of the security. Now, in the case of the colliery companies it was impossible to proceed on these lines. Recourse to stock exchange values as a basis for compensation of individual shareholders was impossible for two simple reasons. A vast number of collieries were owned by private companies for whose shares there was no stock exchange quotation, and many of the larger companies which were public companies with quoted shares were carrying on composite undertakings of which their colliery interests formed only a part, with the result that there was no quotation referable to these interests alone. In the result, a special method of compensation was adopted by which a global sum was fixed to cover all the undertakings taken over, a sum which by two subsequent stages was ultimately to be divided among the various undertakings, and those undertakings themselves, as distinct from their shareholders, were to receive the compensation.

This scheme, however, opened the door to another matter of difficulty. It was obvious that in many, if not the majority of, cases, at any rate where a company's entire business consisted of working a colliery, the company would go into liquidation. The result of its so doing would be that its assets, including its share of the compensation, would be divisible in such a way that debentures would be paid off at par and preference shareholders would, in all cases where the articles so provided, receive nothing but the nominal value of their shares. Those who had invested in comparatively high yielding and well secured debentures or preference shares would obviously have had serious ground for complaint since their investments, if they had been quoted, would have been quoted well above par, while, unlike shareholders in nationalised concerns who were to be compensated on the basis of stock exchange values, they would not have received even the nominal equivalent of the capital value of their investments.

Unless these matters are well understood it is not possible to understand the purpose and effect of s. 25 of the Act. It is as follows :

(1) Provision shall be made by regulations for due regard being had, as between classes of debenture holders, or of members, or of both, of a company being an owner of transferred interests, to what their relative expectations of income yield from their respective interests in the company would have been if this Act had not been passed, and for that purpose the regulations shall provide facilities for adjusting the respective interests of such classes in the company's assets as affected by the substitution of the compensation under this Act for the transferred interests of the company so as to give effect, so far as may be, on the one hand to the said expectations and on the other hand to the rights of priority conferred on such classes respectively by the debentures and the memorandum and articles of association of the company. (2) The said provision shall include facilities for the taking effect of schemes for such adjustment if assented to within a prescribed period by such majorities as may be prescribed, on the basis of sub-s. (2) of s. 153 of the Companies Act, 1929, of the members of each of the classes concerned and either not objected to by any member of a class concerned or, if so objected to, approved by a tribunal to be established under the regulations, and in default of schemes so taking effect, for the giving of directions for such adjustment by the tribunal to be so established on application as may be prescribed of the company or of members of a class concerned.

I hope that I shall not be thought disrespectful to Parliament if I describe the provisions of this section as displaying a certain amount of amateurishness. The following points may, however, be noted : (1) as the section requires to be put into operation in the case of individual companies it cannot begin to operate until the compensation payable to the particular individual company concerned has been fixed ; (2) this, no doubt, explains why it is that no regulations have yet been made : there can be no need to make them yet ; (3) accordingly, during the period which will elapse between the vesting date and the fixing of a company's quantum of compensation—already one year and seven months—nothing can be done under the section ; (4) meanwhile, anyone who tries to forecast the manner in which the section is likely to affect individual cases is met with a double difficulty of a formidable nature : he does not know what "provision" the regulations will make since the regulations are yet to be made, and he does not know what attitude the "tribunal" will adopt or on what principles it will act ; (5) in the case of a company which goes into liquidation the administration of the section may not in practice present very great difficulties ; (6) but in the case of a company which is going to continue in existence problems of a very different character may arise : the section, though no doubt directed to meeting the contemplated case of a winding-up, is not in terms limited to such cases and it would appear to allow "adjustments" to be made in the case of companies which are to continue in existence ; (7) in such cases the nature of the problem of adjustment can be seen from the following example. If the tribunal has before it the case of a company with a share capital divided into high dividend bearing preference shares and ordinary shares, a company which in the past has been prosperous but whose future activities are not likely to produce anything like the same income as before, what sort of "adjustment" will be required? If matters are left as they are, the relative positions of the two classes of shares will be altered to the prejudice of the ordinary shareholders, and the object of an adjustment must, I would suppose, be to redress the balance in some equitable way. A preference shareholder in such a case would then find his position not maintained but worsened. How could this be done? The facilities to be provided by the regulations are

A to be "facilities for adjusting the respective interests of such classes in the company's assets." Is this to be done by empowering the tribunal (a) to direct a reduction of capital by writing down the nominal value of some particular class of share or (b) to lower the rate of dividend, or how? A system of writing down capital by such a tribunal without the safeguards for creditors provided by the reduction sections of the Companies Act would, I cannot help thinking, be an unfortunate affair. But one thing appears to me to be certain, that, on B an application to the tribunal, preference shareholders are, to say the least of it, as likely to have their interests in their company scaled down as to have them maintained at their existing level; (8) is the tribunal to have power to annul or limit the right of the company under the Companies Acts to reduce its capital the moment after the tribunal has effected a readjustment of it, or to limit in some way the power of the court to confirm a reduction?

C I may summarise my conclusions on the relevant matters under this section by saying that, in my opinion, the legislature has omitted to make clear its implications in the case of a continuing company, and has omitted to form, much less to state, any ideas on the subject of capital reduction or as to how the section is to be dovetailed into the existing statutory code and practice with regard to reductions of capital. One thing the section clearly does not do. It does not purport expressly or impliedly to limit or affect in any way the existing D provisions of the Companies Act, or the well known practice of the courts thereunder, or to lay down any new principles for the court to follow.

In the Scottish case, Wilson & Clyde Coal Co., Ltd. (1), the LORD PRESIDENT, in his dissenting judgment, said (1948 Session Notes, 43):

I admit that Parliament has not enacted a "stand still order" against interim modifications of the capital structure of the transferor companies by reductions of capital of the type here proposed.

E With this I respectfully agree, and I attach great importance to the fact, but when the LORD PRESIDENT goes on to say (ibid.):

But it may well have been thought unnecessary to do so because the courts had already been directed by Parliament to exert a controlling authority over such reductions by their discretionary power to withhold confirmation.

F I must respectfully decline to follow him. It appears to me that the legislature never thought of the matter at all: it had done so, it seems to me impossible to suppose that it would have expected a fundamental departure from existing practice to take place without making it clear that such was its intention. If the court refuses to confirm the reduction proposed, it will be condemning a living company to the fate of having to support a weight of preference capital for which it has no need, in spite of the fact that it has ample surplus funds with which to pay it off. The only end to be achieved by the adoption of this G course will be to give the preference shareholders a chance of receiving better terms at some future date from a tribunal not yet set up with powers not yet defined under regulations not yet made. As I have pointed out, as the company is to remain in business on a reduced scale, the terms which the preference shareholders will receive may well be worse than those now proposed. Yet we are told that to deprive them of what is a purely speculative chance would H involve a departure from what is fair and equitable, and that in consequence a method of reduction which has always been adopted by the courts as the proper one ought to be abandoned. It is, of course, the case that the company will not be precluded from producing some other scheme, but the only scheme which has been suggested as being fair and equitable is one providing for a pari passu reduction of both classes of shares. Such a reduction would still leave the company saddled with £100,000 of preference capital carrying a rate of dividend which in present circumstances it is not to be expected that the company will be able to earn, and in so far as the preference capital thus left does not "earn its keep " it will have to be fed at the expense of the ordinary shareholders. This does not appear to me to be fair or equitable. And what perhaps is of almost equal importance, it appears to me to be bad finance and bad business in the case of a continuing company.

My reasons for differing from the careful judgment of the DEPUTY VICE-CHANCELLOR already sufficiently appear, and I shall not, I hope, appear disrespectful if I do not deal in detail with the views which he expressed. I should say, however, that I differ from him not on a matter of discretion but on a matter of principle, i.e., as to the effect that ought to be given to the existence of s. 25 on the statute book. I must, however, add a few words with regard to the Scottish case, Wilson & Clyde Coal Co., Ltd. (1), which I have already mentioned. We were provided with transcripts of the shorthand notes of the judgments of the First Division in that case. The facts there differed in important respects from those in the present case. There, as here, it was proposed to repay the preference capital, but this was being done as a preliminary to winding-up, and the business considerations which appear to me to be important in the case of a continuing company were, accordingly, absent. The LORD PRESIDENT, who dissented, held that the preference shares under the articles would be entitled in a winding-up to share in surplus assets pari passu with the ordinary shareholders, and this by itself may well have been sufficient to justify his view that payment off of the preference shareholders in the manner proposed would not be in accordance with the rights (in a winding-up) conferred by the articles. Of the other members of the court, LORD KEITH appears to have thought that the preference shareholders had no rights in surplus assets but he seems to have regarded it as immaterial. The position of these shareholders must, he thought, be evaluated as it was at the moment, and he was influenced by the fact that it lay in the power of the ordinary shareholders to take for themselves, prior to winding-up, the funds which in a winding-up might provide the surplus assets in question. LORD KEITH also took the view that the contemplated winding-up was irrelevant, and that the case must be treated in the same way as if the company was a going concern in the ordinary way. I am not sure, with respect, whether I would agree with this, but it is in any event not relevant to the facts of the present case. LORD KEITH dealt very shortly with s. 25, holding it to be irrelevant, his reasons being that the rights conferred by the section were future rights and that the function of the court was to consider the situation as it existed at the moment. It is not for me to criticise this argument, but it will be seen that my own method of approach having regard to the facts of the present case, is on different lines. The LORD PRESIDENT, in his dissenting judgment, emphasises, and—if I may respectfully say so—rightly emphasises, the distinction between the case of a company which is a going concern and the case before him of a company admittedly on the point of liquidation. The business distinction between the two cases has, I hope, appeared from what I have said earlier in this judgment. The LORD PRESIDENT, speaking of the case before him, said: "There is no question in this case, as in earlier cases, of re-casting the company's finances in its interests as a trading entity." The ratio decidendi of his judgment may, I think, be summarised as being that in the case of a company on the verge of liquidation, where preference shareholders have (as he held) a right to share in surplus assets, it is inequitable to regard their rights as though they were rights in a going concern and to pay them off at par notwithstanding that on the approaching liquidation they may receive more than par. In the LORD PRESIDENT's remarks as to s. 25 he says that, whatever s. 25 may mean, the relative interests of the classes of shareholders might be modified, and that the "declared intention" of Parliament might be pro tanto frustrated if the preference shares were to be extinguished in the meanwhile. Speaking for myself, I have, as will have been seen, some difficulty in appreciating what the declared intention of Parliament may be. But in any event there appears to me to be all the difference in the world between the case of a company going into liquidation, defects in whose financial structure cannot possibly affect its position, and the case of a company which proposes to continue as a going concern and ought not to be hampered by defects of that character. LORD RUSSELL was in general agreement with LORD KEITH. I do not find any assistance in this decision, dealing as it does with facts of a fundamentally different character.

In the result, I am of opinion that the present appeal should be allowed and the proposed reduction confirmed, the application being otherwise in order.

ASQUITH, L.J. : I agree, and would have been content to add nothing but for the dissent of my brother EVERSHED in a judgment which I have had the advantage and pleasure of perusing. It is not in dispute that an unwanted surplus exists, and it is not in dispute that the proposed method of reducing capital is perfectly consistent with the preference shareholders' contractual rights. The sole residual question is whether the scheme is "fair." In that connection the following points seem to me important. I will preface them by observing, for reasons which will appear, that a proposal fair in itself, is none the less so because an alternative proposal might be equally fair, or might even approximate more nearly to ideal justice. It has never been laid down that before confirming a scheme under s. 55 of the Companies Act, 1929, the court must be satisfied that it is perfect. It is enough if it be "fair."

What, then, is the criterion of fairness? One test surely is whether the scheme is consistent with the reasonable expectations of a shareholder of the class in question, in the sense that it involves no more than the realisation of a risk which he knows he is assuming when he acquires shares of that class. To be paid off in full is just such a risk as the purchaser of a preference share carrying a high rate of interest knows he is incurring. He must be taken to know of s. 55 of the Companies Act. He must be taken, in my view, to know more, namely, that a prudent company will cut the mill stone of onerous prior charges or senior stocks from its neck as soon as money becomes cheaper or the company finds itself in possession of a surplus of cash not needed to carry on its business. This risk is the price the preference shareholder pays for solid advantages, namely, for what is in the present case a high, as well as a well secured, rate of fixed dividend, and a first charge on the assets in a liquidation.

The main ground urged at the Bar for challenging the fairness of the existing proposal is that the preference (like other classes of) shareholders have some sort of inchoate rights, or, at least, de facto prospects, under s. 25 of the Nationalisation Act, and that they should not be debarred from any chance of benefit, albeit speculative, which might enure to them from this source—a chance from which they would be excluded if paid off under the scheme. Nevertheless, it seems to me unjustifiable to refuse confirmation of the scheme by assuming a particular operation for a clause the actual operation of which is today unpredictable. Those who oppose the existing proposal, I think tacitly assume that the preference shareholders have a reasonable prospect of benefits under s. 25 if they can, as it were, stay the course until that section takes effect. The company however, by not paying them off, might be reserving for them not benefits but burdens. Let us assume they are not paid off. On this assumption, if a forecast of the effect of s. 25 may, notwithstanding its speculative character, be permitted, my own view would be that an "adjustment" under that section, on the facts of the case, would probably work in favour of the ordinary shareholders and to the detriment of the preference shareholders.

The tribunal (in some years' time, when the quantum of compensation for this particular business had been ascertained) would have to consider three matters: (i) what were the relative expectations of the two classes of shareholders, if there had been no nationalisation; (ii) how these relative expectations have been affected by the "substitution of compensation" for the "transferred interests"; (iii) what "adjustment" (if any) is accordingly justified or required of the respective interests of the two classes of shareholders in the assets of the company. How would this calculation be likely to work out in the case of the present company? The company in the years preceding the Nationalisation Act was earning large and steadily mounting profits—a process tending inevitably to the progressive enrichment of the ordinary shareholder relatively to the preference shareholder whose reward is static. If this trend was likely to have been maintained (and there is no ground for assuming the contrary), the ordinary shareholders were the class whose high expectations would have been dashed by the "substitution of compensation," whether in money or low yield government stocks, and any "adjustment" would be likely to be in their favour and to the relative disadvantage of the preference shareholders. I am not forgetting that the tribunal is enjoined to take into account the priority rights of the preference stock as well as the thwarted hopes of the ordinary shareholder.

It is, however, maintained that "fairness" requires the preference shareholders to be left free to enter for a lottery, which, it is conceded, may operate to their loss, and which I think would, in fact, do so, and it is suggested that a reduction of capital by £200,000 could be reconciled with their being left this freedom under an alternative method operating by a pari passu reduction of the capital of the preference and ordinary shareholders. If this were done, the preference capital and ordinary capital would each be reduced from £200,000 to £100,000, but there would still be a class of preference shareholders in being to attract the operation of s. 25 when that section came into force. If this proposal were adopted, what would be its results on the two classes of shareholders between the time of its adoption and the time, it may be many years hence, when the compensation for this company is ascertained and s. 25 takes effect? The effect would be in all probability that, during this period, the company would live largely on its reserves. These reserves are ample in the present case, but they represent the fruits of the ordinary shareholders' abstinence. It does not seem to me in the circumstances fair or reasonable, or required by s. 25, that one of two classes of shareholders should be kept alive, as it were, on oxygen hoarded by the other class, simply to enable the first named class to qualify for an "adjustment" under that section, an adjustment, moreover, which might well operate to its own detriment.

I will only add that two circumstances relied on against the proposed scheme do not impress me. The first is that the surplus in cash in this case would not have existed but for the operation of the Nationalisation Act. This is perfectly true, but it does not, in my view, create any presumption as to what is a fair way of disposing of the surplus once it has arisen. It amounts to no more than that the surplus is a neutral windfall and should not be disposed of in a way which assumes that it originated from either the merit or the fault of either class of shareholder. The proposed scheme seems to me consistent with this requirement. If the Nationalisation Act had repealed s. 55 of the Companies Act quoad coal mines, a different inference might have been justified, here and all along the line. Secondly, it was represented that it would be a hardship to pay off the 6 per cent. preference shareholder in circumstances in which he could only re-invest his money at something much below a 6 per cent. yield. But rate of interest must not be confused with yield; and the grievance in question would not attach to present holders who bought their shares well above par, and these may for all we know have been many. Leaving that consideration aside, under the suggested alternative scheme of pari passu repayment might not that half of the ordinary shareholders who had received dividends of 30 per cent. or more, nourish a more legitimate grievance if repaid at par? Would the suggested scheme be fair to them? I feel the greatest scepticism about the superior equity claimed for a pari passu repayment, but even if it were appreciably fairer, it does not follow, as I said earlier, that the existing scheme would be unfair.

While recognising fully the force of the arguments stressed by EVERSHED, L.J., in a judgment which I have had the advantage and pleasure of reading, I feel they are over-borne by the considerations indicated in the judgment of the MASTER OF THE ROLLS and in this judgment. I think this proposal should be confirmed.

EVERSHED, L.J.: In this appeal Chatterley-Whitfield Collieries, Ltd. (hereinafter called "the company") seeks confirmation by the court of a reduction of the company's capital by means of repayment to the company's preference shareholders of the whole of their paid-up capital, and cancellation of the appropriate nominal capital, on the footing that such paid-up capital is now surplus to the company's requirements.

As the name of the company implies, its business has, since its incorporation in the year 1891, been that of a colliery undertaking in Staffordshire. By virtue, therefore, of the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946 (hereinafter referred to as "the Coal Act") the company's colliery undertaking vested on Jan. 1, 1947, in the National Coal Board. The company does not, however, propose to go into liquidation. It is intended that its resources and energies should be directed to coal mining in Ireland (if the prospecting operations in that country in which the company is now engaged prove successful) and also (through a subsidiary company) to digging for clay and manufacturing drain pipes and the like in Northern Ireland. In these enterprises the ordinary shareholders desire to dispense with the company of the preference shareholders, and the support (or burden) of their capital.

A The petition having been presented to the Chancellor of the Duchy and County Palatine of Lancaster was heard by His Honour JUDGE PEEL, K.C., sitting as Deputy Vice-Chancellor, and was by him dismissed. The substantial ground of the learned judge's decision was that in all the circumstances of the case, including particularly the effect of s. 25 of the Coal Act, it was not fair and equitable to the holders of the company's preference capital that they should now be compelled to accept repayment of their preference capital and be thereby excluded from all further participation with the ordinary shareholders in the assets and fortunes of the company. B In this respect the learned judge expressly departed from the view taken by the majority of the Scottish Court of Session in the case of Wilson & Clyde Coal Co., Ltd. (1), to which I shall later refer. The main question, therefore, for the decision of this court is of the effect, in the circumstances of the present case, of the nationalisation of the coal mining industry, and especially of s. 25 of the Coal Act, on the practice and duty of C the court under s. 55 of the Companies Act, 1929. Sub-sections (1) and (2) of s. 25 of the Coal Act have already been read by the MASTER OF THE ROLLS and I need not read them again.

As already appears, the company has carried on its coal business for a considerable period of time, and during the twelve years from 1935 (for which the company's accounts have been put in evidence) it has carried on its business most successfully. During the year ended Dec. 31, 1935, the net profit (after providing for depreciation, income tax and reserves) was £31,500 odd, and an ordinary dividend was paid at the rate of 5 per cent. During the succeeding four years the average rate of ordinary dividend was just under 10 per cent. The war years were still more profitable. The ordinary dividends for the years 1945 and 1946 were 15 per cent. and 30 per cent. respectively; and the company was able to create very substantial reserves, amounting altogether (with the undistributed balance to profit and loss account) to over £400,000. It was, however (according to the petition), the Coal Act which gave rise to the surplus of capital; and it is not suggested that, apart from nationalisation, the company would have desired or thought it proper to repay any part of its paid-up capital. Paragraph 11 of the petition states:

The capital proposed to be returned . . . is in excess of the wants of the company because, by virtue of the provisions of the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946, the assets of the colliery business of the company vested in the National Coal Board on Jan. 1, 1947, with the result that the company has been deprived of and has ceased to carry on its principal business.

It should be added that the value of the assets and business transferred to the National Coal Board stood in the company's books at a figure of over £380,000. The amount of the compensation payable to the company in respect of the transfer has not yet been fixed, and it appears unlikely that it will be fixed, still less paid, for some time to come. By the terms of the Coal Act, the company is entitled to receive by way of interest for each of the two years 1947 and 1948, a gross sum of approximately £85,000, a sum calculated by reference to the company's profits for the year 1945, and sufficient of itself to provide in each year the dividend on the company's preference shares and to pay a dividend on the ordinary shares of some 36 per cent. Alternatively, these two sums would alone suffice, after providing for the preference dividend, to maintain the ordinary dividend at its pre-war rate for seven years. After 1948 the company is entitled to interest on the amount of compensation (until paid) at such rate as the Treasury may determine. I assume that such interest will be very far short of £85,000 per annum.

The authorised capital of the company originally was, and still is, £400,000, consisting, according to the company's memorandum of association, of 40,000 shares of £10 each. By art. 7 of the company's present articles of association the first 20,000, numbered 1 to 20,000 inclusive, are designated preference shares. The rights attached by the articles to these shares are: (i) the right to a cumulative preferential dividend at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, and (ii) the right in the winding-up to repayment of the capital paid up on the shares and any arrears of the preference dividend in priority to all claims on the part of the ordinary shareholders, but to no other right to participate in the company's assets. Each share (of either class) is entitled to one vote at a general meeting. It does not appear from the evidence before us when the company's shares were issued, but by 1935 all had been issued. The preference shares had then been fully paid, but £7 10s. per share only had been paid up on the ordinary shares. The balance of £2 10s. per share was paid up in the year 1939—not, as we were informed by means of any capital bonus, but in cash, the company being then in need of further capital. The company is a private company, the total number of its shareholders being 47 at the date of the special resolution for reduction of capital. I shall make some analysis of the voting upon that special resolution hereafter. For present purposes it is sufficient to say that the resolution was opposed, and the confirmation of the reduction of capital was and is opposed, by shareholders holding 6,000 preference shares but no ordinary shares.

It is conceded that by virtue of the introductory words of s. 55 of the Companies Act, 1929—"subject to confirmation by the court"—there is conferred on the court a judicial discretion, on presentation of a petition under that section, whether or not to confirm the reduction proposed; and that, if the court is to accede to the prayer of the petition, the court must be satisfied not only of the formal validity of the steps taken by the petitioner company, but also that the reduction proposed is one that is fair and equitable to the shareholders or classes of shareholders affected. It is by the exercise of this discretionary power that a minority will be protected from the oppression of a majority: see, e.g., British & American Trustee Corporation v. Couper (2), per LORD HERSCHELL, L.C., ([1894] A.C. 406). It was argued by counsel for the objecting preference shareholders that, the learned judge having exercised his discretion, the court ought not—or at least ought not in the present case—to disturb the result. But, as I follow his judgment, the learned DEPUTY VICE-CHANCELLOR based his conclusion on the following reasoning. He assumed that, apart from the effect of the Coal Act, the repayment proposed would have been in accordance with the contractual or other rights of the preference shareholders as found expressly or by implication in the company's articles of association, but that s. 25, being imperative in terms, must be taken so far to have modified those rights, or to have foreshadowed such a modification by the regulations promised by the section, that on such a petition as the present a repayment in accordance with what he took to be the strict contractual position was no longer fair and equitable to the preference shareholders. It is plain that the reasoning involved the determination as a matter of law of the effect, at any rate of s. 25 of the Coal Act. In my opinion, therefore, it is an insufficient answer to the appellants to say that the order appealed from was one made by the judge in the exercise of his discretion. The question is whether he founded his exercise on a correct view of the law. On this question I have the misfortune to have reached a different conclusion from that of my brethren; for, in my opinion, the answer to the question is in the affirmative, and I think that this appeal ought to be dismissed.

It must, in my judgment, be allowed that, if on the presentation of a petition for reduction by way of repayment of surplus capital under s. 55 the exercise of a judicial discretion is required, and if, in order to exercise that discretion favourably to the petitioning company, the judge must be satisfied (inter alia) that the method and incidence of repayment proposed is one that is fair and equitable to all classes of shareholders affected, then the essential questions must be answered in each case by reference to the relevant facts and circumstances, as proved in evidence, of that case. Considerations or rules of practice which have in the past and in other cases been regarded as determining factors one way or another would not necessarily, as it seems to me, have the same effect in a given case today if it be shown that there has been such a change of conditions or other relevant considerations as substantially affect their force and validity. There is, however, one principle to which reference has more than once been made by the courts—that where there is, or may be, a conflict between different classes of shares its solution is prima facie a matter of "business sense." If, therefore, a scheme of reduction has commended itself to those directly concerned financially, the court should accept their judgment and be extremely slow to pronounce it unfair or inequitable at the instance, e.g., of a small dissentient minority who may be seeking to exploit their nuisance value for their individual gain. Counsel for the company urged on us that this principle was applicable in the present case. Of the 47 members of the company, there were present in person or by proxy at the extraordinary general meeting which passed the special resolution in favour of the proposed reduction 30 members representing 36,217 shares out of the total of 40,000 issued, and of these, 26 shareholders representing 30,217 voted in favour of the resolution and 4 representing 6,000 shares voted against. The four opponents held only preference shares, but the majority included 20 members holding 13,034 preference shares. Not only, therefore, said counsel, was there no ordinary shareholder in opposition to the resolution, but a majority of more than 2 to 1 in value of the preference shareholders declared themselves in its favour. It is, however, necessary to examine the figures somewhat more closely. As might be expected in a private company of this character, the great majority of the members held shares of both classes; and of these the great majority again held more ordinary shares than preference. The largest shareholder, and chairman of the company, Mr. Louis Edge, of Dublin, Eire, holds 6,200 preference shares and 11,732 ordinary shares. The Prudential Assurance Company—one of the opponents to the reduction—is by an appreciable margin the next largest individual shareholder after Mr. Edge. The North of England Trustee Debenture and Assets Corporation (1940), Ltd., appears as holding in its own right 1,547 preference and 874 ordinary shares. We have not been informed of the composition and control of this corporation, but it is to be observed that it is also registered in respect of three other holdings—two of 1,000 preference and 63 ordinary shares each, and one of 1,000 preference shares alone. These three holdings are described as "re account" of Miss T. J. A. Edge, Miss D. L. Edge and Miss Jessie Edge. For the purposes of the computation the North of England etc. Corporation has been, quite properly, counted as four, and all its votes were cast (by proxy) in favour of the resolution. The North of England etc. Corporation is one of the exceptional cases (as to three of its holdings) of a holding of preference shares in excess of ordinary shares; and as to one of its holdings, it holds preference shares alone. It seems to me, however, a fair inference—which was not, as I understood it, challenged by counsel for the company when put to him in the course of the argument—that the corporation was closely associated in interest with the chairman. In any case it is hardly to be expected that the corporation's proxy in respect of its holding Re Miss Jessie Edge's account would conflict with its proxies on account of its other holdings which included ordinary shares. For the rest, with the exception of Mrs. Mary Frances Mathews (250 preference, 11 ordinary), Mr. Herbert Thomas Marsh (112 preference, 61 ordinary) and Miss Phyllis Mary Owen (300 preference only), all those who voted on the side of the majority held ordinary shares alone, or had a greater interest in ordinary shares than in preference. On the other side are the Prudential Assurance Co., Ltd., and the Yorkshire Insurance Co., Ltd., holding between them, by themselves or their nominees (for the other two opponents are such nominees) 6,000 preference shares and no ordinary.

The analysis I have made leads, in my judgment, to the conclusion that there cannot here be found a business bargain between conflicting interests which the court could safely or properly adopt as the test of the "fair and equitable" character of the scheme. If this be so, by what test ought the court to be guided? Though the case is common of preference shares having the rights attached to those in the present company, no decision has been found in the books which directly provides the answer to the question. Where the priority of the preference shares is limited to dividend rights, all shares participating rateably in a winding-up, it has been conceded that on a return of surplus capital prima facie the fair and equitable course is a return to both classes pari passu: see Re Mackenzie & Co., Ltd. (3). Counsel for the dissentient shareholders has argued with some force that it is a strange anomaly if the additional privilege of priority in a winding-up (for such, I think, it would be taken to be) resulted in existing circumstances to the disadvantage of the preference shareholders.

In the absence of direct authority, counsel for the company relied strongly on the passage in BUCKLEY ON THE COMPANIES ACTS (11th ed., at p. 120) which has already been read by the MASTER OF THE ROLLS. The passage cited had appeared in previous editions and has the authority of LORD WRENBURY himself. As regards the writing off of lost capital, I do not for myself find any difficulty in the principle suggested. A return of surplus capital is, to my mind, more doubtful. I take the passage quoted to apply to other cases than those in which by the company's constitution or regulations express provision is made for the order in which surplus capital is to be returned, and to mean, in such a case as the present, "in like manner as capital is returnable on a winding-up." On what foundation does the alleged principle rest? Where, as in the present case, the contract between the preference shareholders and the company makes no express provision in regard to the rights and obligations on a return of surplus capital, it seems to me impossible on general principles to imply a contractual term that, in the event of a surplus, preference capital shall be returned first. Apart from the general rules of construction, the effect of such an implication would be that the rights of preference shares such as those in the present case would in substance be equivalent to those of redeemable preference shares. But I am prepared to assume, following thus far the argument of counsel for the company, that it has for many years been the practice on a return of capital that preference shares with rights such as those in the present case should be paid off first, and that, generally speaking, in the past no objection has been taken to the practice by preference shareholders. If, however, the practice does not—as I think it cannot—rest on contract, it must rest on the view that, in all the circumstances of the case, such an order of return is fair and equitable. And, under what are (in retrospect) now called "normal conditions" I concede that this would be so. A 6 per cent. preference shareholder on repayment of his capital would have experienced no difficulty in finding a comparable investment for his money; and unless he were first repaid he might justly complain that the "security" for his priority in a winding-up would be diminished. In truth, under "normal conditions" such prior repayment would in the ordinary course be treated as a benefit and a privilege. It is also, no doubt, true that by popular acceptance the preference share has been clothed to some extent with the attributes of a charge. The use of such phrases as "prior stocks" and "equity," no less than the word "security" mentioned above, may be cited as illustrations. But this habit of expression is, I think, misleading and does not really accord, in my judgment, with the true contractual position of the preference shareholders in the present case.

I have already drawn attention to the fact that the shares to which preferential rights were attached by the articles were part of the original capital of the company—in fact, the first 20,000 of the company's shares—and the holders of the preference shares are, as it seems to me, prima facie entitled to regard themselves as corporators in the company's enterprise jointly with the other shareholders. It is to be remembered that the process of reduction of capital in such a case as the present involves more than the repayment to certain members of the cash equivalent of their shares, like the repayment to a chargee of the sum secured by his charge. It involves also the cancellation of a proportionate part of the company's nominal capital with whatever are the rights attached thereto by the company's constitution and regulations. It does not seem to me, as a matter of principle, right that ordinary shareholders should be entitled, because of the interest rates subsisting at the time, to treat preference shareholders as a "burden" comparable to holders of debentures and (to borrow the language of the LORD PRESIDENT in the Scottish case) to "cut them out" as soon as the company has accumulated sufficient funds for the purpose. Nor did counsel justify on this ground the practice he sought to apply. Such a conception appears to me indeed to conflict with the principle in BUCKLEY on which counsel founded his argument; for if, as a matter of business sense and expectation, the right of a company or of its ordinary shareholders, if a surplus of capital arises, is to disembarass themselves of capital conferring a burdensome rate of interest, the question of priority in a winding-up cannot, to my mind, provide the determining, still less the sole, test of the order of repayment; or, if it does provide the test, then the rate of the preferential dividend and the question whether it is cumulative or non-cumulative would appear prima facie to be irrelevant. Without multiplying illustrations, one may ask what on such a view of the case would be the right order of repayment out of surplus capital between ordinary and preference shareholders (a) if the rights of the preference shareholders were to priority in a winding-up and to a non-cumulative preferential dividend of 4 per cent., and (b) if the rights of the preference shareholders were to 10 per cent. cumulative preference and also to participating dividends, and to no priority in a winding-up? The claims of business prudence and financial orthodoxy are no doubt attractive, but they cannot over-reach the company's obligations.

Whether or not I have rightly assumed its basis, I am content to assume nevertheless that under normal conditions the practice to which I have referred will prima facie be applied, and that the holders of preference shares will expect it to be applied. Conditions today are notoriously abnormal. It is common knowledge that a 6 per cent. preference shareholder who receives back his capital would have the utmost difficulty in finding any comparable investment for his money. The dissentient shareholders in the present case regard it as far from advantageous to be repaid their capital and to be expelled from the company; and the argument that, if there be a rateable repayment, their unpaid balance will be less well secured rings somewhat hollow in their ears. The truth is that the "business" interests of the ordinary and the preference shareholders have come into conflict, and a satisfactory "business" solution has not been found. For myself, therefore, if it be true that the exercise of a judicial discretion involves consideration of the circumstances of each case, I think the argument against treating the rule indicated in BUCKLEY as rigid and sacrosanct to be somewhat formidable. But I will even assume that long usage has, as it were, given to preference shares a characteristic now generally understood and accepted which will prevail even against such severe, if temporary, monetary changes as those experienced today. There still remains s. 25 of the Coal Act.

The language of the two sub-sections which have been quoted is not, it must be confessed, easy to follow. As I construe his judgment, the learned judge below interpreted the section as intended, or intended primarily, to provide for preference shareholders some protection against, or compensation for, the hardship with which I have just dealt arising out of existing monetary conditions. It has been pointed out in argument that the terms of the section are clearly not limited in favour only of one class of share—or debenture—holder. The result of nationalisation in the present case seems indeed likely in the light, at any rate, of the experience of the last ten years or so to occasion some disappointment, in the way of dividend rates, to the ordinary shareholders. On the other hand, the transfer of this company's colliery, by creating a surplus of capital, has, on the basis of previous usage and without regard to s. 25, destroyed the preference shareholders' expectations of a continuance of their investment. It is true that, so far, the contemplated regulations have not been made. Nevertheless, the section is in terms imperative and appears to apply to every company the assets of which are "transferred" under the Act. I cannot, therefore, regard difficulties of interpretation of the section any more than the absence, so far, of any regulations, or the fact that the regulations when published must lie before Parliament for forty days, as sufficient grounds for treating the section or its effect as wholly speculative and irrelevant.

Section 25, as it seems to me, recognises that the result of the nationalisation of the coal industry may in any given case be a real interference one way or another with the contractual and other relationships inter se of (inter alia) different classes of shares, both when the company affected is a going concern and in its winding-up, and shows, at least, that in the view of Parliament, unless there is some adjustment of the relationship, injustice may result. Different classes of shareholder joining together in an industrial enterprise did so in the hope and belief that the priority claims of one would not be irreconcilable with the high expectations of the other. Section 25 appears to recognise that this foundation to their joint enterprise may be disturbed, and directs affirmatively in each case that by appropriate concessions and adjustments one class shall not be over-ridden by the other. Put otherwise, if the previous practice rests (as has been the gist of the argument before us) solely on the basis of the priority in winding-up, that basis is one of the matters in respect of which by the terms of the section it is directed that adjustment may be made. Parliament having so directed, it seems to me impossible for the court, in a case where the proposed repayment of capital is shown to be the direct consequence of the Act, itself to decide what is fair and reasonable in disregard of the very matters which Parliament has said requires adjustment and proposes to adjust. Further, if the preference shareholders' grievance in regard to loss of income could be neglected in the absence of s. 25, that section seems at least to say that such loss of income is one of the matters relevant for consideration.

I cannot for myself see that there is any significance in the fact that no reference is found in s. 25 of the Coal Act to s. 55 of the Companies Act, 1929. Any such reference would, to my mind, be inappropriate. The power and discretion of the court under s. 55 remain undiminished. The effect of s. 25 is merely to introduce, in any case to which that section applies, new considerations material to the exercise of the court's discretion on a reduction of capital. It does so by saying that the contractual and other rights attached to different classes of shares by the company's memorandum and articles are no longer conclusive. The court is not, to my mind, entitled to complain because the exercise of its discretion is thereby rendered more difficult or because a "business bargain" which has hitherto been regarded as a matter of course is no longer treated as universally acceptable.

In the circumstances of the present case, therefore, I agree with the learned judge in thinking that it is not fair and equitable that the ordinary shareholders should, as it were, forestall the Coal Act, and should "cut out" the preference shares as if the present case were a "normal" case of repayment of capital of twenty years ago. For that at least is the one thing that it is not.

Without repeating the various matters to which I have earlier referred, I have in the present case particularly in mind the present financial position and the immediate future prospects of the company as shown by its exhibited accounts as well as the circumstances which have given rise to the present application. I have in mind that only nine years ago this 57 year-old company required and obtained from its ordinary shareholders £50,000 of additional capital. It is not, in fact, intended to wind-up the company and determine the company's enterprise. There is plainly no present risk of loss of "security" for the preference shareholders, and, as I interpret the voting, there is no such business bargain as the court ought to affirm.

Nor is it shown to my satisfaction on the evidence that the company, as distinct from its ordinary shareholders, will benefit in any appreciable way from the proposed reduction or will be exposed to any appreciable risk of damage if such reduction is not confirmed. According to counsel for the company, the presence of the two objectors as shareholders on the register will deprive the company of certain privileges in regard to the publication of accounts—which it would otherwise have as a private company under the Companies Act, 1948—and will cause embarrassment, because the company's chairman and its auditor happen to be professional partners. But these somewhat oblique benefits are not sufficient, in my judgment, to affect the balance of fairness with which we are concerned. Counsel further pointed out that, if the proposed reduction were not confirmed, the company would, apart from the waste of costs already occurred, be in great difficulty in knowing what steps should now be taken. This difficulty is, no doubt, real. But it is one which must afflict every company whose proposals for a reduction of capital the court declines to confirm.

The function of the court is to say, aye or no, whether a specific proposal for reduction satisfies the test, and not to formulate of its own motion what in its judgment would be fair and reasonable. No doubt, in practice a decision that a particular proposal is not fair and reasonable postulates the existence in the mind of the court of something that, by contrast, is. There can, of course, be no question under s. 55 of the Companies Act, 1929, of the payment of any premium to the shareholders to be repaid, and counsel for the dissentient shareholders repudiated any such suggestion on his part or on the part of those whom he represents. A proposal for reduction which can fairly be described as a "business bargain" between the classes of members affected will, as I have said, normally be accepted as fair and equitable by the court. If it be necessary or desirable to express any opinion on the matter, for my part I think that in the existing circumstances a repayment which was rateable among both classes of shareholders, and which, therefore, preserved as between them any right to adjustment under s. 25 of the Coal Act, would prima facie be fair and equitable; but I must not be taken to be pronouncing in advance on this or on any other mode of reduction, still less to be excluding any scheme which might in practice be found to satisfy the test of "business sense."

- A As regards the Scottish case, Wilsons & Clyde Coal Co., Ltd. (1), it is to be observed that in certain material respects the facts differed from those in the present case. In the view of the LORD PRESIDENT (whose opinion differed from those of LORD KEITH and LORD RUSSELL) it being of the essence of the matter that the company was moribund with one foot in the grave, the 7 per cent. preference stockholders were on the true construction of the articles entitled in a winding-up to participate pari passu with the ordinary shareholders. If B his view in this respect be right, then having regard to the fact that 71 preference stockholders representing 45 per cent. of the whole issue opposed the reduction, I respectfully share the LORD PRESIDENT's difficulty "in figuring circumstances in which it will ever be worth invoking it" (i.e., the discretionary power to refuse confirmation) "again." LORD KEITH took a different view of the rights of the preference stockholders on a winding-up; and both he and C LORD RUSSELL drew attention to the significant provisions of art. 139 empowering the directors to use the reserve fund "for making provision for paying off the preference share capital." But as I read their opinions, both LORD KEITH and LORD RUSSELL based their conclusions not so much on the special terms of the articles, but rather on the fact that, however imminent the winding-up, the company was in fact still a going concern, and on the further general ground that D so long as the company remained a going concern (in the language of LORD KEITH) "the ordinary expectation and practice is that the prior ranking shares shall be paid off first" and that the preference stockholders must be taken to have contracted on that basis. Thus both LORD KEITH and LORD RUSSELL regarded consideration of the position on a winding-up and of the application of s. 25 of the Coal Act as future questions, which were wholly irrelevant. With the greatest respect to those learned judges, I am unable to share their view. In E so far as the matter is one of contract I have already given my reasons for thinking that in such a case as the present no such term can properly be implied into the contract between the preference shareholder and the company. And although such a reduction as is here proposed is no doubt supported by long usage, I think that the application of the practice must be limited to cases where the circumstances are comparable to those which gave rise to the practice and fairly justify it and ought not in other cases to be allowed to F render futile the proper exercise of a judicial discretion. Both LORD KEITH and LORD RUSSELL placed some reliance on the powers of the ordinary shareholders, so long as the company remained a going concern, to appropriate to themselves the undistributed reserves by the declaration of large dividends or the creation of bonuses. It seems to me that these arguments do not really avail the ordinary stockholders. Apart from the practical considerations to which the LORD PRESIDENT drew attention, the effect of such operations would G in the first place absorb the means of making any capital return; and secondly would be ineffective to disturb the rights of the preference shareholders to priority in respect of dividend and, in a winding-up, in respect of capital.

For the reasons which I have given I think that the learned DEPUTY VICE-CHANCELLOR rightly refused to confirm the reduction of capital proposed, and I, accordingly, would dismiss the appeal.

JOBBINS v. MIDDLESEX COUNTY COUNCIL.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Scott, Cohen and Wrottesley, L.JJ.), July 20, 21, 22, 1948.]

Local Government—Superannuation—Amount of allowance—Area public assistance officer acting also as interim superintendent registrar of births and deaths—Inclusion of fees as registrar in calculation of average remuneration—Calculation to be based on gross fees—Local Government Superannuation Act, 1937 (c. 68), ss. 8 (5) (c); 40 (1), (3).

Statutes—Construction—Right conferred by main enacting sections of Act—Effect of provision in interpretation section.

The Local Government Superannuation Act, 1937, s. 8 provides: "(1) Subject to the provisions of this Act, a contributory employee of an employing authority shall be entitled, on ceasing to be employed by them, to receive an annual superannuation allowance if he . . . (b) has attained the age of 60 years and completed 40 years' service . . . (2) The superannuation allowance to be made to a contributory employee under this part of this Act shall be on the following scale, that is to say: (a) in respect of every completed year of contributing service, one sixtieth of his average remuneration . . . (5) For the purposes of this section, the average remuneration of a contributory employee means the annual average of the remuneration received by him in respect of service rendered during the 5 years immediately preceding the day on which he ceases to hold his employment, or the day on which he attains the age of 65 years, whichever is the earlier: Provided that . . . (c) if a contributory employee in the whole-time employment of a single local authority becomes a contributory employee in the part-time employment of each of two or more authorities, then, if his remuneration in his whole-time employment becomes material for the purpose of calculating the superannuation allowance payable to him on his ceasing to hold one of his part-time employments, that remuneration shall for the purposes of the calculation be treated as attributable to those part-time employments and shall be apportioned between them." By s. 40, the interpretation section, sub-s. (1) provides: "'remuneration' means all salary, wages, fees, poundage and other payments paid or made to an employee as such for his own use, and includes the money value of any apartments, rations or other allowances in kind appertaining to his employment, but does not include payments for overtime, or any allowance paid to him to cover cost of office accommodation or clerks' assistance, or any travelling or subsistence allowance or other moneys to be spent, or to cover expenses incurred by him, for the purposes of his employment . . . 'service' means service rendered to any local authority . . . but does not include service in any employment if the person in question has already become entitled in respect of that service in that employment to a superannuation allowance under this or any other Act." By s. 40 (3): "Where an employee holds under a local authority two or more separate employments of such a nature that he can cease to hold one without ceasing to hold the other or others, the provisions of this Act shall, unless the context otherwise requires, apply as respects him in relation to each of those separate employments as if the other or others were an employment or employments held by him under another authority."

From Apr. 30, 1938, to June 30, 1940, an area public assistance officer of a county council was also an interim superintendent registrar of births and deaths. He was a "contributory employee," within the meaning of the Local Government Superannuation Act, 1937, as defined in s. 3 of the Act, in respect of his post as an area officer, and as such was bound to contribute to, and entitled to participate in, the council's superannuation fund, and it was accepted that he was also a contributory employee of the council in respect of his office as interim superintendent registrar. On Nov. 2, 1943, he retired from the post of area officer and became entitled to a superannuation allowance, under s. 8 (1) (b) of the Act. He claimed that for the purpose of computing his average remuneration during the 5 years immediately preceding his retirement in 1943, on which computation the amount of the superannuation allowance depended, his remuneration in respect of his office as interim superintendent registrar should be taken into account. The council contended that, by reason of ss. 8 (5) (c) and 40 (3) of the Act, the officer's remuneration as interim superintendent registrar should not be included in the computation of the allowance to which he became entitled on ceasing to be employed as area officer :

HELD : (i) on the true construction of the Act of 1937, the officer was entitled to have his remuneration as superintendent registrar of births and deaths taken into account in ascertaining his average remuneration under s. 8 (5).

(ii) on the true construction of the definition of "remuneration" in s. 40 (1) of the Act, the gross fees received by the officer as superintendent registrar were to be taken into account in calculating the superannuation allowance payable to him, and not those fees less expenditure incurred by him in the performance of his duties.

(iii) A definition section ought not to be construed as cutting down or modifying the main enacting sections of an Act unless it contains clear language to that effect.

D APPEAL by the applicant from a judgment of the Divisional Court, dated Nov. 10, 1947, on a Special Case stated by the Minister of Health under the Local Government Superannuation Act, 1937, s. 35.

The applicant, being dissatisfied with a decision of the Middlesex County Council that, in calculating the amount of the superannuation allowance payable to him under the Local Government Superannuation Act, 1937, on his ceasing to be employed by the council as area public assistance officer, no account could be taken of any fees received by him in respect of his office as interim superintendent registrar of births and deaths for the district of Willesden, referred the matter to the Minister of Health who stated a Case. The Divisional Court confirmed the decision of the county council. The applicant appealed, and the Court of Appeal now allowed his appeal. The facts and the relevant sections of the Act appear in the judgment of COHEN, L.J.

F The questions submitted by the Special Case were : (i) Whether, for the purpose of calculating, under s. 8 (2) of the Act of 1937, the amount of the superannuation allowance payable to the applicant on his ceasing to be employed by the Middlesex County Council as area officer, it was incumbent on the council to include in his average remuneration, as defined by s. 8 (5) of that Act, certain fees received by him as interim superintendent registrar of births and deaths in so far as such fees were remuneration as defined by s. 40 of the Act ? (ii)

G If the answer to the preceding question were in the affirmative, whether there should be taken into account as such remuneration (a) the gross fees received by the applicant, or (b) those fees less any expenditure incurred by the applicant in the performance of the duties of that appointment, as, for example, the salary paid by him to his deputy.

The applicant appeared in person.

SCOTT, L.J. : I will ask COHEN, L.J., to deliver the first judgment.

COHEN, L.J. : This is an appeal from a decision of the Divisional Court relating to the superannuation allowance payable to the applicant on his ceasing to be employed by the Middlesex County Council in the capacity of area officer. The appeal raises a difficult question of construction of the Local Government Superannuation Act, 1937. Before us the applicant has appeared in person. The difficulties, under which the applicant, appearing in person to argue difficult questions of construction, must necessarily labour, might have been serious, had it not been for the assistance both he and the court have received from counsel for the council, to whose presentation of the case and clear statement of the possible interpretations of an extremely difficult Act we are much indebted.

The facts are fully set forth in paras. 1 and 2 of the Case. Paragraph 1 is :

On Feb. 29, 1944, Mr. H. W. Jobbins (hereinafter called "the applicant") being dissatisfied with a decision of the Middlesex County Council (hereinafter called "the council") that, in calculating the amount of the superannuation allowance payable to him under the Local Government Superannuation Act, 1937 (hereinafter called "the Act of 1937") on his ceasing to be employed by the council as area officer, no account could be taken of any fees received by him in respect of his office as interim superintendent registrar of births and deaths for the registration district of Willesden, referred the matter to the Minister of Health (hereinafter called "the Minister") for his determination under s. 35 of the Act of 1937 and requested the Minister to state a Case under the provisions of that section for the opinion of the court.

Paragraph 2 is :

The following facts are agreed between the parties :—(a) The applicant was, immediately before the coming into operation of the Local Government Act, 1929 (hereinafter called "the Act of 1929") employed by the Willesden Board of Guardians as their deputy clerk and as such officer he was required to make contributions for superannuation purposes under the Poor Law Officers' Superannuation Act, 1896 (hereinafter called "the Act of 1896"). (b) Under the operation of s. 119 of the Act of 1929 the applicant was, on Apr. 1, 1930, transferred to and became an officer of the council. (c) The applicant exercised the option given to him by s. 124 of the Act of 1929 of remaining subject to the provisions of the Act of 1896. (d) The applicant was employed by the council from the date of his transfer to them as aforesaid until Mar. 31, 1935, as local public assistance officer. He was then notified by the council that he had been appointed area officer with additional duties of a general county nature as from Apr. 1, 1935, and he continued to be employed in that capacity until Nov. 2, 1943. On the last mentioned date the applicant retired from his appointment as area officer, having attained the age of 60 years on the previous day, and has not since held any office or employment under the council. (e) In addition to his employment as deputy clerk under the Willesden Board of Guardians, and subsequently under the council first as local public assistance officer and subsequently as area officer, the applicant held the office of deputy superintendent registrar of births and deaths for the Willesden Registration District, to which he was appointed and in which he was paid by the superintendent registrar, from Jan. 1, 1914, to Apr. 30, 1936. In respect of that office, however, the applicant was not subject to the provisions of the Act of 1896, nor was he transferred to the service of the council under the Act of 1929. (f) On Apr. 30, 1938, the superintendent registrar of births and deaths for the Willesden Registration District died, whereupon the applicant became interim superintendent registrar of births and deaths for the said district by virtue of the provisions of the Births and Deaths Registration Act, 1874, s. 25, and was accordingly required by law to perform all the duties and to be subject to all the obligations, including the obligation to appoint a deputy superintendent registrar of births and deaths. The applicant continued to hold that appointment, in which he was remunerated by fees, until June 30, 1940, when another person was appointed superintendent registrar of births and deaths. (g) On the applicant becoming interim superintendent registrar as aforesaid he submitted that he was a superintendent registrar within the definition of "officer" in the Act of 1896 and claimed that contributions should be made by him under that Act in respect of the fees received as interim superintendent registrar. The council, after consideration, having finally come to the conclusion that this contention was incorrect, notified the applicant accordingly, and in these circumstances contributions which had been made by the applicant under the Act of 1896 in respect of his appointment as interim superintendent registrar were returned to him in May, 1939. (h) On Apr. 1, 1939, the Act of 1937 came into operation and applied as from that date to the council. The Act of 1896 ceased to apply to the applicant by virtue of s. 32 of the Act of 1937, under ss. 3 (1) and 3 (2) (a) of which the applicant became a contributory employee of the council in respect of his office as area officer. The council did not regard the applicant as a contributory employee in respect of his employment as interim superintendent registrar of births and deaths and contributions were accordingly not made by the applicant in respect of that appointment. In view, however, of the subsequent decision given by the court in June, 1945, in the case of Algar v. Middlesex County Council (1) the applicant should, as from Apr. 1, 1939, have been treated as a contributory employee under ss. 3 (1) and 3 (2) (d) of the Act of 1937 in respect of his said appointment. (i) On Nov. 2, 1943, the applicant, having attained the age of 60 years, ceased to be employed by the council as area officer, and the council thereupon proceeded to assess the amount of the superannuation allowance payable to him under the Act of 1937. The council's decision on this matter, which is referred to in para. 1 of this Case, was communicated to the applicant on Dec. 17, 1943.

I will state shortly the applicant's history and, while doing so, briefly refer to the various statutory provisions which affect his position before the coming into force of the Act of 1937. He retired in 1943, at which date he had been for over 40 years in the service of the Middlesex County Council or its predecessors. In 1930, as a result of the passing of the Local Government Act, 1929, he became transferred poor law officer of the Middlesex County Council, and he elected to remain, so far as pension rights were concerned, under the Poor Law Officers' Superannuation Act, 1896. There was no dispute that he was employed as an officer within the meaning of that Act and would have been entitled to a pension had he ceased to be so employed. At that time he was also deputy superintendent registrar of births and deaths for the Willesden Registration District, having been appointed to that position by the superintendent registrar pursuant to the provisions of the Births and Deaths Registration Act, 1874, s. 24. As such he would not have been entitled to any superannuation rights at that time, but on Apr. 30, 1938, the then superintendent registrar of births and deaths for the Willesden Registration District died and thereupon the applicant became interim superintendent registrar pursuant to the express provisions of the Births and Deaths Registration Act, 1874, s. 25. I pause here to say that in that capacity it is admitted that, when the Act of 1937 came into force, he was a registration officer and became entitled to superannuation rights. When I say "it is admitted," I mean it was admitted in the court below, because counsel for the council was bound so to admit by reason of a decision of the court in Algar v. Middlesex County Council (1). Before us counsel for the council preferred to argue the case on the basis that Algar's case (1) was rightly decided, though he was not prepared to admit that it was rightly decided or debar himself from taking the point again should a similar point arise in some other litigation.

In 1937 the Act we have to construe, the Local Government Superannuation Act, 1937, was passed, but it did not come into operation until Apr. 1, 1939. Under that Act the applicant was no longer able to elect to remain bound by the Act of 1896, for under s. 32 of the Act of 1937 it was provided that :

... as from the appointed day [viz., Apr. 1, 1939] (a) the Poor Law Officers' Superannuation Act, 1896, shall cease to apply to any transferred poor law employee or transferred rating employee.

There is no dispute that, from the date of the passing of that Act, the applicant came within the ambit of the Act both in his capacity as area officer and in his capacity as interim registration officer. He continued to act as interim registration officer until a new registration officer was appointed on June 30, 1940, and thereafter he remained in the service of the Middlesex County Council as area officer until he retired on Nov. 2, 1943. On those facts the Divisional Court held in answer to the first question submitted to them that, for the purpose of calculating under s. 8 (2) of the Act of 1937 the amount of the superannuation allowance payable to the applicant on his ceasing to be employed by the council as an area officer, it was not incumbent on the council :

... to include in his average remuneration, as defined by s. 8 (5) of that Act, the fees received by him as interim superintendent registrar of births and deaths in so far as such fees are remuneration as defined by s. 40 of that Act.

Before I refer to the judgment in detail, it will be convenient to go through the relevant provisions of the Act of 1937. Section 1 imposes on local authorities and other bodies mentioned in the section, the obligation to establish a superannuation fund. Section 3 (1) provides as follows :

On and after the appointed day all such persons as are mentioned in the next succeeding sub-section shall, subject to the provisions of this section and to the provisions of Part III of this Act relating to officers appointed in a temporary capacity, be entitled to participate in the benefits of the appropriate superannuation fund maintained under this part of this Act, and persons so entitled shall, unless they are such persons as are mentioned in the proviso to s. 6 (1) of this Act, contribute to that fund in accordance with the provisions of that section.

I pause to say that no one has suggested that the provisions relating to officers employed in a temporary capacity (referred to above) have any bearing on the question we have to decide and that the proviso to s. 6 (1) is also irrelevant to the case before us. Then [at the end of s. 3 (1)] comes this provision :

In this Act, the expression "contributory employee" means a person who is for the time being entitled to participate in the benefits of such a superannuation fund, notwithstanding that he may be such a person as is mentioned in the said proviso.

Section 3 (2) provides :

The persons referred to in the preceding sub-section are (a) every whole-time officer of a local authority specified in Part I of sched. I to this Act who are not a local Act authority.

It is admitted that the applicant is a whole-time officer within the meaning of that provision. Sub-paragraphs (d) and (e) of s. 3 (2) are in these terms :

(d) every registration officer acting in or for a district in relation to which registration functions are discharged by a local authority who are not a local Act authority ; (e) in the circumstances mentioned in Part I of sched. II to this Act, a transferred poor law employee in the employment of a local authority who are not a local Act authority and a transferred rating employee in such employment.

There is no dispute that the applicant is a "contributory employee" within the meaning of one or more of those definitions. Section 6 provides what contributions are to be made to the appropriate superannuation fund. Nothing turns on its terms. Section 8, which is the vital section we have to construe, deals with : "Eligibility for superannuation allowance, and scale of allowances." Sub-section (1) is :

Subject to the provisions of this Act, a contributory employee of an employing authority shall be entitled, on ceasing to be employed by them, to receive an annual superannuation allowance if he either (a) has completed 10 years' service and is incapable of discharging efficiently the duties of his employment by reason of permanent ill-health or infirmity of mind or body ; or (b) has attained the age of 60 years and completed 40 years' service ; or (c) has attained the age of 65 years and completed 10 years' service.

The applicant retired under (b) because he had attained the age of 60 and completed 40 years' service. Sub-section (2) deals with the allowances to be made and is in these terms :

The superannuation allowance to be made to a contributory employee under this Part of this Act shall be on the following scale, that is to say : (a) in respect of every completed year of contributing service, one sixtieth of his average remuneration ; (b) in respect of every year of non-contributing service, one one-hundred-and-twentieth of his average remuneration . . .

Then come two provisos with which I need not trouble. Sub-section (3) provides :

No superannuation allowance under this part of this Act shall exceed two-thirds of the employee's average remuneration.

Sub-section (4), I think, is irrelevant. Sub-section (5) is :

For the purposes of this section, the average remuneration of a contributory employee means the annual average of the remuneration received by him in respect of service rendered during the 5 years immediately preceding the day on which he ceases to hold his employment or the day on which he attains the age of 65 years, whichever is the earlier : Provided that . . . (c) if a contributory employee in the whole-time employment of a single local authority becomes a contributory employee in the part-time employment of each of two or more authorities, then, if his remuneration in his whole-time employment becomes material for the purpose of calculating the superannuation allowance payable to him on his ceasing to hold one of his part-time employments, that remuneration shall for the purposes of the calculation be treated as attributable to those part-time employments and shall be apportioned between them.

Sub-section (6) provides :

For the purposes of sub-s. (1) of this section, an employee's service shall be calculated by aggregating all periods of service.

Sub-section (7) provides :

For the purpose of sub-s. (2) of this section (a) an employee's contributing service shall be calculated by aggregating all periods of such service ; (b) his non-contributing service shall be calculated by deducting from his service, calculated in accordance with the last preceding sub-section, all completed years of contributing service ; and

(c) if his non-contributing service as so calculated includes a fraction of a year, that fraction shall, if it amounts to or exceeds 6 months, be treated as a year, and in any other case be disregarded.

Section 10 (1) is :

A contributory employee of an employing authority who, before becoming entitled to a superannuation allowance under this part of this Act, ceases to be employed by that authority for any reason other than his voluntary resignation, or his resignation or dismissal in consequence of inefficiency or an offence of a fraudulent character or misconduct, shall be entitled to receive out of the appropriate superannuation fund a sum equal to the aggregate amount of his contributions to the fund, together with compound interest thereon, calculated to the date on which he ceased to hold his employment at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum with half-yearly rests.

Section 10 (6) is :

Notwithstanding anything in the foregoing provisions of this section, no payment shall be made thereunder to an employee of a local authority who leaves their employment in order to enter the employment of another local authority in such circumstances that a transfer value is payable in respect of him under the relevant provisions of pt. III of this Act.

Section 12, which deals with "Reckoning of service," provides :

(1) A contributory employee shall be entitled to reckon as contributing service, in relation to the employment in respect of which he is a contributory employee—(a) service in respect of which he was required to contribute to the appropriate superannuation fund ; (b) in the case of a person who became a contributory employee on the appointed day, any service which immediately before that day he was entitled to reckon as contributing service for the purposes of the Act of 1922 in relation to his said employment ; and (c) any other service which, by virtue of any of the provisions of this Act, or of any regulations made thereunder, is to be reckoned as contributing service : Provided that, subject to the provisions of this Act, a contributory employee shall not be entitled to reckon as contributing service any service in respect of which he has received a return of contributions under this Act or under the Act of 1922. (2) A contributory employee of a local authority shall be entitled to reckon as non-contributing service any service which he is not entitled to reckon as contributing service . . . (5) For the purpose of calculating the superannuation allowance of a contributory employee employed whole-time in a single employment who has formerly served as a part-time employee, the period of part-time service shall be treated as though it were whole-time service for a proportionately reduced period.

Section 27 provides :

(1) Every registration officer shall be deemed, for the purposes of this Act and of any local Act scheme, to be an officer in the employment of the local authority discharging registration functions in relation to the district in or for which the officer acts : Provided that nothing in this Act shall affect any power of the Registrar-General to remove a registration officer from office. (2) The provisions of Part IV of sched. II to this Act shall have effect with respect to such registration officers as are therein mentioned.

Section 32, to which I have already referred, provides for the Act of 1896 ceasing to apply to transferred employees. Section 35 provides for the reference of any dispute as to pension between employees and employers to the Minister of Health and contains a proviso :

Provided that the Minister may at any stage of the proceedings on the reference to him, and shall, if so directed by the High Court, state in the form of a Special Case for the opinion of the High Court any question of law arising in those proceedings.

It is under that power that the Special Case was referred to the Divisional Court. I now come to the next important section in this Act, the interpretation section, s. 40. The opening words of sub-s. (1) are : " In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires," and I now refer to the relevant definitions. The first is "appointed day," which was Apr. 1, 1939. Then :

... "contributing service" in relation to any person means service which he is entitled to reckon as contributing service in accordance with the provisions of s. 12 of this Act ; "contributing employee" has the meaning assigned to it by s. 3 of this Act.

"Local authority" includes county councils among other bodies. Then :

... "non-contributing service" in relation to any person means service which he is entitled to reckon as non-contributing service in accordance with the provisions of s. 12 of this Act.

Then "officer" is defined in terms which clearly show that the applicant in his character of area officer was included. "Registration officer" is defined in these words:

... "registration officer" means a superintendent registrar or registrar of births and deaths, and includes a registrar of births and deaths exercising any of the functions of a registrar of marriages and a person appointed by a local authority to act as a deputy superintendent registrar or deputy registrar of births and deaths.

As I have said, having regard to the decision in Algar's case (1) it is not denied in this court that the applicant is a registration officer within the meaning of this Act. Then come the definition of "remuneration," "service," and "whole-time officer":

... "remuneration" means all salary, wages, fees, poundage and other payments paid or made to an employee as such for his own use, and includes the money value of any apartments, rations or other allowances in kind appertaining to his employment, but does not include payments for overtime, or any allowance paid to him to cover cost of office accommodation or clerks' assistance, or any travelling or subsistence allowance or other moneys to be spent, or to cover expenses incurred by him, for the purposes of his employment ... "service" means service rendered to any local authority after attaining the age of 18 years and before attaining the age of 65 years, and includes, in the case of a contributory employee who first became subject to provision for superannuation on the appointed day and had then attained the age of 65 years, service rendered after attaining that age and before the appointed day, but does not include service in any employment if the person in question has already become entitled in respect of that service in that employment to a superannuation allowance under this or any other Act ... "whole-time officer" means, in relation to any local authority, an officer who devotes substantially the whole of his time to their employment, and includes an officer who is employed by them for a part only of his time but devotes substantially the whole of the rest of his time to employment by one or more other local authorities.

I think that counsel for the council agreed, having regard to that definition, that the applicant was at all times a whole-time officer within the meaning of that definition. Section 40 (2) provides:

Unless the context otherwise requires, reference in this Act to employees of a local authority include references to persons who are deemed for the purposes of this Act to be in the employment of the authority, and other provisions relating to employment by or under a local authority shall be construed accordingly.

Then comes s. 40 (3) on which the Divisional Court based its judgment. It is in these terms:

Where an employee holds under a local authority two or more separate employments of such a nature that he can cease to hold one without ceasing to hold the other or others, the provisions of this Act shall, unless the context otherwise requires, apply as respects him in relation to each of those separate employments as if the other or others were an employment or employments held by him under another authority.

I turn now to the schedules. Schedule I is not material except in so far as the Middlesex County Council is made thereunder a local authority whose whole-time officers are "to be compulsorily superannuable." Schedule II deals in pt. I, para. 2, with the transfer of poor law employees and says:

A transferred poor law employee who (a) was on the appointed day in the employment of a local authority and, having remained subject to the Act of 1896 by virtue of the Act of 1929, was immediately before that day still subject to the Act of 1896 ... shall, by virtue of this paragraph, become a contributory employee on the appointed day ...

The only other provision to which I need refer is contained in sched. II, pt. IV, which deals with registration officers. Paragraph 1 is:

The following provisions of this part of this schedule shall, in lieu of any other provisions of this Act or of any local Act scheme (including any definition of "service" contained in this Act or in the scheme), have effect with respect to the reckoning of service rendered as a registration officer before the appointed day by a registration officer who (a) was first appointed as such after Mar. 31, 1930, and before the appointed day ... and who ... either is in office as a registration officer on the appointed day, or, having ceased to hold office before the appointed day is, on or after the appointed day and within 12 months from the date on which he so ceased, re-appointed as a registration officer.

The applicant is such a registration officer, because he was first appointed in the sense that he succeeded by reason of the death of the then superintendent registrar after Mar. 31, 1930, and before the appointed day, and he was still in office at the appointed day. That being so, para. 3 of sched. II, pt. IV, applies :

A For the purposes of Part I of this Act and of any local Act scheme . . . (b) . . . account shall be taken of any such service in such manner and subject to such terms and conditions, including conditions as to the making of payments by an employee or a local authority, as may be prescribed.

B Regulations were prescribed under para. 2 (b) of sched. II, pt. IV. They contain nothing in any material way affecting the question we have to decide, but I ought to mention, in order to place it on record, that, by the Local Government Superannuation (Service of Registration Officers) Regulations, 1939 (S.R. & O., 1939, No. 57), art 3 (1), the Minister prescribed that a registration officer appointed as such after Mar. 31, 1930, and before the appointed day, who was within the schedule :

C . . . shall, subject to the provisions of the Act, be entitled to reckon as contributing service in relation to the appointment in respect of which he so became a contributory employee any service rendered by him as a registration officer before the appointed day which immediately before that day would have been treated as service for the purposes of the Act of 1896.

D The effect of that regulation was that the applicant became entitled to have reckoned as contributing service the service he rendered to the county council between Apr. 30, 1938, when he succeeded to the deceased superintendent registrar, down to the coming into force of the Act of 1937 on Apr. 1, 1939. There can be no question that, had he resigned both offices before that date in that period, he would have been entitled to have his remuneration in both capacities taken into account, because there was no provision in force corresponding to s. 40 (3) of the Act of 1937. He did not so retire. He retired on Nov. 2, 1943. He had previously vacated the office of registration officer by reason of the appointment of a successor on June 30, 1940.

E In those circumstances, as I have said, the Divisional Court decided that he was not entitled to have taken into account in ascertaining his average remuneration under s. 8 (5) of the Act of 1937, remuneration which he received for the five years preceding Nov. 2, 1943, in the capacity of registrar. They seem to have treated the express language of s. 40 (3) as excluding that claim. Unfortunately, their judgment does not show the reasoning by which they reached that conclusion and, therefore, I am bound to examine the section for myself unassisted by any full statement of the reasons of the Divisional Court for their conclusion. It is to be observed that s. 40 (3) is an interpretation section

F and in express terms provides nothing more than that :

. . . the provisions of this Act shall, unless the context otherwise requires, apply as respects him in relation to each of those separate employments as if the other or others were an employment or employments held by him under another authority.

G That means that, wherever we come to a reference to his employment, we have to consider him during the relevant period as having held two employments, one as arca officer under the Middlesex County Council, which I will call authority A, and the other under a notional authority which, in order to avoid ambiguous phrases, counsel for the council referred to as authority X. Approaching the matter in that way, I start with s. 40 and consider what "service" means. "Service" means "service rendered to any local authority . . ." Therefore, when construing those words, I think, wherever you find a reference to "service," you have to treat it as service rendered to any local authority

H whether successively or contemporaneously. Therefore, I think, there is something in the context there which prevents you limiting the service to the service of a particular authority. You have, however, to exclude service :

. . . in any employment if the person in question has already become entitled . . . to a superannuation allowance under this or any other Act.

Strictly, there can be no doubt that that does not apply, because it is quite plain that on Nov. 2, 1943, the applicant, immediately before his retirement from the service of authority A, was not entitled to a superannuation allowance from anybody. What was his position when he ceased to be interim superintendent registrar on June 30, 1940? That position, on the basis on which I am now considering the matter, he must be treated as having held, not under authority A, the Middlesex County Council, but under authority X, so s. 10, as it seems to me, should have been brought into force. The fact that authority A took a wrong view of the meaning of the section, as counsel for the council very properly admitted, is immaterial. What is the position in those circumstances? The applicant was a contributory employee of authority X in his capacity as registrar, who, before becoming entitled to a superannuation allowance under that part of the Act, ceased to be employed by authority X for a reason other than his voluntary resignation. Therefore, prima facie, under s. 10 (1) he would have been entitled to receive payment of his contributions with compound interest thereon. He would have been so entitled unless the provisions of s. 10 (6) applied. But it was common ground that they did not apply, because, although authority X had a notional existence, there was no separate transfer fund, and there was no room for the operation of the provisions of s. 29 relating to transfer values. The position, therefore, was that the applicant had not become entitled to any superannuation allowance, and he would have been entitled to have his contributions returned if he had made them.

What is the consequence? Before I turn to s. 8 (5), I must look at s. 12, from which I find he would have been entitled to reckon as contributing service for the purposes of s. 8 service in respect of which he was required to contribute to the appropriate superannuation fund, including service both as area officer and as interim registration officer, subject to the proviso that he would not be entitled:

... to reckon as contributing service any service in respect of which he has received a return of contributions under this Act or under the Act of 1922.

He would be caught by that proviso, and, therefore, he could not count his service as interim registration officer as a contributing service. Under s. 12 (2) a contributory employee of a local authority is entitled:

... to reckon as non-contributing service any service which he is not entitled to reckon as contributing service.

Therefore, he would have been entitled to reckon his service as an interim registrar as non-contributing service subject only to the limitation that it is plain that, in applying s. 8 (2), the same calendar year cannot be counted twice over. Any years which the applicant counted as contributing service by virtue of his employment as area officer, he would count again as non-contributing service. The material provision is, however, s. 8 (5). Is there anything in s. 8 (5) which debars him from having his remuneration as interim registrar included in the calculation of the "annual average of the remuneration received by him in respect of service rendered during the 5 years immediately preceding" the date of his retirement. "Service" must receive the definition given to it by s. 40, and there is nothing in s. 40 which would exclude the service with authority X. On the contrary, the language of s. 40 refers expressly to "service rendered to any local authority." Nor is there anything in s. 8 (5) which says that only "contributing service" is to be taken into account. On the contrary, it is quite plain on the language that remuneration for "non-contributing service" is also to be taken into account. Therefore, it seems to me, as a matter of construction, subject only to a consideration of the effect of s. 40 (3), the answer is quite plain. Indeed, I do not think that counsel for the council denies that, if it were not for s. 40 (3), the applicant would be entitled to have his remuneration as interim registrar taken into account in making the calculation required by s. 8 (5). He admitted also that he could find nothing in the express language of s. 40 (3) which compelled one to an opposite conclusion, but he said that it was inconsistent with the policy of the Act and that s. 40 (3) indicated an intention that concurrent employment should be treated separately. I am unable to find any sufficient indication of such an intention in the language of s. 40 (3) to justify us in disregarding what I regard the plain meaning of the other sections to which I have already referred.

The other provision on which counsel for the council relied was that contained in s. 8 (5), proviso (c), which deals with the position of a contributory employee in the whole-time employment of a single local authority who becomes a contributory employee in part-time employment of each of two or more authorities, and provides that:

. . . if his remuneration in his whole-time employment becomes material for the purpose of calculating the superannuation allowance payable to him on his ceasing to hold one of his part-time employments, that remuneration shall . . . be apportioned . . .

That seems to me to be quite a different matter. It provides for his remuneration being apportioned and thus avoids its being brought into account twice. We are asked to say here that the remuneration in the capacity of superintendent registrar shall not be brought into account at all. I do not think that it would be safe for us to draw any inference from that proviso adverse to the contention put forward by the applicant.

Finally, it was said that, if we reach the conclusion that the applicant's contention is well-founded, it would necessarily follow that we should have to hold in an imaginary case which counsel for the council put to us that an employee might become entitled to twice the superannuation allowance which Parliament obviously intended him to have. The case counsel for the council put was this. He supposed that a contributory employee was employed part-time in the service of authority A at a salary of £800 a year, and part-time in the employment of authority B at a salary of £700 a year. In order to exclude s. 8 (5), proviso (c), he assumed that both employments had been held for at least five years previous to retirement, and he assumed that the employee retired simultaneously from both employments. He had to do that, otherwise the monstrous state of affairs which he visualised would have been prevented by the operation of the definition of "service" in s. 40 (1). He then said that on the basis of the applicant's argument the employee would be entitled from authority A to 40/60ths, and from authority B to the same amount. In other words, he would receive on retirement a superannuation allowance of £2,000, or £500 a year more than his salary, or, rather, he would have received that pension except that it might be reduced to two-thirds of £1,500, i.e., £1,000 a year, by reason of the operation of s. 8 (3). In order that counsel for the council might bring out the full effect of his argument, my brother WROTTESELEY put to him a hypothetical case, not of retirement after 40 years under s. 8 (1) (b), but of retirement after 10 years owing to ill-health, in which event, on the facts suggested, he would receive a superannuation allowance twice the amount contemplated because, so calculated, it would not amount to two-thirds of the employee's remuneration. My first comment on that supposed case is that it would arise whether or not the applicant's argument was well-founded, because s. 40 (3) does not come into it. I can find nothing in the terms of the section to prevent its operation, but I think it is possible that we could here find a general policy in the Act which might prevent such an unfortunate result occurring. It might well be said that it was implicit in the concluding words of the definition of "service" that a man should not receive two superannuation allowances in respect of the same service. That is quite a different proposition from that which counsel for the council found himself compelled to argue in this case, because he has invited us to hold that the applicant is not entitled to have his service as interim registration officer taken into account for one superannuation allowance, because it is not suggested that the applicant has ever had his remuneration as interim registration officer taken into account in calculating a superannuation allowance. True, in theory, he is entitled to get his contributions back, but it seems to me impossible to hold that that fact can deprive him of his right to a superannuation allowance, because sub-ss. (1) and (2) of s. 12, read together, indicate what the effect of a return of contributions is to be. For these reasons, I am unable to find either in the express provisions of the Act, or in the policy of the Act, sufficient justification for disregarding what I think counsel for the council would admit is the plain meaning of the language used in s. 8 as qualified by s. 40. In my opinion, the appeal should be allowed, and question 1 should be answered in the affirmative.

That being so, we have to consider a question which the court below did not have to consider, and that is the second question stated in the Case :

If the answer to the preceding question is in the affirmative, whether there should be taken into account as such remuneration (a) the gross fees received by the applicant, or (b) those fees less any expenditure incurred by the applicant in the performance of the duties of that appointment, as, for example, the salary paid by him to his deputy.

I think it was common ground that that entirely depends on the construction of the definition of "remuneration" in s. 40 (1). I think it is sufficient to say that the express language of that section seems to me to leave no doubt that that question must be answered by saying that the gross fees received by the applicant must be taken into account. There is nothing in the section binding him to pay any expenditure out of those fees. It is true that he may, in order to discharge his duties effectively, have to incur expenditure, but the fees are paid to him for his own use. It was said that he would have to employ a deputy, but there is nothing which fixes the remuneration of deputies, and he might find a deputy who was prepared to act free of charge which would be a compliance with his obligation as interim registrar. As I have said, although the alternative answer might be a reasonable solution, the language of the definition seems to me so plain that it is impossible for us to come to any conclusion other than that which I have already indicated. In my opinion, therefore, the second question also should be answered in favour of the applicant. A

SCOTT, L.J.: I agree with the judgment of my brother COHEN on both questions. I only have one or two sentences to add. On the first question, that of liability, the position under this Act is one in which the right is laid down in the enacting section of the Act. The limitation, on which the argument for the council here was chiefly based, is contained in s. 40 (3). That is a part of the Act where you would not naturally look to find operative provisions. C If there is any ambiguity in the sub-section—indeed, I go further—unless there is in it absolutely clear language having the opposite effect, prima facie it ought to be construed as not cutting down the operative provisions of the Act, which are contained in s. 3 (1) and s. 8 (1) and (2) (a). The latter are the main enacting sections of the Act conferring the right to superannuation. In contrast with them, s. 40 ought not to be treated as prima facie an operative section, but rather as a definition section and no more. In this respect I think there is some analogy between this Act and the first Workmen's Compensation Act of 1897, which was considered in the House of Lords in Lysons v. Knowles (Andrew) & Sons, Ltd. (2). In that Act the right was conferred by s. 1. The quantum of compensation was dealt with in the schedule. That schedule contained a provision that generally the quantum of weekly compensation should be ascertained by taking the average of wages received. An argument was submitted to the county court and to the Court of Appeal to the effect that the word "average" showed that more than casual labour must have been in contemplation as a condition of the right to receive compensation under the Act. The Court of Appeal accepted that view. There was an appeal to the House of Lords. Their Lordships pointed out that that was a wrong principle of interpretation. EARL OF HALSBURY, L.C., said ([1901] A.C. 79, 84-86): D

My Lords, the broad proposition of course was that the legislature intended that there should be compensation given to every workman in certain trades when an injury happened to him in the course of his employment, subject to certain exceptions which are not relevant to the question now under debate . . . The first thing, I think, one has to do is to apply one's mind to what is the substantive intention and meaning of this statute . . . My Lords, for my own part I cannot entertain a doubt that the legislature did mean that every workman in the prescribed trades should be entitled to compensation, and I think that is the language which one would naturally expect to have been used by the legislature if that was the meaning of the enactment. E

He then pointed out that to cut that right down by reason of something in the schedule was contrary to common sense. LORD MACNAGHTEN took the same view, saying (ibid., 92): F

I have no doubt that if Parliament had intended to impose the condition which has been discovered in the schedule, the condition would have been inserted in the Act. LORD DAVEY said (ibid., 95, 96): G

Now, my Lords, I turn to the examination of the Act, and I entirely agree with what has been said by my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack, that you ought to construe this Act so as, as far as possible, to give effect to the primary provisions of it. That principle was laid down there. When the Act of 1897 was repealed and the Act of 1906 took its place, as we all remember, the compensation provisions were transferred from the schedule to the body of the Act, but that made no H difference to that basical interpretation which was always adhered to throughout those Acts. In my view, that is a principle applicable to s. 40 (3) of the Act of 1937, which contains no language at all adequate to the gloss which the very able and moderate argument addressed to us by counsel for the council necessarily endeavoured to put on it.

There is only one other observation I want to make. We were referred to the Local Government Superannuation (Service of Registration Officers) Regulations, 1939, made by the Minister and published in January, 1939, before the Act came into force on Apr. 1, 1939. They were made under the provisions contained in the Act itself for the making of regulations, viz., s. 36 (6), which provides :

The Minister may make regulations for prescribing anything which under this Act is to be prescribed, and with respect to such administrative action to be taken by local authorities as is mentioned in sched. III to this Act.

It is to be observed that no power of delegated legislation is by that conferred on the Minister, and that his power is limited to administrative matters. Schedule II, pt. IV, of the Act of 1937, which has been referred to by my brother, provides in para 2 :

For the purposes of Part I of this Act . . . (b) . . . account shall be taken of any such service in such manner and subject to such terms and conditions, including conditions as to the making of payments by an employee or a local authority, as may be prescribed.

The regulations of 1939 were made under para. 2 (b) of sched. II, pt. IV, the word "prescribed" being defined in s. 40 as meaning "prescribed by regulations made by the Minister." I express no opinion on the regulations, but they have a look rather of being something more than administrative—it may be that they amount to legislation. I merely call attention to that by way of a caveat, without expressing any final opinion. I agree with the judgment proposed by my brother COHEN.

WROTTESLEY, L.J. : I agree. I should not expect to find at the end of an interpretation section a clause which would deprive the persons intended to be benefited by an Act of this kind of one of the principal benefits conferred by it. I should expect any such modification of the general principle of the Act to be contained in a substantive section. Nevertheless, I have sought to find somewhere in the Act a scope for working s. 40 (3). It must have a meaning and must apply somewhere. One instance, I think, is to be found in s. 10 (1), which, it is to be observed, says : "A contributory employee . . . who, before becoming entitled to a superannuation allowance . . . ceases to be employed by that authority," through something which is not his own fault, is entitled to receive back his contributions "together with compound interest thereon" at a stated rate. Supposing the applicant in this case had paid as registrar—as he ought to have paid—his contributions, he would naturally have expected to get them back on finding out on his retirement from being registration officer that he was not entitled to what is called an allowance, i.e., to a pension. But it is to be observed that he is still a contributory employee within the meaning of s. 10, because he has not ceased to be employed by the county council in another capacity. When you turn to s. 40 (3), there is a passage in that sub-section which enables that difficulty to be put right and would enable the applicant to recover the payments which he ought to have made. It provides, in effect, that in relation to his appointment as registration officer he is to be regarded as if it were employment under an authority other than the Middlesex County Council. That appears to me to be a case where s. 40 (3) works, and works beneficially in accordance with the general purport of the Act.

Appeal allowed with costs here and below.

HALDANE v. ECKFORD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Greene, M.R., and Evershed, L.J.J.), July 2, 5, 6, 30, 1948.]

Estate Duty—Property “passing”—Change in beneficial interest or possession of property on death of person contingently entitled to distributions—Accumulations—Direction by testator to accumulate up to £8,000 and then invest in land—Land to be entailed on fixed date—Periodical distributions under Scottish law of entail—Finance Act, 1894 (c. 30), s. 1.

By his will, dated Mar. 28, 1862, a testator, who died on Feb. 27, 1865, domiciled in Jersey, directed the conversion of his estate, and instructed his trustees to invest the proceeds of such conversion in the purchase of a landed estate in Scotland which they were to settle under a strict entail in conformity with Scottish law. By a first codicil, dated Feb. 15, 1865, the testator directed that the trusts of his will for the sale and conversion of his estate and the investment of the proceeds in land should not be carried out until a certain period (certified, by a certificate in the suit made by the Chief Clerk, to end in 1956) had elapsed, but that the income from certain parts of his estate should be accumulated and invested in certain securities. The codicil continued: “I direct that such investments and accumulations . . . shall continue and be made until such investments and accumulations amount in value to . . . £8,000 sterling or upwards and when . . . the same shall amount in value to the last mentioned sum I direct . . . that my trustees . . . shall . . . convert the same into money and invest the proceeds thereof in the purchase of real estate in the parish of Eckford . . . and in like manner thereafter whenever the investments of the . . . rents dividends interest and annual produce of my estate and the accumulations shall amount in value to the sum of £8,000 or upwards I direct that my trustees . . . shall . . . convert into money and . . . invest the same in the purchase of real estate in . . . Eckford . . . these successive purchases of real estate to continue . . . until [1956] . . . when . . . I will and direct that the trusts for the sale and conversion . . . and the investments of the trust moneys . . . in my said will contained shall be carried into effect . . .” Under an administration order of the Court of Chancery in England made in 1865, the trust funds were paid into court, and an inquiry was answered by that court to the effect that, according to the law of Jersey, the bequests and directions contained in the will and codicils were valid. Under the Scottish Entail Acts, where property is held in trust to purchase land to be entailed, it is competent for the person who, if the land had been entailed in terms of the trust, would be the heir in possession of the entailed land, to make summary application to the court for the payment to him of such property, and the court will order such payment without the consent of any person. Such an order was made by the Court of Session in favour of D.E., who received certain sums of money thereunder from time to time. In 1912, D.E. died, and his daughter, H.E., became tenant in tail in possession. In 1926, 1927 and 1932, by orders of the court, three amounts of £8,000 were disentailed and paid to H.E. for her own use. On Dec. 31, 1935, H.E. died, and this petition was presented by the Crown to obtain payment out of the funds in court on her death of estate duty alleged to become payable under the Finance Act, 1894, s. 1, in respect of the corpus of the funds. No claim was made under s. 2.

Held: H.E. was, in effect, entitled during her life, subject to her being capax and to her applying to the court, to the whole income of the corpus in a series of instalments; on her death there was an actual change in the title to the corpus as a whole in that her interest ceased and her successor became entitled to an interest exactly similar thereto; and there was, therefore, a passing of the corpus within s. 1.

APPEAL by the Attorney-General from a decision of ROMER, J., ([1948] 1 All E.R. 760) dismissing a petition to obtain payment out of court of a sum alleged to be due in respect of estate duty in connection with the death of Helen Louis Vivienne Eckford on Dec. 31, 1935. ROMER, J., held that the corpus of the fund did not "pass" in connection with the death within the meaning of the Finance Act, 1894, s. 1, and that, accordingly, estate duty was not chargeable under that section. The Court of Appeal now reversed that decision. The facts appear in the headnote and in the judgment of the court.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 30. LORD GREENE, M.R., read the following judgment of the court. The facts which give rise to the present question are of a most unusual character. The action is an administration action which was commenced in 1865 in relation to the estate of the testator, Robert Eckford, who died on Feb. 27 of that year. There is a fund in court standing to the general credit of the action "Haldane v. Eckford 1865, H.174" and representing part of the residuary estate of the testator. It is in respect of this fund that the present controversy arises. The Inland Revenue Commissioners claim that the fund passed on the death on Dec. 31, 1935, of Helen Louis Vivienne Eckford (whom we will call "Helen") with the result that estate duty became payable under the Finance Act, 1894, s. 1, and they presented a petition in the Chancery Division the object of which was to obtain payment of the duty out of the fund in court. ROMER, J., dismissed the petition.

The facts are clearly set out in the judgment of ROMER, J., and we will state them in no greater detail than is necessary to make this judgment intelligible. The testator died domiciled in Jersey and by the law of that island the testamentary dispositions with which we are concerned were wholly valid. By his will the testator directed that his estate (which consisted entirely of personality) should be realised and invested in the purchase of a landed estate in Scotland which was to be settled in strict entail in conformity with Scottish law as therein mentioned. By a first codicil he directed that the realisation and investment of his estate should be postponed until the happening of a certain event (which will occur in 1956) and that the income meanwhile should be accumulated until the accumulations should be of a value of £8,000 sterling, whereupon they should be invested in the purchase of real estate in Scotland, and so on, whenever the accumulations should reach the value of £8,000, and he directed that on the happening of the event mentioned the trusts for realisation, investment and settlement of the corpus of his estate should be carried out, and further he directed that the estates purchased in the meanwhile out of the accumulations of income should be similarly settled. By a second codicil he directed that the rents of the estates from time to time purchased pursuant to the first codicil should go to the person for the time being entitled under the entail. Pursuant to orders made from time to time sums, amounting in each case to £8,000 and representing accumulations of income derived from the residuary estate of the testator, were placed to the credit of an account entitled "Moneys subject to be invested in land."

We must here interpose a reference to the law of Scotland the provisions of which have led to the present claim. By that law where money or other property is invested in trust for the purpose of purchasing land to be entailed the person who would have been heir of entail in possession if the land had been entailed "provided he is capax and of full age" may make summary application to the Court of Session for authority for the payment to him of such money. The court will grant this authority without the consent of any person if the direction to entail was contained in the will of a testator who died subsequently to Aug. 1, 1848, and the applicant was born subsequently to the death of the testator.

The first person born subsequently to the death of the testator who would have been heir of entail in possession was one Douglas Eckford, and he, pursuant to orders made from time to time by the Court of Session and consequential orders made in the present action, obtained payment to himself of all sums standing to the credit of the account "Moneys subject to be invested in land." Douglas Eckford died on Sept. 30, 1912, and Helen (then an infant), who was his only child, became heir female in possession under the entail directed by the testator to be made. During the minority of Helen two amounts of £8,000 (being accumulated income which rose to that figure subsequently to the death of Douglas Eckford) were put to the credit of the account "Moneys subject to be invested in land." On attaining her majority, Helen obtained a transfer of these funds to herself pursuant to an order of the Court of Session and a consequential order made in the present action. In like manner she obtained payment to herself of a third sum of £8,000 the relevant order of the court being dated Feb. 25, 1932. As the result of these transactions, Helen, in fact, enjoyed the whole of the income of the corpus standing to the general credit of the action consisting of (a) income which was accumulating at the death of Douglas Eckford but had not yet risen to the value of £8,000 at the date of his death; (b) income which accumulated and rose to the value of £8,000 during the life of Helen herself. But she did not enjoy the income which accrued between the date when the last-mentioned sum of £8,000 (dealt with by the order of Feb. 25, 1932) was paid to her and the date of her death on Dec. 31, 1935. She was succeeded by the present plaintiff, John Eckford Hackett, as tenant in tail in possession. The trustees of a settlement executed by him have by the procedure already indicated received payment of a further accumulation of £8,000 which rose to that figure subsequently to the death of Helen.

It must be clearly borne in mind that the question for decision is not whether on Helen's death there was a passing of the fund of income then accumulating which had not yet realised the value of £8,000. It is whether the corpus standing to the general credit of the action passed on her death. To answer this question, it is necessary to ascertain what her interest in the corpus was. Stated shortly, it existed by virtue of the joint operation of the testamentary dispositions of the testator, on the one hand, and Scottish law, on the other. It is true that the right of the heir of entail under Scottish law to obtain payment to himself of an accumulation of £8,000 is a right to obtain payment of what for that purpose and viewed from that angle is a capital fund. The right arises because (a) the fund is directed to be invested in land which is to be entailed, i.e., it is capital, and (b) the applicant is heir of entail in possession, i.e., the person for the time being entitled to enjoy the income of that capital. But this appears to us to be immaterial. The question is: What was Helen entitled to in fact in respect of income of the corpus? Now, when she succeeded as heir female of entail each accumulated sum of £8,000 which she should become and did become entitled to claim would be and was nothing more nor less than income of the corpus augmented by the process of accumulation. To treat these sums as though they did not represent or include the income of the corpus is, in our opinion, to take a mistaken view of their nature. Helen had, in fact, a right to receive the whole of the income earned by the corpus during her lifetime in what, in effect, was a series of instalments each of them payable only when, by virtue of the direction to accumulate, the figure of £8,000 should be reached in her lifetime. The circumstance that Scottish law only gave her this right in her capacity as tenant in tail entitled to the income of the instalments cannot, in our view, alter the incontrovertible fact that the right, viewed from the angle of its relationship to the corpus itself, was the right to receive the income of that corpus in the manner which we have stated. The further circumstance that round this core of income there had gathered an accretion due to accumulation cannot alter the fact.

We have not yet, however, considered the limitations on the rights of the tenant in tail imposed by Scottish law. They are three in number. The heir of entail must be (i) of full age, and (ii) capax, and (iii) he must obtain an order of the Scottish Court. In the present case, Helen did attain her majority and was capax to the date of her death. We see no necessity for inquiring what the position would have been if she had died an infant, or had ceased to be capax before she obtained any payment to herself. It was admitted that in such a case the Finance Act, 1894, s. 5 (3), would have applied. Nor need we consider what would have happened if, having received one payment, she had ceased to be capax either temporarily or permanently. Once she attained her majority her right to apply for and receive the income whenever it should amount to £8,000 could only be defeated by a supervening loss (it may be a permanent loss) of capacity, and that never, in fact, occurred. The fact that, although of full age and capax, Helen could only disentail by making an application to the court does not appear to us to affect the substantial question to be decided. On attaining her majority, she was entitled to apply for and to obtain as of right the necessary order of the court the moment disentailing became possible. If she had refrained from exercising this right it could not, in our opinion, have prevented the passing of the corpus, assuming that the corpus would otherwise have passed. The case would, we think, have been similar to one where under a settlement income was made receivable only on a written application to the trustees. Failure to make application in such a case would, we think, be immaterial. Scottish law does not, of course, operate to reinstate the directions for entail of the corpus which are contained in the will. It did, however, have precisely the same practical effect so far as income of that corpus was concerned, save that the right to receive the income as it accrued, which would have belonged to Helen unconditionally if the directions contained in the will had prevailed, was limited to a right to receive income as and when (together with accumulations) it amounted to successive sums of £8,000 subject to the necessity of majority, capacity and application to the court.

In the course of the argument we put the case of a trust under which a beneficiary only became entitled to income as and when it should amount to a stated figure or at stated intervals of time, the income receivable by the trustees to be deposited in the meanwhile at a bank. Such a case appears to us to bear a close analogy to the present, whether the requisite figure or the intervals of time were to be large or small, provided, of course, it was reasonably attainable during the life of the beneficiary. The figure of £8,000 in the present case was clearly so attainable during the life of Helen and would have been attained several times over if she had not died at the early age of close on 31. What, then, was the right in relation to the corpus to which Helen succeeded on the death of her father? It was the right, contingent on her attaining 21 and being capax at the time of application, to apply for and obtain payment to herself of the entire accruing income of the corpus whenever and so often as such income (together with accretions arising from accumulation) should during her life amount to the sum of £8,000. As we have already said, the very nature of this right involved (1) that she would be entitled to obtain payment of income which had started to accumulate during the lifetime of her predecessor but which had not yet risen to the value of £8,000 at his death; (2) that as regards any sum accumulating during her own lifetime which had not risen to the value of £8,000 at the date of her death her interest therein, which was contingent on her being alive at the date when it should have risen to £8,000, would be defeated by her death. Theoretically, however, and given the necessary (if unlikely) combination of circumstances, her interest could secure for her every penny of income accruing from the corpus during her life if the attainment of £8,000, the order of the Scottish Court, and her death were all to take place at substantially the same time. As regards her de facto enjoyment of the income of the corpus came to an end. As regards the income which was at that moment in course of accumulation there was, no doubt, no immediate vesting in possession of a right in her successor. His right at that moment in regard to the growing accumulation was, as Helen's own right had been on her succession, contingent on his being of age and capax at the time when the value of £8,000 should be reached, but it was by reason of the death of Helen that this contingent right and similar rights in respect of subsequent accumulations of income passed to him freed from the prior right of Helen herself. It seems to us that the effect of the death of Helen was to bring about an actual change in the title to the corpus as a whole. Before that death it was producing income to which, by the combined operation of the codicils and of Scottish law, Helen became entitled at recurrent stages and subject to the contingency of her being alive and capax at the end of a stage. On her death this interest of hers came to an end and an exactly similar interest arose in her successor. Whenever the contingency of his being alive and capax at the conclusion of an accumulation period is satisfied, he will become entitled to obtain all income produced by the corpus to date and on his death during the course of an accumulation period an exactly similar interest will pass to his successor assuming that the corpus has not by that time been itself disentailed. It is clear that Helen's right in respect of the income of the corpus determined on her death. It is also clear that subject to the requirements of Scottish law her successor stepped into her shoes, and succeeded to precisely similar rights in respect of that income. It is true that if he had died before the accumulations current at Helen's death had amounted to £8,000 he never would have enjoyed any income and in that case the Finance Act, 1894, s. 5 (3), would, we think, have operated to prevent duty becoming payable on his death, but this did not happen and he succeeded de facto and de jure to the right to obtain the whole income produced by the corpus during his lifetime whenever that income plus accumulated accretions should amount to £8,000. The fact that he could not obtain any income for himself until, during his lifetime, the necessary period subsequent to the death of Helen had elapsed for the accumulations to reach the figure of £8,000 does not, in our opinion, prevent a passing on the death of Helen: see Finance Act, 1894, s. 22.

ROMER, J., took the view that there was no change in the beneficial title or possession of the property as a whole on Helen's death. He said ([1948] 1 All E.R. 768): "There was clearly no change in the beneficial possession. That was not in Helen prior to her death, nor in her successor afterwards." As will have been seen, our view as to Helen's interest in the income of the corpus does not agree with this. Nor does it agree with the learned judge's view that the right to compel performance by the trustees of their duty to accumulate was the only immediately subsisting right or title in relation to the trust property (i.e., the corpus) that Helen had. Nor, with great respect, can we agree that Helen's right in respect of income can properly be regarded as a mere series of expectations. What, in our opinion, requires to be considered is her right in respect of the income of the corpus during her life, and what happened to the right in respect of that income on her death, and not merely her right in respect of each accumulated fund of £8,000 taken, so to speak, in isolation. Regarding the position in this way we think that the corpus did pass on the death of Helen.

In the course of his judgment, ROMER, J., made a careful analysis of the relevant authorities to all of which we were also referred. The principle to be applied is not, we think, in any doubt and can best be stated by reference to certain passages cited by ROMER, J., from Attorney-General v. Milne (1) and Burrell & Kinnaird v. Attorney-General (2). In the former, LORD PARKER said ([1914] A.C. 779):

The expression "passing on the death" . . . is evidently used to denote some actual change in the title or possession of the property as a whole which takes place at the death.

LORD RUSSELL in the latter case ([1936] 3 All E.R. 764) expressed the formula thus:

In order to test whether it can be said that property passed on [a particular] death, one must compare the position as regards the persons beneficially interested in the property immediately before the death with the position immediately afterwards.

The facts in the present case are, as we have said, exceptional and they differ in material respects from those in all the cited cases. The problem is, not as to the law to be applied, but as to its application to the special circumstances of this case. It has not, therefore, seemed necessary or useful to repeat or add to the references to the authorities which ROMER, J., has made, but for the reasons we have given we have formed a different opinion from that of the learned judge of their effect on the present question.

Appeal allowed with costs in both courts. Order to tax the Crown's costs as between party and party and the trustees' costs as between solicitor and client and to pay such taxed costs out of the fund in court.

ROPPEL v. BENNETT.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Tucker, Bucknill and Somervell, L.JJ.), July 21, 22, 23, 1948.]

Rent Restriction—Furnished letting—Amount of rent attributable to use of furniture—Percentage of contractual rent—Value of furniture to tenant—Need to quantify value to tenant—Recovery of excessive rent—Excess paid in period ending before tenant's application for repayment—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (c. 17), s. 9 (1) (as amended by Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939 (c. 71), sched. I); s. 12 (2), proviso (i)—Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923 (c. 32), s. 10 (1).

By s. 12 (2), proviso (i), of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920: "This Act shall not, save as otherwise expressly provided, apply to a dwelling-house bona fide let at a rent which includes payments in respect of board, attendance, or use of furniture." By s. 10 (1) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923: "For the purposes of proviso (i) to sub-s. (2) of s. 12 of the . . . Act [of 1920] (which relates to the exclusion of dwelling-houses from [that] Act in certain circumstances), a dwelling-house shall not be deemed to be bona fide let at a rent which includes payments in respect of attendance or the use of furniture unless the amount of rent which is fairly attributable to the attendance or the use of the furniture, regard being had to the value of the same to the tenant, forms a substantial portion of the whole rent."

The portion of the contractual rent payable in respect of a fully furnished room which was attributable to the use of the furniture was some ten per cent. and the tenant denied that the premises constituted a furnished letting within the meaning of the Rent Restrictions Acts and claimed the protection of those Acts.

HELD: (i) the court had to take into consideration, not only the percentage of the rent which was attributable to the furniture, but also the value to the tenant of the provision of the furniture by the landlord, and, in view of the quantity of furniture in the room, the proportion of the rent attributable to the furniture was a substantial one, and the tenant was not entitled to the protection of the Rent Acts.

Observations of VISCOUNT SIMON in Palser v. Grinling ([1948] 1 All E.R. 1, 10, 11), applied.

(ii) it was unnecessary for the court to quantify in pounds, shillings and pence the amount of rent fairly attributable to the use of the furniture, regard being had to its value to the tenant.

Observations of MORTON, L.J., in Palser v. Grinling ([1946] 2 All E.R. 287, 291), explained.

By s. 9 of the Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, as modified by the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, sched. I: (1) "Where any person lets, or has, since the beginning of the date of the passing of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, let any dwelling-house to which this Act applies, or any part thereof, at a rent which includes payment in respect of the use of furniture, and it is proved to the satisfaction of the county court on the application of the tenant that the rent charged is yielding or will yield to the landlord a profit in excess of the normal profit as hereinafter defined, the court may order that the rent, so far as it exceeds such sum as would yield such normal profit shall be irrecoverable, and that the amount of any payment of rent in excess of such sum which may have been made in respect of any period after the commencement of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, shall be repaid to the tenant. (2) For the purpose of this section 'normal profit' means the profit which might reasonably have been expected from a similar letting in the year ending on Sept. 1, 1939." By s. 7 of the Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946: "Sections 9 and 10 of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (which relate respectively to limitation on rent of houses let furnished and to penalty for excessive charges for furnished lettings), shall not apply as regards the rent charged for any house or part of a house entered in the register under the provisions of this Act in respect of any period subsequent to such registration, but save as aforesaid nothing in this Act shall affect any provisions of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Acts, 1920 to 1939."

By an application dated Sept. 5, 1947, the tenant sought to recover excessive rent paid over a period from Aug. 19, 1946, to April 17, 1947.

HELD: there was nothing in the enactments referred to to prevent a tenant recovering excessive rent paid during a period which had ended before the date of the tenant's application.

APPEAL by the tenant from an order of His Honour JUDGE EARENGEY, K.C., and a cross-appeal by the landlord. The facts appear in the judgment of SOMERVELL, L.J. Both the appeal and the cross-appeal were dismissed.

H. B. Grant for the landlord.

S. W. Magnus for the tenant.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: This appeal turns on the provisions of the Rent Restrictions Acts relating to furnished lettings. In the Act of 1920, as originally enacted, it was provided by s. 12 (2) proviso (i):

This Act shall not, save as otherwise expressly provided, apply to a dwelling-house bona fide let at a rent which includes payments in respect of board, attendance, or use of furniture.

As a result of certain cases which came before the courts that part of the code was amended by s. 10 of the Act of 1923, which provides:

(1) For the purposes of proviso (i) to sub-s. (2) of s. 12 of the Act [of 1920] (which relates to the exclusion of dwelling-houses from [that] Act in certain circumstances), a dwelling-house shall not be deemed to be bona fide let at a rent which includes payments in respect of attendance or the use of furniture unless the amount of rent which is fairly attributable to the attendance or the use of the furniture, regard being had to the value of the same to the tenant, forms a substantial portion of the whole rent.

In the present case the landlord claimed possession on the ground that the tenancy was not protected by the Rent Restrictions Acts. In her defence, the tenant denied that the premises constituted a furnished letting within the meaning of the Rent Restrictions Acts and claimed their protection. There was plenty of furniture in these premises. They were furnished in the ordinary sense, but that does not conclude the matter. The value of the furniture was referred to the registrar. He found it to be £30, and that report was accepted by the learned county court judge. Counsel agreed that 20 per cent., that is £6 a year, or 2s. 4d. a week, represented the proper percentage to take of that figure of £30 as what would be paid as between a willing borrower and a willing lender of furniture of that value. The learned county court judge found that the amount paid in respect of the furniture was a substantial portion of the rent, the rent for the room let being 23s. 0d. a week.

The question of the proper construction and the application of s. 10 came before this court, and then before the House of Lords in Palser v. Grinling. Property Holding Co., Ltd. v. Mischeff (1). The first case was concerned, not with furniture, but with attendance, and in the judgment of MORTON, L.J. (with which the other two members of the court, of whom I was one, agreed) this question of what constitutes a substantial portion of the whole rent was dealt with. MORTON, L.J., proceeded on the view that it was right and proper for this court to lay down guidance in the form of limits, a percentage below which an amount would not in ordinary circumstances be treated as a substantial portion and above which it should be so treated. He said this ([1946] 2 All E.R. 292):

The legislature has not seen fit to lay down any particular percentage as being a substantial portion, and I have carefully considered whether it would or would not be of assistance to judges who have to determine this difficult question if I gave some indication of my own view as to what proportion of the rent forms a substantial portion of the "whole rent" within the meaning of s. 10. We were invited by counsel for the defendant to give some indication of this kind, and, on the whole, I think it is right to do so now, but I do not think it would be right to fasten upon a particular percentage and say: "This is a substantial portion, and any percentage below this is not a substantial portion." I am, however, prepared to say that, in my view, in the absence of special circumstances, 20 per cent. of the whole rent would be a substantial portion, any portion under 15 per cent. would not be a substantial portion, and any portion from 15 per cent. up to 20 per cent. would be a "border line" case.

A The view I take of this point is not really material, perhaps, to my final conclusion on this case, but I think it is right to refer to what LORD SIMON said in his speech in the House of Lords about that passage in MORTON, L.J.'s judgment. LORD SIMON said ([1948] 1 All E.R. 11):

"Substantial" in this connection is not the same as "not unsubstantial," i.e., just enough to avoid the de minimis principle. One of the primary meanings of the word is equivalent to considerable, solid, or big. It is in this sense that we speak of a substantial fortune, a substantial meal, a substantial man, a substantial argument or ground of defence. Applying the word in this sense, it must be left to the discretion of the judge of fact to decide as best he can according to the circumstances in each case, the onus being on the landlord. If the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Palser's case (1) were to be understood as fixing percentages as a legal measure, that would be going beyond the powers of the judiciary. To say that everything over 20 per cent. of the whole rent should be regarded as a substantial portion of that rent would be to play the part of a legislator. If Parliament thinks fit to amend the statute by fixing percentages, Parliament will do so. Aristotle long ago pointed out that the degree of precision that is attainable depends on the subject-matter.

C I construe that as meaning that the suggestion made by MORTON, L.J., and agreed to by the two other members of the court passes out of the picture as the limits on which a party can rely as a matter of law, and, therefore, the question is left to the county court judge to decide as a question of fact.

D In the present case, taking the figure of 2s. 4d., the percentage is about 10 per cent. of the contractual rent. It is unnecessary, in my view, to decide whether, if the matter had rested there, the tenant could have succeeded in getting this court to reverse the decision of the county court judge, because it is clear from the judge's judgment that he did not take the 2s. 4d. as the last word on the figures which he had to consider. At the time of his decision the cases to which I have referred had been decided in the House of Lords. His attention was drawn to them, and it is plain from his note that he considered carefully what had been said by LORD SIMON, and, in particular, that he relied on the following passage from LORD SIMON's speech ([1948] 1 All E.R. 10):

E A number of factors may be relevant in arriving at the proper figure and the governing consideration is the word "fairly." The questions involved are to be answered by common-sense considerations rather than by any formula which can be laid down by this House. In assessing "the amount of rent which is fairly attributable" to the use of furniture, a number of considerations are relevant, of which the chief is that if and so far as the landlord does not provide furniture which the tenant would normally require to use, the tenant would have to provide it himself. It is the value to the tenant of the landlord's covenant to provide furniture which mainly controls the figure to be arrived at, and not the cost of such furniture to the landlord, though the latter in many cases may also be a relevant factor.

G The 2s. 4d., therefore, as it seems to me, instead of becoming necessarily or normally the final figure, is the figure to which LORD SIMON refers as the one which "in many cases may also be a relevant factor." The learned judge in dealing with this part of the case said:

H As to the argument of counsel that £6 a year represents the value to the tenant of the use of the furniture, I understand that this was possibly based on the percentages suggested by MORTON, L.J. (as he then was), but that test did not meet with approval in the House of Lords. I refer to Palser v. Grinling (1) ([1948] 1 All E.R. pp. 9 to 11). What I have to consider is the value to the tenant of the landlord's obligations based on the wider consideration referred to in the speech of LORD SIMON, and then to compare it with the contractual rent. . . I proceed to point out the wider consideration mentioned by LORD SIMON. Inter alia it is necessary here to bear in mind that the room was let fully furnished in the ordinary meaning of that phrase. Practically everything was provided which the tenant would require. Also I must consider the probable cost to the tenant of the purchase or hire of similar furniture, if such was readily, or at all, available, the high rates prevailing in 1946 for such articles, and the greatly increased cost of maintenance and possible removals. I find that the value to the tenant in respect of the use of the furniture is a substantial portion of the contractual rent, and that the room was let furnished within the meaning of the Rent Acts.

It seems to me to be plain from those passages that the learned county court judge was applying the principle which under LORD SIMON's speech he had to apply, and that what is added to the 2s. 4d., in his opinion, makes the portion of the rent attributable to the furniture a substantial portion of the rent within the meaning of the section as properly construed. If that is right, prima facie, it could not be disturbed in this court, but counsel for the tenant takes the point that the learned judge has misdirected himself and has not quantified what I may call his final figure in pounds, shillings and pence. Counsel refers to the following passage in MORTON, L.J.'s judgment in Palser v. Grinling (1), which, he says, was not adversely commented on or impliedly modified by anything said in the House of Lords ([1946] 2 All E.R. 291):

Whatever method the judge employs, it seems to me that, having fully considered all the relevant circumstances, he must arrive at an actual figure in pounds, shillings and pence as being "... the amount of rent ... fairly attributable to the attendance ... regard being had to the value of the same to the tenant."

I think it is fair to point out that MORTON, L.J.'s general approach was one which more readily led to a precise quantification than some of the considerations which LORD SIMON said the tribunal of fact ought to take into account. No doubt, the county court judge must have his mind directed to a figure, which obviously is one of pounds, shillings and pence, when he is going to decide what would or would not be substantial, but I cannot think that MORTON, L.J., intended to place on the county court judge the burden of arriving at an actual figure in a case where, having considered all the proper matters, including such figures as there are before him, he is satisfied that on any view the case falls clearly on one side of the line or on the other. There might be a case where, assuming the maximum value for all the considerations which had to be taken into account, he was going to decide that the amount so arrived at was not substantial, and it seems to me that it might be intolerable if he had to quantify a lot of items and reduce them to pounds, shillings and pence. Equally, in another case, as here, having the figure which enters into the calculation—2s. 4d.—he might, and, I think, in this case he did, come to the conclusion that, having regard to the other factors which he had to take into account, the amount attributable to furniture came well over what he was entitled to regard as a substantial portion of the rent. There, again, I think it would be putting an undue burden on him to say: "You must as a matter of law in your notes of your judgment quantify and express in pounds, shillings and pence the final figure at which you arrive." I, therefore, think, as a matter of law, that that point fails. For those reasons, I do not think that counsel for the tenant can succeed in displacing the county court judge's finding that in this case the amount attributable to the furniture was a substantial portion of the contractual rent within the relevant provisions of the section, and on that view the landlord is entitled to the order for possession which the learned county court judge made in her favour.

The counterclaim depends on s. 9 of the Act of 1920 as modified by the schedule to the Act of 1939 in its application to what are called "1939 houses," that is to say, houses which were brought under control for the first time by the Act of 1939. This being a 1939 house, I will read the section as modified by that Act, and applicable to these premises:

Where any person lets, or has, since the beginning of the date of the passing of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, let any dwelling-house to which this Act applies, or any part thereof, at a rent which includes payment in respect of the use of furniture, and it is proved to the satisfaction of the county court on the application of the tenant that the rent charged is yielding or will yield to the landlord a profit in excess of the normal profit as hereinafter defined, the court may order that the rent, so far as it exceeds such sum as would yield such normal profit shall be irrecoverable, and that the amount of any payment of rent in excess of such sum which may have been made in respect of any period after the commencement of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, shall be repaid to the tenant. (2) For the purpose of this section "normal profit" means the profit which might reasonably have been expected from a similar letting in the year ending on the 1st September, 1939.

That section introduced a code by which tenants of furnished lettings might seek to get their rents reduced. In 1946 there was further legislation dealing with furnished lettings, and a different procedure was set up for enabling tenants of furnished lettings to get their rents reduced. That was contained in the Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946, and it set up special tribunals before whom those who wished to make applications under the Act could go. The tribunal had power to reduce the sum paid by the tenant, and there was a provision for a register in which the premises were entered with the reduced sum which the tenant had to pay. By s. 7 :

A Sections 9 and 10 of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (which relate respectively to limitation on rent of houses let furnished and to penalty for excessive charges for furnished lettings), shall not apply as regards the rent charged for any house or part of a house entered in the register under the provisions of this Act in respect of any period subsequent to such registration, but save as aforesaid nothing in this Act shall affect any provisions of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Acts, 1920 to 1939.

B The premises in the present case were originally let on August 19, 1946, at £1 5s. 0d. a week. That was reduced, and from November, 1946, until April 17, 1947, the rent was £1 3s. 0d. Some time before the latter date the tenant in this case had applied to the Hackney, Islington and Stoke Newington Rent Tribunal, who had reduced the rent which she had to pay to 14s. 0d. a week as from April 17. The counterclaim, having set out those facts, says :

C The said charges—that means the 25s. 0d. and the 23s. 0d.—were, by s. 9 (1) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, as amended by sched. I to the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, excessive in that they yielded to the [landlord] a profit in excess of the normal profit thereunder. The [tenant] says that a proper charge would have been 14s. 0d. per week.

D That counterclaim was delivered on Sept. 5, 1947, when the amount which the tenant was paying was 14s. 0d. a week, a sum which it is not suggested in the counterclaim is excessive. The question is whether, having regard to the provisions of the two sections which I have read, a tenant can make an application in respect of a period ending before the date of the application in a case where at the date of the application it is not sought to say that the rent is excessive within the meaning of s. 9.

E Section 7 of the Act of 1946 clearly does not prevent an application in respect of a period before the house was entered in the register. At least, there are no express words to that effect, because the section says expressly that s. 9 of the Act of 1920 “shall not apply as regards the rent charged for any house or part of a house entered in the register under the provisions of this Act in respect of any period subsequent to such registration.” The tenant is not seeking to do that. I agree with the submission of counsel for the landlord, though it may not be necessary to decide it, that the natural meaning of the expression “rent charged” in that section is the amount which the tenant actually has to pay after the rent tribunal have come to their finding, and the matter has been entered in the register. Having gone to one tribunal, summoned the landlord and witnesses there, and got his rent reduced by that procedure, it would obviously be oppressive if the tenant could then go to the county court to see whether he could get the reduced figure further reduced by an application under s. 9. As it seems to me, s. 7 is silent as to the point which we have to decide, and, indeed, counsel for the landlord based his argument on the wording of s. 9 of the Act of 1920, as amended. He is seeking, in my view, to read the words “on the application” as if they were “at the time of the application.” If it was necessary for a tenant to show that at the time of his application the rent charged was in excess of the normal profit, and if the words “the rent charged” there mean the sum which he is actually paying on that day, then the tenant would fail in this case because the sum he was paying at the time he filed his counterclaim was 14s. 0d.—the sum which he puts forward in his counterclaim as a fair sum to pay for the premises over the period. I cannot myself construe the words “on the application” as meaning “at the time of the application.”

H Section 9 confers a right to relief in two different forms. The applicant can get his rent reduced and he can also get repaid the sums in respect of the unreduced rent which he has previously paid to his landlord. I think, unless there are express words which negative it, where one finds that a person is entitled to relief of that kind, he can do as the tenant has done here, and claim in respect of a period ending before the time when the application is filed. The court will look at what was happening in that period, and if it finds that in that period a sum yielding a profit in excess of the normal profit was being paid, the section will apply and the tenant will be entitled to be repaid the amount of rent in excess of the reduced sum over the period in question. That is the view which the learned county court judge took. He said :

As to the point raised as to the effect of s. 9 of the Act of 1920, I hold that the sub-section applies to past and future lettings, and the counter-claim is maintainable.

Counsel for the landlord based an argument on the words "is yielding or will yield" in the sub-section, and it is quite true that one does not find in it the words "has yielded." I think the explanation is a simple one. It is normally the case that people can, by legal proceedings initiated on a certain date, claim in respect of any relief to which they may be entitled over a past period, whereas it is unusual that a person can resort to a court before the injury which is being dealt with has actually descended on him. Therefore, I think it may well have been thought necessary to put in express words dealing with the future, because under those words, if there were a progressive rent and the tenant wanted to say that a rise two or three months hence would bring him within the section, as I read the sub-section, he could apply and complain that the rent to be charged in the future would yield an excessive profit to the landlord. The draftsman intended that the section should be applicable in certain circumstances to future events, and in that case one would expect to find express words conferring that right. For these reasons, I think that the appeal and cross-appeal fail and that the learned judge's order should stand.

TUCKER, L.J. : I am so completely in agreement with the result of the appeal and cross-appeal as stated by SOMERVELL, L.J., and with his reasons for arriving at that result that I desire to add very few observations of my own. With regard to the cross-appeal, there is nothing that I wish to add.

In this case the 2s. 4d. allocated to the furniture represents a percentage of some 10 per cent. of the total rent, but, as stated by my brother, I think that it is clear that this 2s. 4d. only represents the first stage of the calculation which was described in MORTON, L.J.'s judgment in Property Holding Co., Ltd. v. Mischeff (1) ([1946] 2 All E.R. 297), where he said :

He should first consider what, upon the evidence, was the capital value, at the date when the lease was executed, of the furniture included in the demise . . . He should then consider what percentage of that capital value should be regarded as the amount of rent fairly attributable to the furniture, taking into account such matters as the loss of interest by the landlord on his capital expenditure and the probability of depreciation and any other matters which he thinks it proper to take into account . . . Next the judge must have regard to "the value of the same to the tenant." These words raise difficult questions in some cases. In my view, if a dwelling-house is bona fide let to any tenant at a rent which includes payments in respect of certain articles of furniture, then prima facie those articles are of the same value to that tenant as they would be to any other tenant, and the burden lies on the tenant to show that by reason of some special circumstances those articles should be treated as being worth less to him than they would be to any other tenant . . . No such circumstances were proved in the present case.

I think that MORTON, L.J.'s judgment tended to indicate, at any rate, that, unless the tenant could show some reason for reducing the figure of 2s. 4d. in this case, prima facie 2s. 4d. would be the percentage which would prevail. When Mischeff's case (1) reached the House of Lords I think LORD SIMON's speech shows that there are other counter-balancing considerations to be taken into account from the landlord's point of view. LORD SIMON said this ([1948] 1 All E.R. 10) :

It is the value to the tenant of the landlord's covenant to provide furniture which mainly controls the figure to be arrived at, and not the cost of such furniture to the landlord, though the latter in many cases may also be a relevant factor. If the tenant provided the furniture himself, he would have to suffer the loss due to wear and tear, whereas, if the landlord provides the furniture, the burden of wear and tear (in the absence of an express covenant) falls on him. On the other hand, it must not be overlooked that when the landlord lets the use of furniture he does not, apart from special agreement, undertake to repair it or to renew it from time to time when it becomes worn out . . . What the judge of fact has to do is to take the furniture as it is and to fix a fair rental for it, having regard to its value to the tenant, remembering that old furniture wears out sooner than new and that the landlord (apart from special covenant) does not undertake to repair or renew it. These balancing considerations are not capable of being precisely quantified and the judge of fact has in the end to arrive at a figure which he considers in the result fairly allows for the relevant matters to be taken into account.

I think that the learned county court judge has obviously studied LORD SIMON'S speech very carefully, and has applied it properly, with the result that he added something, and something valuable, to the 10 per cent. which would be represented by the 2s. 4d. and I think there was ample material to justify him in arriving at that figure.

- A With regard to the passage in MORTON, L.J.'s judgment which has been quoted, indicating the necessity of the judge stating his finding with regard to the portion of the rent in the form of pounds, shillings and pence, and bearing in mind the passage which I have just read from LORD SIMON'S speech where he said "the judge of fact has in the end to arrive at a figure which he considers in the result fairly allows for the relevant matters to be taken into account," I think that, generally speaking, it would be desirable in these matters for county court judges to indicate what final conclusion they arrive at with regard to the portion, which I think can generally be done by taking a broad view of the matter, but I do not think that the mere fact that in the present case the county court judge has not stated in black and white the precise arithmetical result at which he has arrived after making some addition to the 10 per cent. invalidates his judgment or would justify us, in view of the very careful consideration which he obviously gave to the evidence in this case, in sending the case back to him to state the precise proportion at which he arrived. I agree that the appeal and cross-appeal fail.

- D BUCKNILL, L.J. : I agree. I would like to add that the room in this case was completely furnished, including such things as a bed, a chest of drawers, a cupboard, curtains, two chairs and an easy-chair, a table, a gas-fire and a gas-stove. To suggest that the value of those things to a tenant was only 2s. 4d. a week, if one takes into consideration what it would cost to buy those things, even second-hand, or to hire them, seems to me to indicate that that 2s. 4d. is not a sound basis upon which to work. I agree that the appeal and cross-appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal and cross-appeal dismissed: costs to follow the events.

RIORDAN v. MINCHIN.

- F [COURT OF APPEAL (Tucker, Bucknill, and Somervell, L.JJ.), July 29, 1948.]

Rent Restriction—Furnished letting—Recovery of excess rent—Applicant no longer tenant at time of application—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (c. 17), s. 9 (1) (as amended by Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939 (c. 71), sched. I).

- G The plaintiff, who was tenant of a house within the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, applied to a tribunal under the Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946, who reduced his rent from 30s. to 10s. 6d. a week. On May 19, 1947, he was evicted after an order for possession had been made against him, and thereupon he ceased to be a tenant of the house. On June 20, 1947, he applied to the county court, under s. 9 (1) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (as amended by the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939), for a repayment of the excess rent paid by him to the defendant (the landlord) while he was tenant of the house.

- H HELD: he was not debarred from obtaining an order for the repayment of the excess rent by the fact that at the time of the application he was no longer tenant of the house.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from a decision of His Honour JUDGE TOPHAM sitting at Farnham, Surrey, County Court, dismissing the plaintiff's application for repayment of excess payments of rent on the ground that the plaintiff was not the tenant of the premises in question when he made the application. The Court of Appeal now allowed the appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of SOMERVELL, L.J.

The plaintiff appeared in person.

A

TUCKER, L.J. : I will ask SOMERVELL, L.J., to deliver the first judgment.

SOMERVELL, L.J. : This is an appeal by Captain Riordan against a decision of His Honour JUDGE TOPHAM sitting at Farnham, Surrey, County Court. The case concerns a house of which Captain Riordan was the tenant, and in respect of that house an application was made on Oct. 29, 1946, to the Furnished Houses Rent Tribunal, as a result of which the rent was reduced from 30s. a week to 10s. 6d. Subsequently, an order for possession was made, leave to proceed was obtained, and, on May 19, 1947, Captain Riordan was evicted, and this appeal proceeds on the basis that as from that date he was neither a contractual tenant nor a statutory tenant. Although the house was a furnished house within the Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946, it was also within the Rent Restrictions Acts, that is to say, it had been held in other proceedings that the amount payable in respect of furniture was not a substantial proportion of the rent within s. 10 of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923.

B

On June 20, 1947, an application was made by Captain Riordan to the county court under s. 9 (1) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, as amended by the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939. This is a "1939 house," and the section, as amended, provides :

C

Where any person lets, or has, since the beginning of the date of the passing of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, let any dwelling-house to which this Act applies, or any part thereof, at a rent which includes payment in respect of the use of furniture, and it is proved to the satisfaction of the county court on the application of the tenant that the rent charged is yielding or will yield to the landlord a profit in excess of the normal profit as hereinafter defined, the court may order that the rent, so far as it exceeds such sum as would yield such normal profit shall be irrecoverable, and that the amount of any payment of rent in excess of such sum which may have been made in respect of any period after the commencement of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, shall be repaid to the tenant.

D

Captain Riordan was not asking to have the rent reduced because at the time of his application, he was no longer a tenant of the premises, but he was applying for repayment of the rent which he had paid in excess of the 10s. 6d. a week fixed by the rent tribunal.

E

A similar point came before this court in the recent appeal of Roppel v. Bennett (1). In that case the applicant was still tenant at the date of the application to recover the excess rent, but the rent at that time had already been reduced to a sum of which he was not complaining and he was seeking to recover arrears of rent in respect of a period before the rent was reduced. The county court judge found that he was entitled to recover the excess and this court affirmed the decision. Some observations were made with regard to the words "is yielding" or "will yield," for an argument had been based on the fact that there were no words which expressly referred to the past, and it was pointed out in the judgment that under our general procedure it is normal that a plaintiff claims relief and damages in respect of something which has happened in the past and does not need any express words in the statute which gives him a remedy to enable him to claim in respect of the past. Therefore, we held that the applicant could claim.

F

H

In the present appeal, the learned county court judge dismissed Captain Riordan's application on the ground that at the time of his application he was not a tenant. Counsel for the landlord relied on the words "on the application of the tenant." I do not think that means that the applicant has to be a tenant at the time he files an application at the county court. I think it means that he must have been the tenant during the period in respect of which the application is made. Of course, an applicant would not be able to make an application for repayment except in respect of a period during which he had been a tenant and was paying rent. That is, in my view, the natural construction of the section, and I can see objections which might well arise if the section were construed as counsel asks us to construe it. I, therefore, think that the learned county court judge was wrong in holding that this application fails because the applicant was not the tenant at the time the application was filed. The appeal must be allowed. Captain Riordan is entitled to the excess as from a certain date. What is the actual date can be decided later.

A TUCKER, L.J.: I agree. The recent decision of this Court in Roppel v. Bennett (1)—where we held that the words “is yielding” or “will yield” are applicable to a period of time which had passed when the application was made to the county court—really decides this appeal, because, if the words “is yielding” means “yields at the material time” (as we so held), the fact that this relief can only be given on the application of the tenant does not assist counsel’s argument. The natural meaning of the words “tenant” and “landlord” in an action of this kind is the person who was the tenant or landlord at the time the matter in issue arose. For those reasons, I agree that this appeal succeeds.

BUCKNILL, L.J.: I agree.

Appeal allowed with costs.

Re BORTHWICK (deceased). BORTHWICK v. BEAUVAIS.

D [COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Greene, M.R., and Asquith, L.J.), July 23, 1948.]
Family Provision—Discovery—Special circumstances—Net value of estate—Practice—R.S.C., Ord. 54F, r. 14.

E R.S.C., Ord. 54F, dealing with applications under the Inheritance (Family Provision) Act, 1938, provides by r. 1 that an application to the court under s. 1 of the Act shall be made in the Chancery Division by originating summons inter partes, and r. 14 provides that the ordinary practice and rules in the Chancery Division, in so far as they are not inconsistent with the Act or R.S.C., Ord. 54F, shall apply to proceedings under the Order.

F The plaintiffs, the widow and infant child of the testator, had issued an originating summons under the Act and applied for discovery of various documents relating inter alia to the net value of the estate. They were unable to indicate any ground for doubting the valuation (which had been accepted by the Estate Duty Office), but sought discovery in order to facilitate a critical examination thereof.

HELD: there was no such right to discovery as was conferred by the Rules of the Supreme Court in relation to matters conducted by pleadings, and, having regard to the wide power of the court on such applications, under Ord. 54F, r. 3 (2) (a) and r. 9, to secure any further evidence which might be necessary, discovery would not be ordered.

G Decision of ROXBURGH, J., in Re Borthwick, decd. (p. 179, ante), affirmed.

[FOR R.S.C., ORD. 54F, see THE YEARLY PRACTICE OF THE SUPREME COURT, 1940, pp. 1096-1099.]

H APPEAL by the plaintiffs, the widow and an infant child of a testator, from a decision of ROXBURGH, J. (p. 179, ante), who dismissed their application for discovery of documents in connection with an originating summons under the Inheritance (Family Provision) Act, 1938. The Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of LORD GREENE, M.R.

Lightman for the plaintiffs.

A. C. Nesbitt for the defendant executors.

Parbury for certain beneficiaries.

Danckwerts for the Attorney-General.

LORD GREENE, M.R.: The appellants are plaintiffs in an application under the Inheritance (Family Provision) Act, 1938, they being respectively the widow and daughter of the testator. Under that Act, in considering applications of this kind, the net value of the estate is clearly a relevant matter. In the present application the plaintiffs, with a view to testing an estimate of the values which the executors placed on the estate, sought to obtain an order for discovery in relation to certain shares in a private company.

When the Act was passed and was about to come into operation, the Rules Committee made a series of rules with regard to applications under the Act. They are contained in Ord. 54F. Speaking quite generally about those rules, they appear to me to be drafted for the particular purpose of providing, in relation to this novel and very special type of jurisdiction, a scheme of procedure which would enable the judge exercising that jurisdiction to have the fullest control over the proceedings and to secure that all material evidence which appeared to him to be material should be brought before him. The jurisdiction, of course, is a peculiar one, and anyone familiar with it knows that, if the procedure were to be abused and not kept under proper control, it might lead to litigation of the greatest acrimony and the threshing out of a lot of irrelevant material which would not be in the public interest. With that object in mind, it appears to me, these rules were made. I need not go through them in detail, but it is left, for instance, under r. 3 (2) (a) to the judge on the appointment for directions to "require the plaintiff and defendant to supply such information as shall be deemed necessary." Under r. 9, which is not in terms limited to the appointment for directions :

The court or a judge may require evidence in regard to any matter which the court or a judge considers to be relevant to the application and may direct any party to the proceedings or any person on whom notice of the proceedings has been served to attend on the hearing of the application and give evidence orally or to be cross-examined on any affidavit made by him.

The extent of the jurisdiction there conferred is, of course, very wide and goes far beyond the ordinary jurisdiction of a judge of the High Court. Without suggesting that Ord. 54F contains a comprehensive and exhaustive code, it must, in my opinion, be taken into careful consideration when such an application as we have here is made. The application is made in reliance on r. 14 of the Order which provides as follows :

The ordinary practice and rules in the Chancery Division in so far as they are not inconsistent with the Act or this Order shall apply to proceedings under this Order. It was argued before ROXBURGH, J., and was suggested before us, that that rule imported into this Order the rules of Ord. 31 relating to discovery, and, in particular, that they imported the ordinary rule in which in an action the parties, I will not say automatically but very nearly automatically, are entitled to an order for discovery. ROXBURGH, J., took the view that the ordinary practice and rules in the Chancery Division referred to in r. 14 meant the ordinary practice and rules in that Division in relation to procedure by originating summons. That is the form of procedure which, under Ord. 54F, is required in these cases. I see no reason for differing from that view of the learned judge. In the procedure by originating summons where the issues are not defined in the way in which they are defined in pleadings, but are shown in general affidavits in which the relevant evidence appears, affidavits which can, if necessary, be cross-examined to, there is really no room in practice for the application of the rather strict rules relating to discovery which take place in ordinary actions conducted with pleadings.

The view that ROXBURGH, J., took, and I think rightly took, was that the discovery in proceedings in the Chancery Division by originating summons ought only to be ordered in very special cases where the facts are such as to justify such an order being made. The application which was made to ROXBURGH, J., was an application, not under this code contained in Ord 54F, but for discovery under the general jurisdiction of the court. The judge had no hesitation in saying what, in my opinion, is right—that there is in this case no such right to discovery as is conferred by the Rules of the Supreme Court in relation to matters conducted by pleadings. He took the view further that an application for a special order for discovery in proceedings of this kind on originating summons ought to be by a specific application, and that it should be supported by a special affidavit setting out the reasons why it is said discovery should be granted. No such special application or affidavit being before him, he dismissed the application.

A We took the view that, on this appeal, the plaintiffs could properly be allowed, without the necessity at this stage of producing a special form of application or a special affidavit, to ask this court to act on the material which was available to them before the learned judge and which the learned judge in his insistence on a special affidavit did not look at. We accordingly considered the material and also at some subsequent material which came into existence or became available subsequently to the hearing of the application by the judge. The case of the plaintiffs boils down simply to this. They do not put forward a single shred of fact or suggestion casting doubt on the fairness or accuracy of the executors' evidence on the subject of value. Indeed, their complaint is this: "We cannot do that without some materials, and the reason why we want discovery is to enable us to test what the executors have said and to see whether or not we can find something on which to attack their estimate." In ordinary litigation the ordinary rules of discovery enable litigants to conduct such an examination, but this is a very special jurisdiction under a very special Act governed by very special rules. The judge has ample power, if he is not satisfied or if he thinks there is a reasonable ground for doubting the accuracy of such an estimate as this, to require further evidence on the point, to summon the executors before him, to put questions to them and to subject them to cross-examination. If he thought that was the proper course, or if the matter was a matter of doubt or if suspicion was aroused, that, no doubt, would be the course that he would take, but here we have what on the face of it is sworn testimony by reputable people, the accuracy of which has been subjected to the not too easy test of an investigation by a government department. Everybody who has a little experience of these matters knows that the valuation of shares in private companies is often an extremely difficult matter, and also I think everybody knows that where such shares come up for valuation for death duty purposes they are a subject-matter on which the death duty officials are particularly vigilant and particularly inquisitive. A judge who is asked to exercise his discretion in a case of this kind has to weigh in his mind those considerations. Here are plaintiffs who cannot suggest any doubt about this prima facie reliable method of arriving at the valuation, who merely ask for the instrument of discovery to be put into their hands to enable them to see if they can find something on which to attack it. If ever there was a case where a judge should decline to exercise a discretionary jurisdiction to grant an order for discovery, I think this is such a case. If any reasonable suggestion of doubt could be raised, I have no doubt the judge in his discretion under the power given to him by these specific rules would require further information. Indeed, there is one point at which he may at the hearing, or before the hearing, require some further information, and it is this. A great point was made that the Inland Revenue valuation relates to the date of the death. The value of the estate for the purpose of administering this Act must be ascertained as at the date of the order which the court makes under the Act. Time will have elapsed in the ordinary case between those two dates, and it may well be that the judge may require that the evidence of value shall be brought up to date. He may call on the executors to bring their valuation up to date and to say whether they wish to modify it in any way in the light of what has happened since the death. It may or may not be that he may wish that to be done. The result may be to raise or to lower the value of the estate I do not know, but that the instrument of discovery should be used for a purpose like that when the court has ample power to secure for itself any further evidence which may be necessary, appears to me to be an idea which is wholly wrong and contrary to the whole spirit of these rules.

H In the result, therefore, it appears to me that no ground has been put forward which would justify this court in interfering. It falls to this court to exercise its discretion because the judge declined to entertain the application on the ground that it was not in the right form and was not supported by the appropriate evidence. We have looked at the evidence, we have allowed the submission to be made, and it is for us to decide whether or not we will exercise the discretion which I have said I think exists technically to grant an order for discovery. In my opinion, the circumstances are not such as, in this very special jurisdiction and having regard to the very special rules which have the effect of legislation, should lead us to exercise our discretion. In the result, the appeal must be dismissed.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Roxburgh, J.), July 29, 1948.]

Company—Discovery—Scheme for transfer of shares—Acquisition of shares of dissentient shareholders—Application by shareholders to court—Discovery of documents relating to value of shares transferred—Companies Act, 1948 (c. 38), s. 209.

Dissentient shareholders in a "transferor company" applied to the court under s. 209 of the Companies Act, 1948, for an order that they were not bound to transfer their shares to a "transferee company" whose offer had been accepted by the holders of more than nine-tenths in value of the shares affected. The applicants alleged that the purchase price of the shares had been arrived at as the result of an under-valuation of the transferor company's assets and applied for discovery of the documents relating to that matter which were or had been in the possession of the transferee company.

HELD: in the absence of special circumstances an order for discovery would not be made.

MOTION.

A scheme for the transfer of the ordinary shares in Press Caps, Ltd., to Metal Box Co., Ltd., having been approved by 96.85 per cent. of the shareholders of Press Caps, Ltd., Metal Box Co., Ltd. gave notice to the dissenting shareholders under s. 209 of the Companies Act, 1948, that it desired to acquire their shares. The dissenting shareholders, by originating summons, asked for a declaration that Metal Box Co., Ltd., were not entitled to acquire their shares under the section, it being alleged that the offer of Metal Box Co., Ltd., was based on an under-valuation of certain assets of Press Caps, Ltd., and so was inadequate. These shareholders now applied for an order of discovery of the documents which were or had been in the possession of Metal Box Co., Ltd., relating to the matters in dispute. The registrar having refused to make the order, the applicants appealed to the judge, who dismissed the appeal.

Hesketh for the applicants.

T. D. D. Divine for the respondent company.

ROXBURGH, J.: This is an application by the holders of a very small proportion of the share capital of a company called Press Caps, Ltd. A large majority of the shareholders have agreed to sell their shares to the Metal Box Co., Ltd., and the Metal Box Co. are anxious to apply to the applicants the provisions of s. 209 of the Companies Act, 1948. That section gives to any dissenting holder who receives a notice that the company requires his shares, a right to apply in order to escape from the obligations of the section. The applicants have applied and have properly made the application by originating summons. In the present application they are asking for an order for discovery. It is, so far as I am aware, the first application under s. 209 to obtain an order for discovery.

The unsuccessful applicant in Re Borthwick (p. 635, ante), a case under the Inheritance (Family Provision) Act, 1938, appealed to the Court of Appeal before the commencement of this summons. There are special rules which apply to cases under the Inheritance (Family Provision) Act, which have no application to the present case. After dealing with those rules, LORD GREENE, M.R., said (pp. 635, 636, ante) :

The view that ROXBURGH, J., took, and I think rightly took, was that the discovery in proceedings in the Chancery Division by originating summons ought only to be ordered in very special cases where the facts are such as to justify such an order being made. The application which was made to ROXBURGH, J., was an application, not under this code contained in Ord. 54F, but for discovery under the general jurisdiction of the court. The judge had no hesitation in saying what, in my opinion, is right—that there is in this case no such right to discovery as is conferred by the Rules of the Supreme Court in relation to matters conducted by pleadings. He took the view further that an application for a special order for discovery in proceedings of this kind on originating summons ought to be by a specific application, and that it should be supported by a special affidavit setting out the reasons why it is said discovery should be granted.

Counsel for the applicants in the present case has armed himself with special affidavits, but the question still remains whether a special case has been made out. Counsel's main argument was that, if he did not have discovery on a question of fact, his client's hands would be tied behind his back, but that comment is applicable to every case in which a litigant sues by way of originating summons and a question of fact arises in the course thereof. I think it is not unimportant to notice the nature of the essential facts relied on. They are facts relating to the value of particular assets. Having regard to the subject-matter of s. 209, the value of the assets of a company must be a common factor in most applications under this section. Accordingly, if the mere fact that there is a dispute as to the value of the assets of a company is a sufficient ground for ordering discovery, discovery would have to be ordered in most cases under this section.

I do not feel able to say that any special circumstances have been disclosed which would justify an order for discovery in this case. In reaching that conclusion I have taken into account not only the matters which I have specially mentioned, but also the nature of the section under which this application is being made, s. 209 of the Companies Act, 1948. I have also taken into account, as I think I ought to take into account, the serious consequences which might follow if the holder of one per cent. of the shares of a company should in any large number of cases become entitled by making an application under this section to obtain an extensive investigation of the company's affairs. That remark is not directed to this particular application, but is intended to be of general application. Accordingly, I dismiss this motion with costs.

HARTHAN v. HARTHAN.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Merriman, P., Bucknill, L.J., and Hodson J.), July 17, 18, 21, 22, 26, 1948.]

Nullity—Impotence—Petition by impotent spouse—Competency—Need of repudiation of marriage by potent spouse.

Provided that there are no circumstances which bar him or her, e.g., knowledge of the defect at the date of the marriage, an impotent spouse is entitled to petition for a decree of nullity, and the right to do so is not conditional on the repudiation of the marriage by the other spouse.

APPEAL by the husband in an undefended suit from an order of Mr. Commissioner Eddy, dated Oct. 10, 1947, dismissing his petition for nullity on the ground of his wife's wilful refusal to consummate the marriage or, alternatively, on the ground of his own impotence. The appeal was allowed and a decree nisi granted on the ground of impotence. The facts appear in the judgment of LORD MERRIMAN, P.

H. J. Phillimore for the husband.

Simon for the King's Proctor.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 26. LORD MERRIMAN, P., read the following judgment. This is a husband's appeal against the dismissal on Oct. 10, 1947, by Mr. Commissioner Eddy of his petition for nullity of marriage. The suit was undefended.

By his petition, dated Mar. 10, 1947, the husband alleged that the non-consummation of the marriage was due to the wilful refusal of the wife to consummate the same, and, alternatively, that he was at the time of the ceremony of marriage and has ever since been incapable of consummating the same, that at the time of the ceremony of marriage he was unaware of his incapacity, and that the wife has repudiated the relationship of wife and the obligations of the marriage contract. Much of the difficulty in this case has been caused by the mutually inconsistent character of these allegations, one of which assumes that the husband was capable of consummating the marriage and that its non-consummation was owing to wilful refusal on the part of the wife, while the other asserts that the husband was, and still is, impotent. This, in my opinion, is an embarrassing form of pleading which should not be encouraged.

The parties went through a ceremony of marriage on Apr. 27, 1925. There appears to be no doubt that the marriage has never been consummated. At the time of the ceremony the husband was in holy orders and the evidence, which the learned commissioner accepted, shows that he had no experience in sexual matters. From the first, except on rare occasions, the spouses occupied separate rooms. Such attempts as the husband made to consummate the marriage failed entirely as he was unable even to obtain an erection. Soon after the marriage he consulted a doctor who gave him some tablets to stimulate him. It is not clear how long he persisted in his unsuccessful attempts, save that it is clear that they had been abandoned before he went with his wife to China in 1931. Twelve months later the wife returned to England for reasons of health and they were necessarily separated until his own return to this country in 1937. They lived together again until the husband joined the Royal Air Force as a chaplain in 1939. In 1940 he resigned both from the Royal Air Force and from the church and became a probation officer. Meanwhile the wife had joined the Women's Auxiliary Air Force with the result that, until she was demobilised in March, 1946, they saw very little of each other. The husband was living in rooms in Chelsea and they met occasionally for meals when she was on leave, but did not stay together. In May, 1946, the husband, having learnt through his welfare work that his sexual difficulties might simply be psychological, consulted Dr. Sharp. On Dr. Sharp's advice he resumed cohabitation with his wife in a furnished flat, but they still occupied separate rooms. During that time the husband said that he made three or four further attempts to consummate the marriage and that on several occasions he succeeded in obtaining an erection, having begun to realise as the result of Dr. Sharp's advice that he "was not so abnormal after all," and that with co-operation on his wife's part he thought he would have consummated the marriage, but he added that he had not a great deal of confidence in himself alone and did need co-operation. He described his wife's attitude in these words: "By that time she wanted to have nothing to do with the sex side of marriage. She said we had gone so many years without it and she was not going to start now with me." He described her lack of co-operation by saying that at least on one occasion she simply turned over on her side away from him. He again consulted Dr. Sharp in June or July and on his advice went to see Dr. Miller in Harley Street on July 24, 1946. Dr. Miller said that he found the husband physically normal apart from some under-development of the testicles, but that on examination semen was found to be markedly deficient in sperms. He considered that there was no reason to believe that the husband could not obtain an erection, but that it was extremely improbable that he could become a father. After that, according to the husband's evidence, he made one more attempt, but the wife said quite definitely that she was not going to start that side of married life and suggested that they might as well live apart, to which the husband added that he felt too that that was perhaps the better thing to do. After the medical evidence had been given the husband was recalled so that he might have an opportunity of amplifying his evidence about the attempts he made in 1946. Describing the resumption of cohabitation he said that he had told his wife that he had come to the conclusion that he was probably not impotent after all and that they must try and recapture the part of life that they had missed for so long, adding that in the first instance the wife did not say very much in reply. The three or four attempts came down to two or three between April and July, with regard to all of which the husband said that he did not force himself on his wife, that he got into her bed and tried to make love to her and to get her into the mood, but that she just did not want to have anything to do with him. From the beginning she turned away from him and after about the third attempt said: "We have not had this part of life over all these years and I do not propose to begin now," to which he just said, "It is rather a pity when I have found out that all this trouble is rather a psychological one." He could not say that all this occurred in one conversation, it was probably two. Finally, after some more discussion, the wife said: "I think you should go and live on your own if you really want that part of life because I do not." It is to be observed that apart from the general statement that on these occasions he tried to make love to his wife and to get her into the mood he gives no detailed description of his attempts. On his own description, even assuming that he was capable of effecting penetration, his efforts do not appear to have been resolute enough to overcome the natural reluctance of a wife who had been accustomed for over twenty years to be deprived of the sexual side of marriage life. Even assuming that he was right in saying that he could obtain an erection it is by no means certain that he could have maintained it so as to effect penetration, and it is to be observed that Dr. Sharp only suggested that, if penetration could be effected by one means or another, the result would be to cause an erection inside the vagina.

On this evidence the learned commissioner was pressed, as in the first instance this court was pressed, to find that non-consummation was due to the wife's wilful refusal to consummate. I need not pause to consider certain observations made by the learned commissioner on the question of the husband's acquiescence in a life which did not imply sexual relations, for, in my opinion, that question does not arise. I am not prepared to hold that the husband had such knowledge of all that it was material for him to know, not only as to the facts but as to the law, as to raise an estoppel based on approbation of the marriage in accordance with the test laid down by LORD SELBORNE in G. v. M. (1) (10 App. Cas. 171, 186). Apart from this the learned commissioner quite rightly said:

Moreover before I could hold that the marriage was not consummated owing to the wilful refusal of the respondent to consummate it, I should have to be satisfied that at least in the summer of 1946 the husband was himself capable of consummating it. I have given full weight to the opinion of the two doctors who were called before me but I feel bound to say that I cannot bring myself to hold that I feel certain that the husband was or is in fact capable of consummating the marriage. I do not myself see how anyone can be confident that what the husband had hopelessly failed to achieve in years gone by he could suddenly achieve in 1946. Having regard therefore to all the facts in this case I am of opinion that the first contention that the marriage was not consummated owing to the wilful refusal of the wife to consummate it fails.

Apart from the question to be discussed shortly whether the learned commissioner's doubts about the husband's capacity should not have gone further, I find it impossible to differ from his conclusion. It must be remembered that on this branch of the case the burden lies on the husband to prove affirmatively that the marriage has not been consummated owing to the wilful refusal of the wife to consummate it. Even assuming that the husband had satisfied the learned commissioner that, coupled with whatever he meant by co-operation on the part of the wife, he could on the occasion of one or other of these attempts have consummated the marriage, he would at most have proved that the marriage had not been consummated owing to his own impotence, accepted as a fact both by himself and the wife for over twenty-one years, coupled with the wife's expressed unwillingness, which seems to me not unreasonable in the circumstances, to make trial whether the husband's belated hope that he had become potent in the twenty-second year of the marriage was well founded: see Horton v. Horton (2) ([1947] 2 All E.R. 871, 874), per LORD JOWITT, L.C. It must be a question of degree, and, therefore, of evidence, whether in a case where potency has been acquired or restored after marriage, (whether by operation or by some psychological change), the effective cause of non-consummation at a given date is the refusal of the respondent, but in what I have said I must be taken to be dealing only with the facts of this case and not expressing any opinion about causation in general.

Being entitled to draw any inference of fact which the court below should have drawn, I think that the true inference is that in relation to his wife, at any rate, the husband always was, and still is, impotent, and that the learned commissioner should have made an express finding to this effect instead of basing his judgment on the failure to discharge the onus of proof. It is only fair to the learned commissioner to say that I appreciate the difficulty which was created by the embarrassment of the alternative pleading and the husband's insistence on the allegation of wilful refusal. Moreover, in drawing the positive inference on a matter which the learned commissioner decided on the onus of proof I am not over-ruling any finding of fact based on his estimate of the credibility of witnesses whom he saw and heard. Having arrived at this conclusion, there remains the difficult question of law whether an impotent spouse can, in any event, petition for nullity of marriage on the ground of his own incapacity to consummate the marriage, and, secondly, it being expressly admitted, as I think rightly, that there was no evidence that the wife had repudiated the marriage, whether in the absence of such repudiation on her part the husband is entitled to a decree. We have already held that the husband is entitled to petition for nullity on the ground of his own impotence and that his right to do so is not conditional on the repudiation of the marriage by the wife. Further, in view of the time that has elapsed since his petition was heard and dismissed, we decided to grant him a decree nisi at the conclusion of the hearing, but to reserve the reasons for our decision because of the importance of the questions of law involved.

A The real issue in this appeal having become apparent, we were made aware that a petition, pending in the provinces and raising precisely the same point, had been referred to the King's Proctor for his assistance on these questions of law and that the case had been adjourned for the decision of this appeal. We, therefore, adjourned the appeal for a few days in order that we might hear counsel on behalf of the King's Proctor. We have had the advantage of hearing an admirable argument on both sides of the question and are greatly indebted to counsel for their assistance. Unlike nullity on the ground of wilful refusal to consummate, which is a creature of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, nullity on the ground of impotence does not depend on any statute, save insofar as s. 22 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, directs the court, in all suits and proceedings other than those to dissolve any marriage, to act and give relief on principles and rules which, in the opinion of the court, shall be as nearly as may be conformable to the principles and rules on which the ecclesiastical courts had theretofore acted and given relief. The origin of the jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical courts in this respect is unquestionably to be found in the canon law, but it is essential to bear in mind the limitations on the effect to be given in this country to the canon law of Europe. On this point it is unnecessary to do more than refer to the well-known opinion of TINDAL, C.J., in tendering the advice of the judges to the House of Lords in R. v. Millis (3) (10 Cl. & Fin. 534, 680) :

C But that the canon law of Europe does not, and never did, as a body of laws, form part of the law of England, has been long settled and established law. LORD HALE defines the extent to which it is limited very accurately. "The rule," he says, "by which they proceed is the canon law, but not in its full latitude, and only so far as it stands uncorrected either by contrary Acts of Parliament or the common law and custom of England; for there are divers canons made in ancient times, and decretals of the Popes, that never were admitted here in England."

D On p. 681 he quotes LORD COKE as saying :

E So, albeit the Kings of England derived their ecclesiastical laws from others, yet so many as were proved, approved and allowed here, by and with a general consent, are aptly and rightly called "The King's Ecclesiastical Laws of England."

It was sought, however, to deduce from the use of the word "proved" in this last passage that the onus of showing that any part of the canon law has been received and adopted in this country lies on those who assert that it is so, and that if the matter is left in doubt it must be assumed that it has never been so adopted and received. I do not think that this is a question of the onus of proof at all. In Proctor v. Proctor (4), discussing the question whether a husband's suit based on the adultery of the wife was barred by his own subsequent adultery, SIR WILLIAM SCOTT said (2 Hag. Con. 292, 300) :

G If the canon law is to be taken as the guide, there is certainly an end of all question on the subject. If it be not, then the question must rest upon modern decisions of our own (which, I am sorry to say, no diligence of myself, or others, have been able to produce); and if they are wanting, recourse must be had to the general principles of reason, morality, and public convenience, applicable to such a case.

I In Hope v. Hope (5) a wife brought a suit for divorce against her husband by reason of his adultery. The husband recriminated the wife's adultery, and the suit was dismissed on the ground that both parties were proved guilty of adultery. The wife subsequently instituted a suit for restitution of conjugal rights, to which the husband pleaded in bar the previous suit and sentence. In his judgment DR. LUSHINGTON, having found that by the canon law an adulterous wife was entitled to be received by her husband if he had also been guilty of a similar offence, concluded as follows (1 Sw. & Tr. 94, 108) :

I do not find any instance in which the law so laid down has been adopted and acted upon as part of the ecclesiastical law of this land. I find a dictum of SIR W. WYNNE that, under such circumstances, a suit for restitution would probably be dismissed, and there is ground for inferring that such was the opinion of LORD STOWELL. The Court of Queen's Bench, in two cases occurring after an interval of thirty-five years, expressly declared that such was the law prevailing in the Ecclesiastical Court. In my humble judgment, that rule is sound in principle, and calculated to prove beneficial in its operation. I have therefore come to the conclusion, that the suit for restitution in this case cannot be sustained, and that the husband must be dismissed.

Bearing in mind that, although the common law courts prohibited any usurpation of jurisdiction by the ecclesiastical courts they have no right to correct error within the jurisdiction properly belonging to the ecclesiastical courts: R. v. St. Edmundsbury & Ipswich Diocese (6) ([1947] 2 All E.R. 170, 173, 174), it seems to me that the true position is that in the absence of precedent it was the duty of the ecclesiastical courts to determine as a matter of principle whether a particular doctrine of canon law should be accepted as part of the ecclesiastical law of this country. When, in 1857, jurisdiction in suits of nullity of marriage was transferred to the new court for divorce and matrimonial causes, s. 22 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, imposed on that court in turn the duty and the right to form an opinion whether any principle on which it was invited to act and give relief was as nearly as might be conformable to the principles on which the ecclesiastical courts had theretofore acted and given relief, a jurisdiction which is now, by ss. 32 and 103 of the Judicature Act, 1925, vested in the High Court and the Court of Appeal. This is not the same thing as to say that the court cannot act or give relief unless an exact precedent is found for the particular relief sought.

No records of the decisions of the ecclesiastical courts before the Reformation, or, indeed, for many years afterwards, are available, but there appears to be no reason to doubt that the right of the impotent spouse to sue, whatever were its origin and limits, was accepted in this country, but it is also clear that the canon law recognised two notable exceptions—first, where the petitioner himself, being aware of his own impotence, had knowingly deceived the other spouse into contracting the marriage; and, secondly, where one entered into matrimony with a spouse whom he knew at the time to be impotent. In neither case could he afterwards be heard to set the marriage aside. These doctrines accord with the general principles that a man must come into court with clean hands, and that he cannot take advantage of his own wrong, or rely on that as a grievance which he has voluntarily accepted with his eyes open. In one form or another the argument that the right of the impotent spouse to sue is unknown in English law was based on the maxim that a man cannot be heard to take advantage of his own wrong. It will be necessary to examine the application of this doctrine more closely; but it seems to me at the outset to be necessary to bear in mind the distinct classes of case in which impotence may arise. On the one hand, there is the class where impotence is due to some physical defect, which in turn may be plainly manifest to the impotent spouse as, e.g., where there is a complete absence of genitalia, or may be quite unknown, as, e.g., a malformation of the vagina which is not necessarily apparent at all until after marriage. Between these extremes there will be a variety of gradations. On the other hand, there is the class of defect which to all outward appearance are purely psychological, of which ejaculatio praecox on the part of the male, and vaginismus in the case of the female, are typical examples. In spite of the physical defects already referred to it is plain that in this case the husband's disability is mainly psychological. It is possible that psychological disabilities may be absolute rather than relative, and may be known to the party before the marriage, but, generally speaking, they are defects quoad hunc or quoad hanc, as the case may be, and were recognised as such by the canon law. Suffice it to say that such defects may often exist solely in relation to the particular marriage, or, at least, that it may, in the circumstances of any given case, be impossible to prove otherwise (see C. v. C. (7) ([1921] P. 399, 401-402), per LORD BIRKENHEAD, L.C.), and that when this is so it is difficult to attribute the so-called fault or wrong to one spouse alone. It may be no more than a misfortune common to both. The same observation applies with added force to the case, of which an example is to be found in the authorities to which I must refer, where non-consummation is due to the physical fact that in relation to each other the male organ is too large and the female too small, although it is impossible to attribute to either spouse an absolute or general incapacity to perform the sexual act. In such circumstances, assuming the absence of deceit on the part of the petitioner, it is clearly necessary to be cautious in basing a conclusion on the supposed analogy with the doctrine forbidding a suitor to take advantage of his own wrong. It being clear that the husband in contracting the marriage was wholly innocent of any deceit, it is common ground that the consideration of the authorities may begin with the assumption that before the Reformation this marriage could have been annulled at his instance.

The leading case on the point is Norton v. Seton otherwise Norton (8) decided in the Court of Arches in 1819, the headnote of which reads (3 Phillim. 147) :

A man not allowed to plead his own natural impotency as a ground for sentence of nullity of marriage.

A It will be necessary to examine closely the reasons for this decision of SIR JOHN NICHOLL, but for the moment I am concerned with the report of the argument of counsel. Doctor Adams and Doctor Dodson in objection to the libel argued that this was a novel suit which could not be entertained. They stated that they found no express law that a man might or might not complain on this ground but this was probably because no one could contemplate such a case. They called attention to the doctrine of the canon law that a person was not entitled to a divorce who knowingly contracted marriage with an impotent person and argued a fortiori that a person knowing of his own impotency could not make it the foundation for a suit for nullity of marriage. Doctor Phillimore and Doctor Lushington, on the other hand, argued that no doctrine of the canon law was clearer than that a man might sue for a nullity of marriage by reason of his own impotency. After citations from the commentaries, to some of which it will be necessary to refer, they admitted the doctrine that a man, who knowingly contracted marriage with an impotent person was not entitled to a divorce, but argued that the very same books laid down that he might allege his own impotency as a ground of divorce. SIR JOHN NICHOLL thereupon adjourned the hearing in order to examine the authorities to see what was the doctrine of the canon law, and how far it had been adopted in this country, and ordered a search to be made whether there had been any precedent for such a suit, adding (p. 151) : "If the defect is such as has been pleaded it seems as if the marriage must have been contracted scienter . . ." He also stressed the length of the cohabitation before the party came to annul his own contract. At the resumed hearing Doctor Phillimore (p. 151) pointed out the difficulties attending the search from the want of reported cases and the inaccurate manner in which the Arches books had been kept. It was stated (pp. 156-7) that the result of the search was that there were many instances of suits having been brought many years longer after the marriage than in the present instance, but none in which the party seeking redress had been the party labouring under the infirmity. Counsel, however, asserted that there had been undoubtedly many suits of which no traces could then be found.

On the basis that no precedent for such a suit in the ecclesiastical courts had been discovered counsel on behalf of the King's Proctor argued that the right of an impotent spouse to sue had never been accepted in this country after the Reformation, or that, if it ever had been accepted, it must have lapsed by desuetude over 200 years ago, since the earliest set of ecclesiastical reports, those of the judgments of SIR GEORGE LEE by Doctor Phillimore, carry the position back about seventy years before Doctor Phillimore's own reports. He developed this argument on two distinct lines of reasoning. The first argument was based on the nature of the canon law itself. By the canon law marriage was held to be one of the sacraments, but this doctrine was formally repudiated by art. 25 of the Articles of Religion. Moreover, by the canon law a marriage between impotent spouses was absolutely void, for the canon law recognised no distinction between void and voidable marriages, and thus it was possible for third parties, even after the death of one of the spouses, to attack a marriage on this ground. But, as appears from Ray v. Sherwood (9), the Court of King's Bench prohibited the ecclesiastical courts from exercising jurisdiction to annul a marriage on this ground after the death of either spouse. Doctor Lushington points out (1 Curt. 173, 188) that this was the origin of the distinction in English law whereby, in contrast with marriages absolutely void, such as bigamous marriages and the like, a marriage which has not been consummated owing to the impotence of one of the spouses is merely voidable, and then only at the instance of one or other of the spouses. From these considerations it was sought to draw the conclusion, based on the maxim cessante ratione cessat ipsa lex, that the right of the impotent spouse to sue cannot have been accepted in English law. I do not think it follows that the right of a spouse to rely on his own impotency is necessarily dependent in the canon law either on the sacramental character of marriage or on the distinction between void and voidable marriages. Secondly, it was argued that the doctrine would be so repugnant to English law that it cannot have been accepted after the Reformation. This was put in either of two ways : a marriage, being a contract of which the capacity to consummate it was an essential condition, the impotent party must necessarily be in default ; or, alternatively, by entering into a contract of marriage, the husband must be deemed to have represented himself as capable of consummating it and would thereby be estopped from seeking to annul the marriage by asserting the contrary : Pickard v. Sears (10) (6 Ad. & El. 469, 474). On the assumption however that such a suit is maintainable at all it was argued that it could only be maintainable if the marriage had been repudiated by the other spouse, and that, as there was admittedly no evidence of repudiation in this case, the petition must fail.

Although the status of marriage results from a contract it is well settled that, as was said by LORD HANNEN in Sottomayer v. De Barros (11) (5 P.D. 94, 101) : "Very many and serious difficulties arise if marriage be regarded only in the light of a contract." Nowhere was the suggestion that marriage was nothing but a contract, subject to all the legal incidents of an ordinary contract and giving rise to the like legal remedies, more emphatically repudiated than in the judgment of LORD PENZANCE in Mordaunt v. Mordaunt (12) (L.R. 2 P. & D. 109, 126-129). I will quote but one sentence on p. 129. He sums the matter up by saying :

When the analogy of legal remedies in other cases of contract is put forward for adoption the answer is that the analogy does not exist.

The fact that the decision of the Full Court, of whom LORD PENZANCE was one, was overruled by the House of Lords in Mordaunt v. Moncrieffe (12) does not detract from this part of LORD PENZANCE's judgment. On the contrary, the report in 43 L.J.P. & M. 49, shows that in advising the Lords both BRETT, J., at p. 53 and KELLY, C.B., at p. 61, were in complete agreement with LORD PENZANCE in this respect. The same point is made by SIR FRANCIS JEUNE, P., in Moss v. Moss (13) ([1897] P. 263, 267) where he says :

While habitually speaking of marriage as a contract, English lawyers have never been misled by an imperfect analogy into regarding it as a mere contract, or into investing it with all the qualities and conditions of ordinary civil contracts.

This brings me to an examination of the authorities. In the introduction to AYLIFFE'S PARERAGON (1726) the learned author expressly says that one of the designs of the work is to illustrate the force and practice of the canon law as far as it has been received and is now observed amongst Englishmen. In the body of the work at the end of the section headed : "Of divorce, and the several causes thereof" occurs this passage (p. 230) :

The husband may pray a separation of matrimony on the account of a matrimonial impediment, though such impediment proceeds and arises from himself : as from his own impotency and frigidity ; but if he knowingly marries a woman that cannot render him his due, he is (notwithstanding) bound to maintain her, and shall not be divorced from her ; for he ought to impute it to himself.

The next is OUGHTON'S ORDO JUDICIORUM (1738) Title CXCIH De Causis Matrimonialibus. In s. XVII, after referring to impotence, frigidity, malformation and the like as rendering a marriage null, the author says that these natural impediments may some times occur as well in the wife as in the husband. To this passage there is a footnote adding the quotation from the ancient manuscript "Et pars gravata agere potest, in causa nullitatis matrimonii." This may mean that the party aggrieved may sue, but may also be translated "the party afflicted may sue." Perhaps the former is the more natural construction, but as it is impossible to resolve the doubt it must be left there.

Next in order is an opinion of SIR WILLIAM WYNNE dated 1777 quoted in the report of Norton v. Seton (8) (3 Phillim. 147, 149, note (f)) :

I think a woman may institute a suit of nullity of marriage against her husband on account of impotency or incapacity in herself to perform the duties of marriage ; and I think that if the persons appointed by the court to inspect her (which is the method of proof upon which these cases always proceed) should certify that she appeared to them, from a defect in the natural formation of her body, to be absolutely incapable of being carnally known by a man ; upon this proof the marriage must be pronounced null and void.

That brings me again to Norton v. Seton (8). As appears from SIR JOHN NICHOLL's judgment (ibid., 159) the libel pleaded that the marriage took place in June, 1812, that the husband was a bachelor aged 45 years and the wife a spinster aged 23, that they cohabited till June, 1819, that they were both in health, but that the husband was incapable, from bodily defect, to consummate the marriage, and that his defect was incurable by art, as would appear upon inspection by medical persons. In the judgment SIR JOHN NICHOLL said (ibid., 158) :

The first objection is, that the suit is of a novel kind. After the best and most diligent search no instance has been found of a party bringing a suit to set aside a marriage on account of his own incapacity ; the party complaining has always been the injured party, and generally the suit has been brought by the wife ; there has been but one suit in my recollection brought by the husband, Wilson v. Wilson (14). The next circumstance is the age of the man. It is incredible that he should have lived forty-five years, and be ignorant of his own bodily defect, which he alleges to be apparent upon inspection. I do not see how his ignorance could be proved ; it is incapable of direct evidence. The presumption is in favour of the marriage ; besides there was a subsequent cohabitation of seven years before the suit was brought ; at all events he must have discovered it some time before he applied for his remedy.

Later, at p. 160, SIR JOHN NICHOLL says : " Ignorance of the fact is not only not to be presumed, but is almost incredible." He says (at p. 161) that the sole authority in support of the suit is the text quoted from the canon law and that it was necessary to examine how far that law applied to the case and how far it had been received in this country. He refers to the Decretal of Pope Gregory (X, 4, 15, 1) which is given in the margin of the PARERGON as the authority for the passage already quoted. At p. 162 SIR JOHN NICHOLL says :

But let us examine how the text and commentators apply to the present case. The text applies to frigidity, which may be unknown before trial ; but here the bodily defect is stated to be apparent . . . If the marriage was contracted scienter ; the party knew of the defect, and he could not be heard. The assertion of the defect in himself raises the presumption that he contracted the marriage scienter, that he cohabited scienter, and defrauded the woman. If the canon law is to govern the case, the text referred to does not come up to the point ; even if it did, something more would have to be shewn, namely, that it has been received as the law in this country ; it might not be necessary for this purpose to shew a case precisely similar ; it would be sufficient to shew that it is according to the general rules observed here. But it is a strong, and almost a conclusive, presumption against the present proceeding that no suit appears ever to have been brought by any but the injured party.

At p. 163 he deals with SIR WILLIAM WYNNE's opinion by saying :

Another authority has been cited from the opinion of counsel ; but that was on the case of a woman. The opinion of any person of higher authority cannot be produced than of that person : but it cannot be considered as an authority applying to this case. The court does not mean to lay it down in no possible case, or under no circumstances, a woman may not be allowed to bring such a suit. But even if the canon law is direct on the point—is it according to the law of England to receive such a suit ? It is a maxim that no man shall take advantage of his own wrong ; it is the principle of the canon law itself, the principle of reason and justice.

I have refrained from quoting passages from the judgment relating to the length of the cohabitation and the enjoyment of the wife's property and the impossibility of drawing corroboration from inspection of the wife owing to her pregnancy which also weighed with SIR JOHN NICHOLL, but it is evident that his judgment is founded in the main on his belief that the husband entered into the marriage well knowing his physical defects and so deceived the wife into marrying him. This, indeed, offended the principle that no man shall take advantage of his own wrong, and that this was a principle of the canon law itself appears from SANCHEZ DISPUTATIO CXIV (1626 ed., p. 404). It is not surprising, therefore, that no precedent for a suit of that kind had been found, but that does not dispose of the general point. In view, however, of the passage in the introduction to the PARERGON, to which reference has already been made, I am unable to accept SIR JOHN NICHOLL's dismissal of the PARERGON on the ground that the learned author merely referred to the text of the canon law. It is true that that is the sole authority cited, but the book professes to be a commentary on the canon law of England. SIR JOHN NICHOLL's qualified acceptance of SIR WILLIAM WYNNE's opinion that a woman may institute a suit of nullity of marriage against her husband on account of impotency or incapacity in herself to perform the duties of marriage seems to me to show that SIR JOHN NICHOLL cannot have meant that an impotent spouse could in no circumstances put forward his own incapacity. Indeed, he expressly stated, at p. 163, that he did not mean to lay it down that in no possible case or in no circumstances a woman might not be allowed to bring such a suit. By this I think he must have meant to draw the distinction, which appears earlier in this judgment, between the case of a man and a woman in respect of physical defects, i.e., defects which, in the nature of things, would be apparent in the case of the man before marriage but not necessarily in the case of the woman. However this may be, it is sufficient to say that Norton v. Seton (8) does not purport to deal with a case, such as the present, where the disability is of a kind which, as SIR JOHN NICHOLL recognised (at p. 162) is not necessarily apparent before marriage and of which the petitioner was wholly ignorant. The decision itself can clearly be supported on the ground of deceit.

POYNTER in his DOCTRINE AND PRACTICE OF THE ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS (1824 ed., p. 131) says :

Until a recent case, it is said that there was no instance on record of a party having brought a sentence of nullity by reason of his or her own infirmity.

The learned author quotes the passage from the PARERAGON already referred to and adds :

In such a case, the party proceeding is more particularly bound to a strict proof of all necessary facts.

He then deals with the instance alluded to, which was Norton v. Seton (8), showing that he regards the case as having been decided both on the absence of the corroboration by inspection of the wife and on the ground of scienter. It is clear, however, that he does not regard that decision as overriding the general proposition accepted in the PARERAGON. In Miles v. Chilton (15) (1 Rob. Ecc. 684, 695), DOCTOR LUSHINGTON, who had appeared for the husband in Norton v. Seton (8), distinguished it from the case, with which he was dealing, of a marriage absolutely void as being bigamous. He clearly regarded Norton v. Seton (8) as being founded on the fact that the husband knew of his own defects at the time of the marriage (p. 697), but even in this respect he did not hesitate to say (on p. 699) that he thought there were grounds which should have induced SIR JOHN NICHOLL to admit the libel. Again in B. v. B. (16) DOCTOR LUSHINGTON, as Judge Ordinary, said (1 Spinks Ecc. & Ad. 248, 254) :

I do not consider it necessary to travel through the case of Norton v. Seton (8). It is sufficient to say that it was a suit in which the husband, the party complaining, alleged his own impotency, though by the canon law that circumstance may not be an obstacle to the suit, provided the complaining party was at the date of the marriage ignorant of the defect ; still if the marriage be contracted scienter, as SIR JOHN NICHOLL in Norton v. Seton (8) considered to be the case, the party will not be permitted to take advantage of his own fraud.

This judgment was affirmed by the Privy Council (ibid., 257), but without reference to this particular passage. The real point in that case was whether the right of the potent spouse was barred by delay. In DR. BISHOP'S NEW COMMENTARIES ON MARRIAGE, DIVORCE AND SEPARATION, 1891, vol. I, s. 792, p. 341, the learned author deals with the question of the grievance as follows :

Whether impotent party sue : One who, being in fact impotent yet ignorant of his condition, enters into a marriage, especially with a competent person, is injured, and not the less so because of the greater injury which he inflicts on the other. Therefore in just principle he, as well as the other, is entitled to the suit for nullity. For only through actual choice and knowledge should any person be held in this painfully embarrassing relation, as uncongenial to the impotent spouse as to the other. But whether or not under any circumstances the law, as viewed from the standpoint of authority, will sustain a suit by the impotent party is a question upon which opinions are conflicting ; and as it will not often arise in practice, it is deemed sufficient simply to cite the authorities. It is pertinent to ask how, if this sort of suit is not maintainable, the marriage in a case of equal "impotence versus hanc", is to be dissolved.

I find it difficult to answer this very pertinent question except on the footing that in the absence of actual choice or knowledge it is open to either spouse to sue.

This brings me to an examination of the modern cases. In A. v. A., sued as B. (17) the impotent spouse was granted a decree after a demurrer to the petition had been overruled both by WARREN, J., and by the Irish Court of Appeal. It is plain that the judgments in the Court of Appeal on the demurrer are based on the finding that the wife had repudiated the marriage. I will return to this point later. That case was followed in G. v. G. otherwise K. (18). There the marriage had been celebrated in accordance with the rites of the Armenian Church but was not in conformity with the form prescribed by the Registration Act, 1836. Five years after the marriage the wife returned to her parents and refused to resume cohabitation, and, thereupon, the husband brought a suit of restitution to which the wife alleged, in her answer, that the marriage was invalid owing to the omission of the requisite forms, the husband, in reply, pleading that the omission was not wilful within the meaning of the Act. The wife then presented a cross-petition for nullity on the alternative grounds that there was no valid marriage as to form and that the marriage had not been consummated owing to the incapacity of the husband. The husband denied the non-consummation. LORD GORELL, P., decided to try the nullity suit first and found that there had been no consummation of the marriage, but expressly guarded himself from suggesting a general condition of incompetence against the husband, the condition existing only relatively to the wife. It was a case in which the relative sizes of the parts had prevented consummation and the wife had declined to undergo an operation which might have been successful. Unfortunately, there is only a brief report of the judgment in the Court of Appeal, and, in spite of the fact that LORD COZENS-HARDY, M.R., said (25 T.L.R. 328, 329) that the appeal was of some importance as being without precedent in the English courts, the case is not reported elsewhere. LORD COZENS-HARDY, M.R., said that the President had acted wisely and within his powers in trying the issue of fact before the issue of law. On the point as to jurisdiction he desired to adopt the principle of the Irish courts laid down in A. v. A., sued as B. (17), in which a strong court had decided that a decree of nullity might be granted at the suit of an impotent person. He added, however, that this was a discretion which the court should exercise very carefully. In upholding the President's finding of impotency, the MASTER OF THE ROLLS said that this implied no reflection on either party as each could, no doubt, contract marriage with another person. It was true that an operation might make the wife apta to this man, but the court could not require it to be done. He added that he did not think it right that these persons should be compelled to live together in those circumstances. He thought that the order of the President should be affirmed, but in a modified form so as to avoid any reflection on the general capacity of the husband. FLETCHER MOULTON and FARWELL, L.J.J., agreed, FARWELL, L.J., adding that he did not think the wife guilty of a wrong because she declined to submit to an operation. It was argued that by adopting the principle laid down in A. v. A., sued as B. (17) the Court of Appeal must be taken to have decided that a petition by an impotent spouse is only admissible if the respondent has repudiated the marriage. In my opinion, the Court of Appeal decided nothing of the kind. The case was one of physical incapacity, relative and mutual. It was the wife who was the petitioner for nullity and she had refused to submit to an operation which would probably have been successful, although this was held not to debar her from petitioning. The husband, on the contrary, so far from repudiating the marriage was asserting his own capacity which, except quoad hanc, was found in his favour, and was actually suing for restitution of conjugal rights. That being so, the decision to grant the wife, who was herself impotent quoad hunc, a decree based on the corresponding impotence of the husband had no connection whatever with any repudiation of the marriage by the husband. On the contrary, it seems to me to be an excellent example of the dilemma posed by DR. BISHOP in the passage already quoted from his work. The fact that a physical, rather than psychological, disability was involved is irrelevant, since the mutual disability was merely in relation to the other spouse and not general, nor was it suggested that either spouse was aware of it at the time of the celebration.

In S.G. v. W.G. (19), in answer to the wife's action for declarator that there had been a lawful marriage per verba de praesenti at Gretna Green, the husband not only denied that a contract of marriage had been entered into, but averred that, at the date of the alleged marriage, he was and still remained impotent and that any ceremony of marriage entered into by the parties was on that account null and void. The averment of impotency was held to be irrelevant as a defence in respect that, by the law of Scotland, a marriage was not void but only voidable on the ground of impotency; but the court expressly reserved the question whether an action of nullity of marriage on the ground of impotency is competent at the instance of the impotent spouse. On this issue there are some very useful passages in the judgments, but I do not think it necessary to quote them in view of the decision of the question by the Court of Session in F. v. F. (20) to which I will refer later. It is, however, important to notice that the ground of the decision itself was that in Scots law, as in English law, a marriage is not void but only voidable on the ground of impotency.

In G. v. G. (21) each spouse alleged that the admitted non-consummation arose through the incapacity or physical defect of the other. According to the report of the medical inspectors, the husband was anatomically well formed and normal in every respect and was, apparently, capable of performing the act of generation. The wife was found to be virgo intacta and there was no impediment on her part to prevent consummation of the marriage. BARGRAVE DEANE, J., said ([1912] P. 173, 174) that it was manifest that the marriage had not been consummated and could not be consummated, but he was not prepared to say whether it was the fault of the man or the woman. He added:

I see no reason to hold that either one or the other has been guilty of perjury. Their stories are absolutely inconsistent; but that is immaterial, if I am satisfied that, quoad hunc et quoad hunc, these people cannot consummate the marriage. If for some reason which is not quite clear, but in fact, the court is satisfied that the marriage cannot be consummated, then the court is entitled to annul the marriage and not tie the two people together for the rest of their lives in a state of misery. Therefore I am prepared to pronounce a decree in this case, not on the petition of either of them, but on the petition of both of them, leaving either of them to apply to make the decree absolute, both, if possible.

Apart from the distinction that the disability was psychological and that each spouse was petitioning and was granted a decree, the principle of the decision is essentially the same as that of the Court of Appeal in G. v. G. otherwise K. (18), since the learned judge was prepared to grant a decree to each spouse as the petitioner, although he or she may have been impotent quoad the other, and although he was not able definitely to find impotence proved against either spouse as the respondent to the other's suit. In my opinion, the case cannot be discounted merely as an instance of each petitioner succeeding on the ground of the impotence of the other. It was followed by SWIFT, J., in H. v. H. (22), where the wife was allowed to amend her answer to the husband's petition for nullity by adding a cross-prayer for nullity. In Davies (otherwise Mason) v. Davies (23) LANGTON, J., based his decision in favour of the impotent wife in respect of that which he described as a "misfortune" on the repudiation of the marriage by the husband while expressly reserving the question whether apart from the repudiation the wife could have sued.

In McM. v. McM. (24), an Irish case, the husband petitioned for nullity on the grounds of his own impotence and of the repudiation of the contract by the wife. HANNA, J., having made a full and useful review of the canon law and of the authorities, held that the wife had not repudiated the contract and that consequently the husband could not rely on his own impotence and accordingly decided that the petition must be dismissed. I do not find it easy to understand the principle first introduced by the Irish cases that the repudiation of the marriage by the respondent gives the impotent spouse a remedy to which he or she is not otherwise entitled. The hypothesis is that by reason of the petitioner's wrong or default, defect or misfortune, as it has variously been described, he or she is not entitled to sue, but that, if there is added the circumstance that, for this very reason, the respondent has repudiated the marriage, there is a cause of action. This question is dealt with very fully by HANNA, J., in McM. v. McM. (24) in two passages. After referring to the passage in LORD SELBORNE'S judgment in G. v. M. (1) (10 App. Cas. 171, 186), dealing with estoppel by approbation of the marriage, he says ([1936] I.R. 177, 205):

It is quite logical that there may be conduct on the part of the person opposing the petition, which would estop that person from denying "the just cause," and support the ground of the petition by creating a further moral equity in the petitioner's support. In other words, a petitioner, while relying upon his own impotence as a ground for showing that there is no verum matrimonium, may show conduct on the part of a respondent which estops or precludes him or her from justly controverting the primary allegation that there is no verum matrimonium. This seems to be the underlying principle.

At pp. 219, 220, HANNA, J., says:

To sum up finally on this difficult question of law, and having considered the argument advanced in its three branches, I have formed a definite opinion that the decree for nullity of marriage cannot, according to the principles of the ecclesiastical law as administered in our matrimonial courts, be granted to a petitioner on the ground merely of a petitioner's own impotence, but it is clearly established that if a petitioner can, in addition to proof of his own impotency, satisfy the court that there had been, and is, conduct on the part of the respondent which has destroyed the verum matrimonium, e.g., by a genuine and deliberate repudiation of the marriage contract and its obligations, the court may ex justa causa grant the relief.

To base the principle on estoppel of the respondent clearly leads to difficulties if the argument that the petitioner cannot sue because he is estopped from denying his own implied representation of capacity is accepted, for this would lead to the position that each party in turn was estopped from suing. Moreover, I do not find it easy to deduce from the cases in which repudiation by the respondent has been relied on any principle by which to determine whether there has been such a repudiation as to entitle the impotent spouse to sue. In McM. v. McM. (24) the finding that the wife had not repudiated the marriage, although she had refused to return to her husband, partly on account of his violence and partly on account of what is described as his neurasthenic condition over sexual matters, is based on the finding (at p. 199) that she would not, in any way, repudiate the marriage contract (which to her was a sacrament) save under a decree of her own church though she herself had refrained from instituting any such proceedings. The decision, therefore, appears to turn on the wife's motive for her action rather than on the action itself. On the other hand, in A. v. A., sued as B. (17) the repudiation by the wife, whose motives may have been equally good, was based on her having instituted proceedings in the church courts though she had declined to proceed in the High Court for nullity. Likewise, in B. v. M. (25) the wife, having left Australia for the United States of America, obtained a decree of nullity there. In B. v. B. (26) an impotent wife, who had refused to submit to an operation which would probably have cured the defect, obtained a decree about eight months after the marriage ceremony on the grounds that the husband had repudiated the marriage because in consequence of her incapacity he had struck her in the face and deserted her some six weeks after the marriage. In Davies (otherwise Mason) v. Davies (23) the husband's repudiation was based on the allegation that he had not provided a home for the wife or contributed anything to her support, had had no concern for her welfare when ill, and had said that he had lost all desire for intercourse after efforts to consummate the marriage during the first year had failed and that he had said that he had no intention of living with the wife and she could go her own way.

Manifestly, the strongest support for the inference of repudiation is afforded by the institution of proceedings to annul the marriage by the potent spouse. Yet in such a case the petitioner is merely seeking the relief to which he or she is justly entitled for a grievance which the impotent spouse is assumed not to have suffered. How, then, can this give the impotent spouse the right to sue? In my opinion, the sounder view is that the reaction of the respondent to the situation created by the impotence of the petitioner should be taken into account in considering whether the circumstances of the case as a whole, including the respondent's attitude, are such as to debar the impotent spouse from suing. It is manifestly impossible to speak otherwise than in general terms, for the circumstances will vary infinitely. The real antithesis, it seems to me, is between saying, on the one hand, that the impotent spouse has no cause of action unless the other spouse has repudiated the marriage, whatever that phrase may mean, and, on the other hand, allowing the impotent spouse the right to sue unless in the circumstances of the case it is unjust that he or she should do so. In any given case the court will naturally bear in mind LORD SELBORNE'S admonition in Cuno v. Cuno (27) (L.R. 2 Sc. & Div. 300, 301), that it would be a great error on the part of judges to suffer their feelings of compassion to prevail over the principles which ought to govern them in dealing with this class of case, and that to open the door to lax and easy declarations of nullity would be a grave public mischief.

That brings me to the latest authority on this difficult question, the decision of the Court of Session in F. v. F. (20). This was a husband's action for declarator that the marriage was null and void by reason of his own impotency. There was no appearance for the wife. The husband averred that he had resided with the wife from the date of the ceremony in August, 1943, until April, 1944, when he left her; that during this period he had attempted to have sexual relations with her, but had found he was unable to do so; and that he was incapable, by reason of physical deformity, of having sexual relations and had been so incapable at the time of the pretended marriage. The LORD ORDINARY (MACKINTOSH), on a motion by the husband for a proof of his averments, reviewed the authorities, expressed a doubt whether any reliable assistance was to be got from the decision of the Court of Appeal in G. v. G. otherwise K. (18), and indicated that except for the case of S.G. v. W.G. (19) he would have dismissed the action as incompetent; but that as the question of competency now arising was in that case expressly left open he thought it proper not to deal with the motion before a proof but to report the case to the Inner House. Thus, the question was dealt with by the Inner House as a pure question of law; and they decided to instruct the LORD ORDINARY that the instance was good and that the action should be allowed to proceed. In spite of the husband's averment that his incapacity was due to physical deformity the case appears to have been argued on the footing that the husband was not aware of his impotence until after the marriage ceremony. Before dealing with the judgment of the LORD PRESIDENT (NORMAND) I wish to refer to a passage in LORD MONCRIEFF'S judgment where he says (1945 S.C. 202, 210):

The decision of the Court of Appeal in England in the case of G. v. G. (21) is directly in point and is unambiguous. I remain of the opinion which I expressed in my report in L. v. L. (28) that the consistorial law of Scotland should not consult English decisions. In cases in which the question to be determined is, however, a broad humanitarian question which is independent of proper consistorial law, I think that our courts are entitled, and may do well, to accept guidance from what has been decided by learned judges in England.

Conversely, it was argued by counsel for the King's Proctor that no attention should be paid to this decision because of the greater authority of the canon law in Scotland. It is indisputable that there are divergences between the laws of the two countries in relation to divorce. The case of desertion is the clearest example, and others are to be found in connection with condonation, collusion and connivance, but counsel was unable to point to any essential difference in the law of the two countries as regards nullity, and, as has already been seen, it is well settled in both countries that impotence merely renders a marriage voidable and not void.

Seeing that the Court of Appeal assumed in De Reneville v. De Reneville (29) that the residence of both parties, as distinct from domicile, might be sufficient to found jurisdiction in the case of nullity, it would obviously be in the highest degree inconvenient if the law of the two countries were to differ on the question now under discussion unless that is inevitable. This brings me finally to the judgment of the LORD PRESIDENT (NORMAND). I need not quote from his review of the authorities, to many of which I have already referred. His conclusion is expressed in the following passage (1945 S.C. 202, 208):

In principle any person who has a title and interest in the subject-matter of an action is a competent pursuer, and it is a general rule of our law that title rests upon interest. There are exceptions to this general rule, but I know of none which bears relevantly on the present question. Taking the general rule as a useful test, it can hardly be questioned that the impotent spouse has an equal interest with the potent spouse in a question which vitally affects his or her status. The bond of a marriage which cannot be consummated, it may be added, can be as irksome and humiliating to the impotent as to the other spouse. If, therefore, the impotent spouse is to be denied the remedy, it is necessary to inquire what is the supposed ground for this denial. LORD FRASER speaks of the potent spouse as the party aggrieved. But, with respect, both alike are aggrieved; and to treat the potent spouse as alone aggrieved is to imply that the impotent spouse is in some sense a defaulter, as though he or she had failed to implement a contract and was debarred from founding on his or her default . . . Where the incapacity results from a physical or temperamental condition, for which the sufferer is not responsible, he cannot be debarred from the remedy on the ground that he has defaulted in his obligations. There may, of course, be circumstances which will bar the impotent spouse. If, for example, he or she entered into marriage knowing the defect, the other spouse would indeed be entitled to complain, and to plead the suppressio veri in bar of the action. But the report in the present case does not mention any facts suggestive of a plea of personal bar, and it is not necessary to consider further what circumstances would properly give rise to it. The only other ground for refusing the remedy to the impotent spouse that has been put forward is that it is contrary to public policy that the remedy should be open to anyone but the potent spouse. But I cannot see any reason for thinking that the public interest is injured by allowing the impotent spouse an equal right to sue, and on this I agree entirely with the opinion of LORD MURRAY.

The reference is to S.G. v. W.G. (19) (1933 S.C. 728, 735).

I find myself in complete agreement with this conclusion which exactly expresses my own view of the matter. In my opinion, there is no reason in principle or on authority why the same should not be declared to be the law of England.

ATKINSON v. GOODLASS WALL & LEAD INDUSTRIES, LTD.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Singleton J.), July 8, 1948.]

Income Tax—Income from foreign possessions—New source in year of assessment—

Shares in foreign company—Shares purchased between 1932 and 1936—First payment of dividend in 1943—Finance Act, 1926 (c. 22), s. 30, proviso (ii).

By the Finance Act, 1926, s. 30, proviso (ii): "If in any year of assessment [in respect of profits or income chargeable under inter alia Case V of sched. D] any person acquires a new source of any such profits or income or an addition to any source of any such profits or income, income tax in respect of the profits or income from that source or from the addition to that source shall be computed separately . . ."

A company owned the whole of the issued ordinary shares in a foreign company, these shares being issued between 1932 and 1936. In January, 1943, the foreign company declared a dividend for the first time on its ordinary shares. The sterling equivalent of the amount of this dividend received by the company was £7,434, and an additional assessment in this sum was made on the company under sched. D, Case V.

HELD: the words "in any year of assessment" in s. 30, proviso (ii), meant "in the year of assessment for which tax is then being computed," and, therefore, tax was not to be computed, under s. 29 (1) (b) of the Act of 1926, "as respects the year of assessment in which the income first arises, on the full amount of the income arising within that year," and the assessment must be discharged.

CASE STATED by Special Commissioners of Income Tax.

At a meeting of the commissioners on July 18, 1946, Goodlass Wall & Lead Industries, Ltd. (hereinafter called "the company") appealed against an additional assessment to income tax made under sched. D, Case V, in the sum of £7,434 for the year ending April 5, 1943. The company owned the whole of the issued ordinary shares in Goodlass Wall y Cie, a company incorporated in the Argentine Republic. These shares were issued as follows :—1932 : nominal value, $500,000 ; 1933 : nominal value, $100,000 ; 1934 : nominal value, $200,000 ; 1936 : nominal value, $100,000. The company held shares in other foreign companies from which it received dividends in 1942/43 and in the preceding year and was assessed to income tax thereon. At the time when the assessment for 1942/43 was made in respect of the income from these shares the inspector of taxes did not know that the appellant company had received any income from the shares in the Argentine company. In January, 1943, Goodlass Wall y Cie declared a dividend for the first time on its ordinary shares. The sterling equivalent of the amount of this dividend received by the company after deduction of Argentine income tax was £7,434. The assessment in question was intended to comprise this sum. It was contended on behalf of the company that the source of the income of £7,434 in respect of which the additional assessment was made for 1942/43, was not acquired in 1942/43, and, that, therefore, the assessment should be discharged. It was contended on behalf of the inspector of taxes that, even if the shares in the Argentine company were an addition acquired by the appellant company in a year of assessment before 1942/43 to a source of income chargeable under Case V of sched. D, nevertheless under s. 30, proviso (ii), of the Finance Act, 1926, the income from the shares in the Argentine company had to be computed separately and the provisions of proviso (b) of s. 29 (1) of the said Act applied, with the result that, as respects the year of assessment in which income from the Argentine shares first arose, namely 1942/43, income tax had to be computed on the full amount of the income arising within that year namely, £7,434. The commissioners discharged the assessment and the inspector of taxes appealed. SINGLETON, J., now dismissed the appeal.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Frank Soskice, K.C.) and R. P. Hills for the Crown. Donovan, K.C., and Graham-Dixon for the company.

SINGLETON, J. : Section 29 (1) of the Finance Act, 1926, provides :

Such enactments in the Income Tax Acts as provide that income tax under sched. D shall in certain cases be computed on the full amount of the balance of the profits or gains, or on the full amount of the income, upon an average of three years, and so much of rr. 1 and 2 of the Rules applicable to Case IV of sched. D as provides that income tax under that Case shall be computed on the full amount of the income which arises, or which has been or will be received in the year of assessment, shall cease to have effect, and any income tax in respect of profits or gains or income chargeable under Case I, Case II, Case IV, or Case V of sched. D which would but for the foregoing provisions of this section have been computed as aforesaid shall be computed, subject to the provisions of this Part of this Act and subject as hereinafter provided, on the full amount of the profits or gains or income of the year preceding the year of assessment.

Proviso (b) to s. 29 (1) provides :

In the case of income tax chargeable under Case IV or Case V of sched. D—(i) income tax shall be computed, as respects the year of assessment in which the income first arises, on the full amount of the income arising within that year.

I confess that I thought, when my attention was first directed to that, that the problem was a comparatively simple one. I could not see why s. 29 (1), proviso (b) (i), did not apply. It appeared to me that this income, having been received in the year of assessment, first arose in that year and ought to be included in the full amount of the income arising in that year. It was pointed out, however, that that proviso does not apply to this case unless it is brought in by virtue of s. 30. The reason is that some time ago a question of this character was considered in the House of Lords in Diggines v. Forestal Land, Timber and Railway Co., Ltd. (1) and the decision is stated in the headnote as follows : (15 Tax Cas. 630) :

The respondent company was in receipt of dividends from foreign companies in various countries. The point at issue was whether the consequent liability to Income Tax, sched. D, under Case V, for the years 1921-22 to 1926-27 should be based on the average amount of the whole of the dividends arising to the company from foreign companies in the three years of average, or upon the footing that each of the holdings of shares was a separate source of income separately assessable. Held, that the liability should be based on the average amount of the whole of the dividends.

I notice that ROWLATT, J., expressed his regret at not being able to deal with the question as he felt himself bound by a decision of the Scottish Courts, as did the majority of the Court of Appeal, but their decision was upset by a unanimous decision of the House of Lords to the effect that I have read.

Before the year of assessment the company had income from foreign investments, so the income did not first arise within that year. That is common ground between the parties. So one has to go to s. 30, which says :

All profits or income in respect of which any person is chargeable either under r. 1 of the Rules applicable to Case III of sched. D, or under Case IV of sched. D or under Case V of sched. D may respectively be assessed and charged in one sum . . .

That is the block assessment, as counsel for the company called it, and, as he said, the word "may" is almost, if not quite, equivalent to "shall." Proviso (i) to s. 30 is not directly relevant, though it was used before me to illustrate an argument, and I shall refer to it by and by. Proviso (ii) is in these terms :

If in any year of assessment any person acquires a new source of any such profits or income or an addition to any source of any such profits or income, income tax in respect of the profits or income from that source or from the addition to that source shall be computed separately, and in the case of profits or income chargeable under r. 1 of the Rules applicable to Case III the provisions of para. (1) of r. 2 of those rules shall apply, and in the case of profits or income chargeable under Case IV or Case V of sched. D the provisions of proviso (b) to sub-s. (1) of the last preceding section of this Act shall apply.

If I may try to put it shortly, if in any year of assessment any person acquires a new source of such income, the income from that source shall be computed separately and the provisions of proviso (b) to s. 29 (1) shall apply. It is in that way that the proviso to s. 29 (1) is brought in. It is on the true construction of proviso (ii) to s. 30 that the parties differ. There is only one difference between them, and it is as to what is the true meaning in the sub-section of the words, "If in any year of assessment. . ."

The submission of the learned SOLICITOR-GENERAL was that the words, "If in any year of assessment," meant "If in any year," or "If at any time," and that the word "any" must be read as inconsistent with the limitation suggested by the other side. His submission was that there had been a new source of income, a source acquired some years back, but still a new source of income acquired in some year of assessment, and, therefore, it was within the words, "If in any year of assessment." Counsel for the company, on the other hand, submitted that if one were reading the words, "If in any year of assessment," in their natural and ordinary sense one would regard them as referring to the year in respect of which income or tax was being computed. He referred to the first proviso to s. 30 as showing how one must read the like words in that proviso, and he asked : "Why should one give the words a different meaning in proviso (ii) from that which they must have in proviso (i) ?" Proviso (i) is :

If in any year of assessment any person charged or chargeable in respect of any such profits or income as aforesaid ceases to possess any particular source of any such profits or income or any part of any such source, income tax in respect of the profits or income from that source or that part shall be computed separately, and the provisions of the section in this Part of this Act which relates to the discontinuance of a trade, profession or vocation, shall, subject to the necessary modifications, apply in any such case as if the cesser of the possession of the source or part were the discontinuance of a trade.

The section in that Part of the Act which relates to the discontinuance of a trade, profession or vocation is s. 31, which provides :

(1) Where in any year of assessment a trade, profession or vocation is permanently discontinued, then, notwithstanding anything in this part of this Act—(a) the person charged or chargeable with tax in respect thereof shall be charged for that year on the amount of the profits or gains of the period beginning on April 6 in that year and ending on the date of the discontinuance. . . .

Counsel claimed that that section, and, in particular, the words "for that year," showed that when one is interpreting the words "in any year of assessment" in the first proviso to s. 30, the meaning must be "in any year of assessment in respect of which one is computing tax or income," and his submission was that the words in proviso (ii) to s. 30 must be read in the same way.

The SOLICITOR-GENERAL reinforced his point strongly by his reference to the other provisos in s. 29 (1) (b). He pointed out that it was difficult to see how the later provisos, (b) (ii), (iii) and (iv), could work if the company's submission in regard to the meaning of proviso (i) was right. Counsel for the company submitted that those provisos could be worked, and said: "Once a company comes within proviso (ii) to s. 30 it falls within the provisos to s. 29 (1) and stays there until each of those provisos is exhausted." It is a little difficult for me to see how they can work, but I appreciate that there is an argument on that matter.

It is to be remembered that s. 30, proviso (ii), deals with a new source of income, not with increased income from an old source nor with new income from a new source. If proviso (ii) of s. 30 applies, it brings in the provisions of proviso (b) (i) of s. 29 (1), with the result that under proviso (b) (i) income tax on the £7,434 would be computed in respect of the year of assessment. I was referred to various other sections, in particular, to certain definitions in the Income Tax Act, 1918, and to one or two sections of that Act which are made applicable by s. 37 of the Finance Act, 1926. Section 2 of the Income Tax Act, 1918, is:

Every assessment and charge to tax shall be made for a year commencing on April 6 and ending on the following April 5, except where under the provisions of this Act weekly wage-earners are to be assessed and charged [half-yearly].

By s. 237 :

In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires : . . . "Year of assessment" means, with reference to any tax, the year for which such tax was granted by any Act granting duties of income tax.

I think that lends force to the argument when it is read with s. 2 of that Act. The SOLICITOR-GENERAL directed my attention to the words "unless the context otherwise requires," and he submitted that here the context did otherwise require—if it was necessary to go as far as that—because of the terms of s. 29, provisos (b) (ii), (iii) and (iv). I was also referred to the usual form of grant of tax which, for the year in question, the year 1942, was in s. 21 of the Finance Act, 1942 :

Income tax for the year 1942-43 shall be charged at the standard rate of ten shillings in the pound . . .

I do not pretend that this is an easy case, but on the whole, faced, as I am, with the task of interpreting the words in s. 30, proviso (ii), of the Finance Act, 1926 : "If in any year of assessment any person acquires a new source of any such profits or income or an addition to any source of any such profits . . ." I express the view that that means : "If in the year of assessment with which the taxing authority is then dealing," or "If in the year for which tax is then being computed." That view is strengthened by the terms of the interpretation section of the Income Tax Act, 1918, and still more by those of proviso (i) of s. 30 and the considerations thereunder. I cannot see why one ought to be asked to read the words "in any year of assessment" in any different sense in proviso (ii) of s. 30 from that which applies in the case of proviso (i). The result is that the argument put forward by the learned SOLICITOR-GENERAL on behalf of the Crown fails and this appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Harman, J.), July 28, 1948.]

Will—Construction—Power to tenant for life to appoint to issue—Exercise during life of tenant for life—“As well the capital as the income . . . with such future or other trusts . . . and such provisions for their respective advancement . . . at the discretion of . . . my trustees” as the tenant for life should appoint.

A By his will, dated Aug. 6, 1910, a testator, who died on May 11, 1911, gave his residuary estate to his trustees to hold a share thereof on trust to pay the income arising from such share to his daughter D. for her life, without power of alienation or anticipation, and “from and after the death of my daughter D. as to as well the capital as the income thereof upon trust for all or such one or more exclusively of the others or other of the children or remoter issue of my daughter D. (such remoter issue to be born and take vested interests within 21 years after her death) at such age or time or respective ages or times if more than one in such shares and with such future or other trusts for their benefit and such provisions for their respective advancement maintenance and education at the discretion of either my trustees or of any other persons or person and in such manner in all respects as my daughter D. whether covert or discoverd shall by any deed or deeds revocable or irrevocable or by will or codicil appoint . . .”

B There followed hotchpot directions in regard to participation in the unappointed portion of the said share. The will further authorised the trustees at any time or times after the testator’s death at their discretion to raise any part or parts not exceeding in the whole one half part of the then presumptive or vested share in any of the funds under the trusts thereinbefore declared of any minor and to pay or apply the same for the advancement or benefit of such minor in such manner as his trustees should think fit. By a revocable deed of appointment, dated Mar. 11, 1947, D., in exercise of her power in that behalf, appointed one moiety of the settled fund in trust for her son, born in 1910, and the other moiety in trust for her daughter, born in 1913, both appointments to be subject to D.’s life interest, but with power to the trustee at any time or times in D.’s lifetime at discretion as to each such moiety to pay or apply all or any part of the capital thereof not exceeding one half for the advancement or benefit of the child to whom the moiety was appointed. It was desired to advance certain sums to the said children during D.’s life.

E HELD : on the true construction of the will and in the absence of an expressed provision in that behalf, the powers of advancement conferred by any appointment could not be exercised during the life of D.

F ADJOURNED SUMMONS by which the tenant for life under a will and the beneficiaries under a deed of appointment made by the tenant for life pursuant to a power in the said will asked whether a power to advance the beneficiaries under the deed during the life of the tenant for life was authorised by the will. HARMAN, J., held that it was not so authorised. The facts appear in the head-note.

G Jennings, K.C., and Wilfrid Hunt for the plaintiffs, the tenant for life under the testator’s will and the beneficiaries under the deed of appointment.

J. V. Nesbitt for the first three defendants, the trustees of the will.

T. A. C. Burgess for the fourth and fifth defendants, infant children of the daughter of the tenant for life.

H HARMAN, J. (after stating the facts) : The question which I have to decide is whether under the appointment which Mrs. Darell has made in exercise of the power conferred by the testator’s will or under any future appointment she may make she has provided or can provide a right for the trustees in her lifetime to advance the second and third plaintiffs in whose favour the power was exercised. The will contains an express power to advance minors, but no power to advance adults.

This is a matter largely governed by the practice of conveyancers. The very verbose form of power in this will is introduced by the words, “from and after the death” of Mrs. Darell. The natural inference from these words is that the power is not intended to apply during Mrs. Darell's lifetime. Such a power is often made so to apply by the addition of express words such as "after the death of the tenant for life or during her life with her consent." The question is whether in the absence of any such words the power extends to authorise the exercise of a power of advancement during the lifetime of a tenant for life. It is pointed out that the power extends to the creation of "such future or other trusts" and it is said that the antithesis to future is "present," but I think other probably means "executory" or some such word. It is contended that, as Mrs. Darell is authorised by the power to put in any appointment she may make during her life an express power to advance her children or issue, such a power must be exercisable during her lifetime. I do not think this is the true construction of this will for two reasons—(i) the reference to the period after the life tenant's death already alluded to, and (ii) that this will contains an express power to advance minors. It would be curious if by a kind of side wind that power could be extended so as to authorise an advance to adults. In the form in KEY AND ELPHINSTONE'S PRECEDENTS IN CONVEYANCING, 14th ed., vol. II, p. 887, words are inserted expressly authorising the exercise of the power of advancement during the lifetime of the donee of the power. Where any such words are omitted I do not think there is anything to enable me to say that it is nevertheless open to the donee of the power to provide that there shall be a power of advancement exercisable during her life. The omission of such words may have been deliberate. In the form in DAVIDSON'S PRECEDENTS IN CONVEYANCING, 3rd ed., vol. III, pt. II, p. 714, the power of appointment contains an express provision authorising the exercise of the power of advancement so as to over-reach the interests prior to the power. A similar provision appears in a form of will, vol. IV, p. 140: see also p. 278, note (j.) Mr. DAVIDSON'S view is reflected in the note in vol. III, pt. I, p. 160, where he says:

... as the life estates could not, except by express provision for that purpose, be over-reached by any exercise of the power of appointment, it is desirable that the terms of the power should authorise the life estates to be over-reached by an advancement.

His opinion, therefore, was that, in the absence of such express provision, a power of advancement could not be exercised during the lifetime of the donee of the power. The fact that other views expressed by DAVIDSON on this subject have not received judicial approval (see FARWELL ON POWERS, 3rd ed., p. 329, para. 4, and cases there cited), does not mean that his opinion on this matter is not correct. This is largely a matter of construction. I have come to the conclusion that, on the true construction of this will, powers of advancement conferred on the trustees of the will by any appointment cannot be exercised during the lifetime of Mrs. Darell.

Order accordingly.

FIRST NATIONAL HOUSING TRUST, LTD. v. CHESTERFIELD RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Denning and Slade, JJ.),
July 26, 1948.]

Public Health—Dustbin—Provision—Owner of building required by local authority to provide—House subject to Rent Restrictions Acts—Dustbin originally provided by owner—No contractual obligation to provide—Owner's appeal to justices allowed—Transfer of "burden or liability" from landlord to tenant—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (c. 17), s. 2 (3)—Public Health Act, 1936 (c. 49), s. 75 (1).

By the Public Health Act, 1936, s. 75 (1): "A local authority who, as respects their district or any part thereof, have undertaken the removal of house refuse may by notice require the owner or occupier of any building within the district, or, as the case may be, within that part of the district, to provide such number of covered dustbins for the reception of house refuse of such material, size and construction as the authority may approve . . . Any person aggrieved by a requirement of the local authority under this sub-section may appeal to a court of summary jurisdiction."

A The owners of certain houses to which the Rent Restrictions Acts applied provided a dustbin in each house when it was first let, although they were under no contractual obligation to do so. On notices being served by the local authority under the Public Health Act, 1936, s. 75 (1), requiring the owners to replace the dustbins by new ones of specified material, size and construction, the owners appealed to a court of summary jurisdiction under the sub-section on the ground that the notices were unreasonable because in the circumstances the occupiers of the premises, and not the owners, should have been required to replace the dustbins. The justices allowed the appeal on the ground that the notices were unreasonable in the circumstances. It was contended by the local authority that the effect of the justices' decision was to put the burden of replacing the dustbins on the tenants, which was contrary to the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 2 (3), prohibiting the "transfer to a tenant of any burden or liability previously borne by the landlord," and, therefore, the justices had no jurisdiction to come to such a decision.

B HELD : (i) the words "burden or liability" in s. 2 (3) of the Act of 1920 referred to a burden or liability imposed by a contractual term or a term imported by statute, and did not affect the landlord's power to discontinue a privilege, facility or benefit which the tenant had previously enjoyed, but which was not included in the terms of the tenancy.

C (ii) the decision of the justices in allowing the owners' appeal did not mean that the justices had put on the occupiers the burden of replacing the dustbins, and the decision was within the jurisdiction of the justices under s. 75 (1) of the Act of 1936.

E CASE STATED by Eckington, Derbyshire, justices on an appeal by the owners of certain dwelling-houses subject to the Rent Restrictions Acts against notices by the local authority, under the Public Health Act, 1936, s. 75 (1), requiring the owners to provide regulation dustbins for the houses. The justices held that the orders were unreasonable having regard to (a) the rents paid by the tenants, (b) the fact that the owners had borne the whole of the expense of keeping the property in repair, especially at a time when the cost of such repairs was very high, and were unable to pass any part of such costs to the tenants, and (c) the fact that the local authority had not taken these matters into account before making the orders requiring the owners to provide dustbins. Accordingly, the justices allowed the appeal. The local authority appealed from the decision of the justices, but the Divisional Court now dismissed the appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of LORD GODDARD, C.J.

Hallis for the local authority.

G Crispin for the owners of the houses.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Case stated by justices for the Eckington Division of Derbyshire who, sitting as a court of summary jurisdiction, decided an appeal brought by the owners of certain property under the Public Health Act, 1936, s. 75, in respect of a notice served on them by the local authority to furnish the houses named in the various notices with dustbins made in a particular manner and of a particular size, and so forth. The notice against which the appeals were brought is in these terms :

H We, the said council, by this notice under the Public Health Act, 1936, s. 75 (1), do require you, within 28 days from the service of this notice upon you, to provide such building with one covered dustbin for the reception of house refuse, of the material, size and construction specified hereunder: Each dustbin shall be of 24ins. x 18ins., 28lbs. weight, vertical, corrugated sides, with tight fitting conical cover and handles.

The Public Health Act, 1936, s. 75 (1), provides :

A local authority who, as respects their district or any part thereof, have undertaken the removal of house refuse may by notice require the owner or occupier of any building within the district, or, as the case may be, within that part of the district, to provide such number of covered dustbins for the reception of house refuse of such material, size and construction as the authority may approve . . . Any person aggrieved by a requirement of the local authority under this sub-section may appeal to a court of summary jurisdiction.

Sub-section (2) provides that, if a person fails to comply with a notice under sub-s. (1) he is liable to a penalty, and the authority may provide the dustbins and recover the expense from the person who ought to pay for them. Sub-section (3) is :

A local authority may, as respects their district or any part thereof, in lieu of requiring the owners or occupiers of buildings to provide and maintain dustbins for the reception of house refuse, undertake themselves to provide and maintain such dustbins as may be necessary and, so long as such an undertaking is in force, the authority may make in respect of each dustbin provided by them such annual charge not exceeding 2s. 6d. as they think proper.

There follows a provision that that 2s. 6d. may be added to the general rate in respect of the premises and recovered.

It is argued in this case by counsel for the local authority that, as the justices have allowed the owners' appeal, they have, in effect, decided that the obligation is on the occupier, and they have no jurisdiction to do that because the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 2 (3), prohibits the transfer to a tenant of any burden or liability previously borne by the landlord. The facts as found by the justices show that this is a comparatively new housing estate, and when the houses were first let there was provided in each house what is commonly called a sanitary dustbin. Whether it was of the make or dimensions of the character contained in the notice does not appear. From time to time the owners have renewed these dustbins which, I pause to say, are mere chattels, and it is not contended that they were under a contractual obligation to supply a dustbin or, still less, to supply any particular make of dustbin. If they were under any contractual obligation to supply some receptacle as a dustbin, it seems to me that it would be left entirely to the landlords to decide what sort of receptacle they would provide. They could provide a wooden box, as far as I know, or something like that. There is certainly no contractual obligation on them to provide a galvanised iron dustbin or a dustbin of any particular size. It is conceded that the landlords were not under any contractual obligation to provide a dustbin, and in Croydon Corp'n. v. Thomas (1) LORD GODDARD, C.J., said ([1947] K.B. 386, 390) :

One thing which seems to me to be clear in this case is that the section does not purport in any way to vary the terms of the contract of tenancy or the lease between the landlord and tenant.

Therefore, if the effect of what the local authority has done or of what the justices do, either in upholding or dismissing the appeal, is to put on the tenant a burden, obligation or liability which ought by the terms of the contract to be discharged by the landlord, it may very well be—and, I should think, it would be the case—that the tenant would have an action against the landlord to recover any expense to which he was put.

That, however, is not, in my opinion, the case we have to decide. The case we have to decide is whether the justices were in any way limited in their discretion or whether they came to a wrong determination in point of law—because in this form of appeal we can only deal with a point of law—in coming to the conclusion that the landlords were aggrieved by this notice. I pause once more to say that by deciding in favour of the landlords in this case it is not the fact that the justices have decided that the tenants are to bear the expense. They have simply decided that the landlords are not to. It may be—I do not want to take too fine a point—that the practical result will be that the local authority may consider that, as the landlords have not to provide the dustbins, the tenants must, or the local authority may decide that they will do it themselves, and then there will come the question whether, if they do it themselves and recover the 2s. 6d. a year for having done it, the landlord or tenant will have to pay. That may have to be decided hereafter, but in the Croydon case (1) this court emphasised that, in giving the right of appeal from the local authority to the justices, s. 75 (1) of the Act of 1936 meant exactly what it said—a “ person aggrieved,” i.e., a person who is ordered to do something, has a right of appeal, and if he has a right of appeal, the court of summary jurisdiction to which he appeals can allow the appeal if they think fit, provided that they act judicially. I cannot see any ground here for saying that the justices did not act judicially, unless the contention of counsel for the local authority is right, that the justices have impliedly disregarded the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 2 (3), which prohibits the transfer of a burden or liability from the landlord to the tenant except on the terms there mentioned.

Section 2 (3) is :

Any transfer to a tenant of any burden or liability previously borne by the landlord shall, for the purposes of this Act, be treated as an alteration of rent, and where, as the result of such a transfer, the terms on which a dwelling-house is held are on the whole less favourable to the tenant than the previous terms, the rent shall be deemed to be increased, whether or not the sum periodically payable by way of rent is increased . . .

In the first place, the mere fact that the landlord did originally provide a sanitary dustbin, and has from time to time renewed it, does not seem to me to be a burden or liability on him. Whether there is any distinction to be drawn between burden and liability, whether the word "burden" is put in ex abundanti cautela, or is merely tautologous, I need not inquire. I merely say that I do not understand how a burden can be transferred, with the result that the terms of the tenancy are less favourable, unless the burden is a contractual burden. As it is admitted that there is no contractual burden or liability on the landlord in this case, I cannot see that, by reason of what the justices have done, there has been any transfer of the burden to the tenant. Moreover, as neither the justices nor the local authority have power to vary the terms of the tenancy, if in fact what has been done varies the terms of the tenancy, it seems to me that is a matter to be discussed in an action. As it does not appear to me that the justices have taken into account anything that they ought not to have taken into account, or have not taken into account that which they ought to have taken, but have applied their minds to the question whether the obligation was one which ought fairly to fall on the landlords, I think, applying the principles which were laid down in the Croydon case (1), we are bound to dismiss this appeal. I think the justices have acted strictly within their jurisdiction in coming to the conclusion they have. Whether we should have come to that conclusion on the same evidence is not a matter with which we are concerned. I can find no fault in point of law with the decision of the justices, and I again repeat that the mere fact that they have decided in favour of the landlords in this case does not mean that the justices have put the burden on the tenant. In fact, they have no power to do so. If this matter had been present to the mind of the draftsman or Parliament, some provision might have been made for all parties to be brought before the court in cases of this description, where a liability might be thrown on one party or the other. There is no such provision in the Act, and there is no provision by which the tenants could have been brought before the court in this case. Under the provisions of the Act the only parties to the appeal are the owners or the occupiers, as the case may be, according to whichever is served, and the local authority and the justices must come to the fairest decision they can on the material before them as between those two parties. In my opinion, their decision was right, and this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

DENNING, J. : I agree. In my opinion, the words "burden or liability" in the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 2 (3), refer to a burden or liability imposed by a contractual term or a term imported by statute, such as in s. 2 (5). They do not refer to, or affect, the landlord's power to discontinue a privilege, a facility or a benefit which the tenant has previously enjoyed so long as it is not part of the terms on which the tenant holds. I agree that the appeal must be dismissed.

SLADE, J. : I agree.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

HOLLING AND ANOTHER v. YORKSHIRE TRACTION CO., LTD. AND OTHERS.

[LEEDS ASSIZES (Oliver, J.), July 16, 19, 20, 22, 1948.]

Nuisance—Premises adjoining highway—Coke ovens—Smoke and steam escaping across highway.

The second defendants owned and operated coke ovens situate 50 yards away from a road. The process of manufacturing coke involved the production at intervals of clouds of smoke and steam which, under certain conditions of wind and weather, passed low over the road so as to obscure the view of passengers thereon. While one of these clouds was so passing a collision occurred between a motor car and a motor omnibus driven by a servant of the first defendants, both of which vehicles were travelling along the road, two passengers in the car sustaining fatal injuries. It was found that the omnibus was being driven negligently at the time of the accident.

HELD : the discharge of smoke and steam across the road on the occasion of the accident was a nuisance caused by the second defendants, and the second defendants were also guilty of negligence in not posting a man at each end of the area affected to warn approaching vehicles as soon as a discharge was imminent.

CONSOLIDATED ACTIONS tried by OLIVER, J., without a jury.

The plaintiffs claimed damages under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, and the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, on the grounds of the negligence of the servant of the first defendants (the driver of the motor omnibus) and/or the negligence or nuisance of the second defendants and/or the negligence of the third defendant. The facts appear fully in the judgment.

Paley Scott, K.C., Wrangham and Ogden Swift for the plaintiffs.

Hinchcliffe, K.C., and Stanley-Price for the first defendants.

Hylton-Foster, K.C., and Leslie for the second defendants.

Fenwick, K.C., and Alastair Sharp for the third defendant.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 22. OLIVER, J., read the following judgment. These consolidated actions were brought by two widows, and they claim damages under Lord Campbell's Act and the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, in respect of loss they suffered by the death of their husbands, who were killed on Feb. 22, 1947, in a collision between the car in which they were being driven by the son of the first plaintiff with an omnibus, the property of the first defendants. The statement of claim alleges negligence against both the first and second defendants and nuisance against the second defendants, the owners of coke ovens situate near the scene of the accident. On Dec. 23, 1947, the first defendants issued third party proceedings against the driver of the car in which the deceased were killed, claiming indemnity on the allegation that the accident was caused, or contributed to, by his negligence in driving the car. Thereupon both the plaintiffs amended their proceedings, and included him as third defendant.

A The accident occurred on the main road from Sheffield to Manchester. The motor omnibus was coming from the Sheffield direction and the car from the opposite direction. The collision took place a short distance on the Manchester side of some trees overhanging the road. Visibility was clear for a considerable distance in spite of the comparatively gentle bend just beyond which the accident occurred. The coke ovens, the property of the second defendants, have been in operation since 1919 and occupy a considerable stretch of land on the north side of the road. They are distant from the road 50 yards. On Feb. 22, 1947, during the middle of one of the severest winters in human memory, much snow had fallen and had been piled at the sides of the road so as to form a sort of wall. The normal carriage way was 23 feet, but this was reduced by the piled up snow to 18 feet. The width of the omnibus was 7 feet 6 inches, that of the car 5 feet. Allowing for the necessary space between each vehicle and the snow bank and the clearance necessary between two passing vehicles there would only be a few feet to spare if they were to pass safely. The surface of the 18 feet roadway consisted of a thin layer of closely packed snow and ice. It had been freezing all day and was freezing at the time. Such grit as had been put down on the road surface had become ineffective owing to fresh snow which had fallen upon it since. I find without hesitation that the surface of this roadway was extremely treacherous and dangerous, demanding the utmost care from drivers of vehicles upon it. Unless the speed of such vehicles was kept down to a very moderate one any sudden application of brakes would almost certainly precipitate a skid. The collision took place about 3 p.m. It was broad daylight, and I accept the evidence of the police officer, who was a most reliable witness, that visibility in the ordinary way was quite good. The process of manufacturing coke involves that as each oven is emptied the coke has to be quenched with water by means of hoses operated by employees of the second defendants. These quenching operations take place about every three-quarters of an hour throughout the day, and result in the production of masses of steam and smoke. The prevailing direction of the wind is from the west, but a wind from the north or north-east would carry the smoke and steam generated by the quenching across the road. In normal weather the clouds of vapour rise and where they blow over the road they do so at a height which causes no inconvenience to the traffic thereon, but I had before me a body of evidence, which I fully accept, that on fairly rare occasions the clouds of vapour pass low over the road so as to involve vehicles thereon.

On Feb. 22, according to an agreed meteorological report there was a light wind not exceeding 12 m.p.h. from the north-east blowing directly from the coke ovens to the road. The weather was extremely cold with very low clouds, these being ideal conditions for vapour clouds from the coke ovens to obscure the road itself. The collision occurred in the middle of a particularly dense cloud of grey smoke and steam following the quenching of coke. No witness actually saw the impact. The third defendant, driving the car, was so injured as to have no memory of the event whatever. Both his passengers, husbands of the respective plaintiffs, were killed. The driver of the omnibus deposed that he saw nothing of the car up to the collision. The case, therefore, has largely to be decided as between the two motor vehicles by inferences to be drawn from their position after the accident as deposed to by witnesses, particularly the police constable, and illustrated by photographs. [His Lordship dealt with the evidence regarding the two vehicles and continued :—] As between the two vehicles I find the third defendant altogether blameless, and I so indicated at the close of counsels' arguments. I find that the omnibus driver was negligent (a) in driving on his wrong side of the road, (b) in going too fast, (c) in failing to observe and guard against the vapour cloud in time to take effective action.

It remains to consider whether his employers, the first defendants, can escape liability by reason of the action of the second defendants in discharging vapour over the road. The second defendants are employed for gain in producing coke. It is essential in the course of their operations that the coke should be quenched with water thereby discharging masses of steam and vapour into the air. Necessarily on occasions, albeit rare occasions, this cloud will travel over and, in various degrees according to the conditions, obscure the road. For them it was contended that they have no duty whatever to the public in the matter, that road users must take things as they find them and look after themselves, and, in short, that they must regard the vapour clouds, however dense, as part of the ordinary risks of travel. It will be convenient, first, I think, to examine the nature of the fog on the particular occasion. It was described by various witnesses as amounting to complete obscurity. The omnibus driver could not see the car even after he had run into it. Men at work at the ovens heard the crash, but could see nothing as the road was in an impenetrable fog. The police constable, who arrived a quarter of an hour after the collision, said that at least twice while he was there between 3.15 and 6.15 similar clouds came over the road; that they began as comparatively thin vapour, then became opaque, then thinned out again and passed away. At the time of opacity he could not see his hand when he outstretched his arm. The total duration of the cloud was about one and a half minutes. I find as a fact that the weather all that day was the same and that these clouds of vapour had been settled upon the road at intervals of about three quarters of an hour the whole day. It is quite true that no similar collision had ever happened during nearly thirty years. It is also true that it was only on comparatively rare occasions that the fog settled on the road. In the vast majority of instances it passed away from or high over the road.

I have to ask myself the question: "Was the discharge of vapour on the occasion of this accident a nuisance, and a nuisance caused by the second defendants?" I have come to the clear conclusion that it was a nuisance. Counsel strenuously argued that the production of the vapour was incident to a perfectly ordinary and lawful use of land and that it had no more significance than, for instance, a cloud of dust raised by the use of an agricultural implement and blown by the wind across a road. He further relied, among others, on cases which have laid down that the accidental failure of a tail lamp on a motor car through no negligence on the driver's part (provided the unlit condition was not allowed to exist for more than a reasonable time) does not cause the vehicle to constitute in law a nuisance [e.g., Maitland v. Raisbeck & Hewitt (R.T. & J.) Ltd. (5)]. As I see it, however, such cases are quite apart from the case before me. The principle involved in those cases is that lawful users of the road, unless they do or permit something actively wrong, are not liable. To my mind, there is a world of difference between the position of a driver of a car who has suffered a misfortune on the road while a lawful user of it and the position of a defendant who, for his own profit, is flooding the road on occasions with an impenetrable fog of smoke and steam. He is not a lawful user of the road or anything approaching it. His artificial fog has no business on the road at all. In my opinion, this matter is really governed by Dollman v. Hillman (1). In that case the presence on the pavement of the piece of fat which had come from the butcher's shop of the defendant was held to be a nuisance. In the case before me these smoke clouds had been persisting all day. Their occurrence and recurrence was obvious to anyone in charge at the coke ovens 50 yards away, yet nothing whatever was done in the matter. It would have been perfectly simple, and, to my mind, right and reasonable in the particular weather conditions that day, to have posted a man at each end of the area affected to warn approaching vehicles as soon as a discharge was imminent. For this reason in addition to being guilty of creating a nuisance I find the second defendants were also guilty of negligence.

It remains to consider whether both the first and second defendants caused the accident jointly or whether either of them was the sole cause. Speaking for myself I have never been able to understand the distinctions which have been drawn in many of the reported cases between a causa causans and a causa sine qua non, and for myself I follow the view which, as I understand it, LORD BIRKENHEAD expressed in The Volute (2) ([1922] A.C. 129, 144) to the effect that the matter should be regarded from the point of view of plain common sense. In this case it can be most truly said that had there been no vapour cloud there would have been no accident because the omnibus driver could have seen without difficulty the car, and that, on the other hand, if the driver had been driving with reasonable care, no accident would have happened. I cannot distinguish the effects of the coincident negligence of the two defendants, and I think it just that they should share the liability equally.

COX v. S. CUTLER & SONS, LTD. AND HAMPTON COURT GAS CO.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Scott, Wrottesley, L.JJ., and Wynn-Parry, J.), July 6, 7, 8, 26, 1948.]

Factory—"Place" used for purpose other than processes carried on in factory—Gas works—Reconstruction of gas holder on site separate from gas works—Site in exclusive possession of contractors—"Article"—Coal gas—Factories Act, 1937 (c. 67), s. 151 (1) (a) (c), (xiii), (6).

A gas company carried on its undertaking on two parcels of land separated by a public road. The east site contained all the buildings, machinery and equipment necessary for the manufacture of the gas and also two gas holders, while the west site contained one gas holder only, which was connected with the main site by means of underground pipes. The gas holder on the west site was destroyed by enemy action and the connecting pipes sealed up. Contractors were employed by the gas company to reconstruct the damaged gas holder, and by the terms of the contract were given exclusive possession of the west site for the period of reconstruction. On a frosty day a steel erector in the employ of the contractors, while engaged in rivetting the framework 20ft. above the pit, which was floored with a concrete dumping, was in the act of moving a board, which served him as a platform, when he slipped and fell on to the concrete dumping, thereby sustaining serious injuries. No staging or other means was provided to prevent such an accident occurring. In an action for damages the contractors and the gas company were held jointly and severally liable, the contractors for negligence at common law, and the gas company for breach of s. 26 (2) of the Factories Act, 1937. The gas company appealed.

HELD: coal gas was an "article" within s. 151 (1) (a) and (c) of the Factories Act, 1937, so that any premises in which it was made or adapted for sale were a "factory" within that Act; even if the gas holder on the west site had been part of the actual gas factory and had come within s. 151 (1) (xiii) of the Act, it had ceased to be so when the enemy destroyed it, because thereafter it neither held nor could hold gas, and a fortiori when the contractors took exclusive possession of the site; and, in any event, the gas company were protected by s. 151 (6) of the Act which provides that a place situate within the close, curtilage, or precincts forming a factory and solely used for some purpose (here, at the material date, for the purpose of engineering construction) other than the processes carried on in the factory is not to be deemed part of the factory.

APPEAL, by a gas company, from an order of SELLERS, J., dated Nov. 24, 1947, whereby he held the company jointly and severally liable with contractors for injuries sustained by the plaintiff, an employee of the contractors, while employed on the reconstruction of one of the gas company's gas holders. The appeal was allowed. The facts appear in the judgments.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 26. The following judgments were read.

SCOTT, L.J. : This is an appeal in an action against both defendants for damages for grave personal injuries suffered by the plaintiff from an accident when he was employed by the first defendants (hereinafter called "the contractors") on the construction of a gas holder, the property of the second defendants (hereinafter called "the gas company"). The learned judge held both defendants jointly and severally liable to the plaintiff in the sum of £7,624 as damages, the contractors for negligence at common law, the gas company for breach of s. 26 of the Factories Act, 1937. For the moment, I leave over the questions of costs. The gas company thereupon claimed from the contractors (a) complete indemnification under their contract with them for reconstruction, or, alternatively (b) contribution to the extent of 100 per cent. under the Law Reform (Joint Tortfeasors) Act, 1935. On the third party issues, the learned judge apportioned the liability as to three-quarters to the contractors and one quarter to the gas company. There is no appeal before us by the contractors from the judgment of common law negligence against them—and that is the only ground on which they were held liable—but the gas company do appeal from the judgment against them for breach of the Factories Act, 1937, on two grounds: (1) that for the purposes of that Act the site of the gasometer was no longer, if it ever was, within the "factory" of which they were the occupier, and, in addition, or alternatively, that they were protected by s. 151 (6), even if para. (xiii) of sub-s. (1) of that section would otherwise have brought them within the Act. They also appeal against the apportionment by the learned judge against them as joint tortfeasors of one-quarter of the liability incurred by the contractors to the plaintiff, their grounds for appeal being: (1) that no charge of common law negligence had been made against them; (2) that there could not be in law any charge against them for breach of duty under the Factories Act, 1937, and (3) that they were under a complete contractual indemnity from the contractors. Their appeal thus turns first on questions under the Act, and, secondly, under the contract.

The plaintiff was a rivetter in the employ of the contractors, who were then engaged in reconstructing a large gas-holder, the property of the gas company, under a contract with the latter for the sum of £14,646. All the terms of the contract were contained in a letter dated Mar. 19, 1945, from the contractors to the gas company, which incorporated a typewritten specification and also printed conditions known as the "Standard Conditions of Contract," recognised in the gas industry. The holder had been almost totally destroyed by enemy action. The gas company's works were separated from that holder by a public road, but were physically connected with it by underground pipes underneath the road, by which the holder had, before enemy interference, when in use for gas storage, received its supply of gas from the works. When the holder was put out of use by the enemy, these pipes were sealed off and remained sealed off throughout the process of reconstruction. On Dec. 9, 1945, when the site of the gasometer had been in the possession of the contractors for the purpose of the contract for nearly nine months, they were still in course of reconstructing the steel framework of the upper part of the holder. On that day there was a frost and the steel bars on which the plaintiff had to stand were slippery. His work was above the centre of the pit (into which a gasometer can descend as its gas is let out) at a height of some 20ft. above the concrete "dumpling" in the middle of the pit. While trying to move a plank, he slipped and fell on the dumpling, thereby suffering injuries. The case at common law against the contractors was that it was an unnecessarily dangerous system of working, and the learned judge held them liable in negligence. There is, as I have said, no appeal from that finding.

The only way in which the gas company could incur liability is if the plaintiff could show that they were still the statutory occupier and had in that capacity broken some statutory duty. The learned judge held that the plaintiff succeeded in establishing that position. With great respect to the learned judge, I differ on these grounds: (1) that the gas company were not the "occupier" within the meaning of the Act; (2) that, even if they were, para. (xiii) of s. 151 (1) does not bring them in, and (3) that sub-s. (6) of that section lets them out. The whole case turns on the correct interpretation of the Act. I will deal with these three points separately.

So far as any issue in the appeal under the Act is concerned, the only person contingently capable on the facts before us of committing a relevant breach of the statute is the occupier of the particular kind of factory which is recognised in the case of gas works. We must, therefore, go straight to s. 151 which defines a factory. In my opinion, a gas factory is constituted by the first and more general part of sub-s. (1):

Subject to the provisions of this section, the expression "factory" means any premises in which, or within the close or curtilage or precincts of which, persons are employed in manual labour in any process for or incidental to any of the following purposes, namely:—(a) the making of any article or of part of any article; or . . . (c) the adapting for sale of any article; being premises in which, or within the close or curtilage or precincts of which, the work is carried on by way of trade or for purposes of gain and to or over which the employer of the persons employed therein has the right of access or control.

The word "article" is not defined either in that section or in s. 152, the general definition section. It must, therefore, be given its ordinary meaning in the English language. The SHORTER OXFORD DICTIONARY in its meaning No. 10 says: "Elliptical (=article of trade, etc.); a commodity." The CENTURY DICTIONARY, in meaning No. 6, says: "A material thing as part of a class, or, absolutely, a particular substance or commodity . . . Salt is a necessary article." Any chemical element, and many compounds and mixtures, may exist in any one of three states, solid, liquid or gaseous, depending solely on temperature. The OXFORD DICTIONARY defines coal gas thus: "The mixture of gases produced by the destructive distillation of coal, consisting mainly of carburetted hydrogen; purified of some of its ingredients, it is the common gas used for lighting and heating purposes." Oxygen gas and hydrogen gas are pure elements and not mixtures or compounds. All three gases, however, are made (in the sense of being commodities manufactured and sold) by various processes. I can see no reason for not regarding all three substances, whether in their solid, liquid or gaseous states, as "articles." So, too, with regard to water and steam. Aerated water is obviously an article. Steam under pressure can be supplied by appropriate pipes and sold. Coal gas is bought and sold. It follows that the geographical confines of "the factory," within that general definition, were constituted by the area in which persons were employed in manual labour in the named processes, and that those confines limited the ambit of the factory. That definition, which proceeds by logical connotation, would seem to exclude all the gas holders, or, at any rate, at the time in question, the one beyond the public road.

I suspect that s. 151 (1) (xiii), which proceeds by the opposite logical process (that of denotation) was added because Parliament construed the earlier part of the sub-section just as I do, namely, as excluding gas holders, because neither purpose (a), namely, "making," nor purpose (c), namely, "adapting for sale," covers mere storage or warehousing of the article. The later part of para. (c) of sub-s. (1) reads thus:

And (whether or not they are factories by reason of the foregoing definition) the expression "factory" also includes the following premises in which persons are employed in manual labour . . . (xiii) any premises used for the storage of gas in a gasholder having a storage capacity of not less than five thousand cubic feet.

That language does not cover a holder which once held, but no longer does or can yet hold, gas. Assuming, therefore, that the gas company could still be a potential "occupier" of the site where the gas holder had been, they would not, and could not, be held to blame for a breach of a Factory Act duty as an occupier, and that is the only capacity in which an action would lie against them.

Their defence that they no longer "occupied," in the Factory Act sense, is still further reinforced by the terms of their contract with the contractors. Clause 8 of the specification limited their functions during construction to this one obligation :

The gas company will empty and clean out the tank and keep same free of water during erection of the gasholder and also carry out any repairs that may be found necessary.

Clause 9 incorporated the standard conditions to which I have referred. Condition XV contained the following :

The contractors shall provide everything necessary for the commencement and proper execution of the work. The site shall be handed over to them in a fit and proper condition for the execution of the work and with sufficient and suitable access thereto and at such times as are specified.

The effect of that condition was to exclude the gas company, as building owner, from the site altogether, except in regard to their specific duties in regard to the tank, a matter that has no relevance. The word "occupier," as we know, is not defined in the Act and never has been in previous Acts, but LORD MACLAREN'S definition in 1904 in Ramsay v. Mackie (1), cited in REDGRAVE & OWNER'S FACTORIES, TRUCK & SHOPS ACTS, 15th ed., p. 90, is sufficient for present purposes. He said (7 F. (Ct. of Sess.) 106, 109) :

"Occupier" plainly means the person who runs the factory . . . , who regulates and controls the work that is done there, and who is responsible for the fulfilment of the provisions of the Factory Act within it.

Clearly, the gas company were not the "occupier," even if I am wrong in thinking that the skeleton of the future reconstructed gas holder—then under construction by the contractors—was not either a gas holder or part of a gas factory.

For these reasons, I am of opinion that the gas company never came within either definition contained in s. 151 (1), but, even if I were wrong in holding that quoad the gas company (i) the gas holder in question—a mere warehouse—had never been a part of the actual gas factory ; (ii) that, if it had been, and, in so far as it had come within s. 151 (1) (xiii), it had ceased to be so (a) when the enemy destroyed it, and (b), a fortiori, when the contractors took exclusive possession, sub-s. (6) of s. 151 has to be considered. That sub-section runs as follows :

Where a place situate within the close, curtilage, or precincts forming a factory is solely used for some purpose other than the processes carried on in the factory, that place shall not be deemed to form part of the factory for the purposes of this Act, but shall, if otherwise it would be a factory, be deemed to be a separate factory.

In my opinion, this language is clear and unambiguous. I will assume (contrary to my own opinion) that, before the enemy blew it up, it was "a place within the close, curtilage, or precincts" of the gas factory (e.g., covered by the connotative definition in s. 151), but that after that moment it was solely used, at first, for no useful purpose, and then, when the contractors took possession in order to turn it again in the future into a gas holder, for the purpose of engineering construction. While it was being so used, it was deemed by s. 108 of the Act to be a factory of which the engineering contractor was the sole "occupier."

I am, therefore, satisfied that the gas company was at no time in a position to commit as occupier any breach of the Factories Act, 1937. They were, therefore, not guilty of breaking s. 26 (2), which was the one and only provision of the Act which had any relevance to the fall of the plaintiff. Had that section been incorporated in s. 108, the contractors, as the notional occupiers under that section of a notional factory, would clearly have been liable, but that section was left out of the list of provisions made applicable to s. 108. I have considered all the cases cited, but there is no authority binding on this court which throws any light on the appeal, except Ramsay v. Mackie (1) to which I have referred. The appeal of the gas company will be allowed and judgment entered for them, as defendants to the plaintiff's claim, with costs here and below, and also on their claim as against the contractors on the third party proceedings, laid in contract on their indemnity and in tort under the Act of 1935. The order as to costs of third party proceedings will be varied by directing that the contractors, as third parties, pay to the gas company their costs of such proceedings here and below, whether laid in contract on their indemnity or in tort under the Act of 1935. The gas company's costs here and below to be paid direct to them by the contractors. The sum of £96 5s. 0d. now in court to be paid to the contractors' solicitors without further authority. Order for payment out to the plaintiff's solicitor on the plaintiff's authority of the £7,000 in court.

WROTTESELEY, L.J. (read by WYNN-PARRY, J.): The gas company occupy extensive premises at Kingston on which they make gas and the ordinary residuals, and the gas when made on it is stored in gas holders. It appears from the agreed plan that they have two separate sites, one on the east side and the other on the west side of the Bushey Park Road. On the eastern or main site the retorts are situate, and it is here that all the processes are performed, and, in addition, they have here at least two gas holders. This site constitutes premises, subtended on two sides with highways, and, on the third side, by a railway, which may fairly be said to consist of a close or curtilage walled off from the two highways, within which persons are employed in manual labour in processes for, or incidental to, the making of gas. Since the work carried on on these premises is carried on by way of trade or for purposes of gain, and since the gas company which employs the labour has both a right of access and control, this site is a factory within the meaning of s. 151 of the Factories Act, 1937. The western or subsidiary site is also subtended on two sides by highways, one of which separates it from the main site. It, too, may fairly be said to consist of a close or curtilage walled off from the two highways. Moreover, when it was used for the storage of gas in a gas holder—having a storage capacity of not less than five thousand cubic feet, as was the case until the gas holder was collapsed by a bomb—it was a factory within the meaning of s. 151 (1) (xiii), although nothing was manufactured and no process performed on or in it. The gas was led from the gasworks to the gas holder on the western site by means of mains laid under the highway, which were cut off when the gas holder was destroyed.

On Jan. 7, 1945, this gas holder was blown up by enemy action. There followed an inspection and report by the contractors in February, a final report in March, and a tender on Mar. 19. Its components had fallen into the tank which had contained the water seal, so that the whole site ceased to be used in any way for the purposes of the gas works. Under the contract this site had to be, and, in fact, was, handed over to the contractors, who proceeded to erect mess huts, offices, store sheds and a telephone. In fact, they had control of the whole site, and proceeded to carry out the work, the subject of their contract with the gas company, viz., the removal of the whole of the three lifts from the tank, the reconditioning, and the work necessary to reconstruct the whole gas holder in its original form. It is clear from the inspection report of Feb. 13 that the whole gas holder had to be removed and reconditioned and re-erected. It is not suggested that any of the gas company's employees were at any time employed on this site, but the gas company's engineer or deputy was, under cl. XVIII of the standard conditions, at all usual times to be allowed to inspect the work in progress, whether on the site or on the contractors' own premises.

To quote from the judgment :

The morning of Dec. 7, 1945, was frosty and the framework was slippery, and as the plaintiff was standing with one foot on a girder and one on a purlin, in the act of moving a board into position to serve as a working platform for himself, he slipped and fell on to a concrete block over twenty feet below and received very serious injuries. The plaintiff seeks to recover damages for those injuries and consequential loss against the contractors on the ground that they required him to work (and particularly to do so under the frosty conditions prevailing) without providing staging from which he could work, or which would protect him from a fall of more than a few feet. The claim is also made against the gas company, and alternatively the contractors, as occupiers of the factory, and for failing to comply with s. 26 of the Factories Act, 1937.

The learned judge found that the contractors had failed in their duty at common law to the plaintiff who was, of course, their employee.

As regards the claim against both defendants that there had been a breach of s. 26 (2) of the Factories Act, 1937, that sub-section is as follows :

Where any person is to work at a place from which he will be liable to fall a distance more than ten feet, then, unless the place is one which affords secure foothold and, where necessary, secure hand-hold, means shall be provided, so far as is reasonably practicable, by fencing or otherwise for ensuring his safety.

That claim was resisted by the contractors on the ground that what was being carried on on the site was a work of engineering construction, and that s. 108 of the Act, which applied certain provisions of the Factories Act, 1937, did not apply s. 26. On this contention, the learned judge found :

They were carrying on works of engineering construction, and s. 108 of the Act does not impose on them the duties arising under s. 26, and, on the evidence, I do not find them to be occupiers of a factory at the site where this accident happened.

The site with which the learned judge was here dealing was the subsidiary or western site, and there is no doubt that it was at this time only a factory for the purposes of s. 108, and the section there applied, and the contractors were only occupiers of such factory within the same section. Section 26 of the Act, therefore, did not apply, but when he came to deal with a similar claim against the gas company, the learned judge held that the gas holder which had been destroyed and was now under construction was there as part of the factory premises and was under repair at the time of this accident. The duty to comply with s. 26 of the Act was, therefore, imposed on the gas company, and, as the duty was not fulfilled and as a consequence the accident occurred, the gas company too must be held liable. It will be seen, therefore, that for this purpose the learned judge now treats the two sites as one factory, not because gas was manufactured on either of them, but because gas of over 5,000 cubic feet was stored in the gas holder on the main site. Moreover, he appears to have found that the gas company's representatives used to walk up a runway on the crown of the gas holder which was being reconstructed, and that this showed that the company remained in occupation of the western site. In point of fact, there was no evidence that the gas company's representatives did come on the site at all, still less that the gas company occupied it. Indeed, the evidence was all the other way, namely, that the gas company handed over the whole western close or curtilage to the contractors, a thing which was the more easily done because of its isolated nature and because the gas company no longer carried on any sort of activity there.

I think that this case falls to be decided on the peculiar circumstances existing on the day of the accident, namely, that this was a physically separate site not occupied by the gas company at all and on which gas was neither being made nor stored. The gas company was certainly not regulating the work that was done on the site. To use the words of LORD MACLAREN in Ramsay v. Mackie (1) (7 F. (Ct. of Sess.) 106, 109) :

... "occupier" plainly means the person who runs the factory . . . , who regulates and controls the work that is done there.

Even on the footing that this was one factory and not two factories before the bomb damage, the gas company relied on s. 151 (6) which is as follows :

Where a place situate within the close, curtilage, or precincts forming a factory is solely used for some purpose other than the processes carried on in the factory, that place shall not be deemed to form part of the factory for the purposes of this Act, but shall, if otherwise it would be a factory, be deemed to be a separate factory.

In answer to this the learned judge found that no exception had been made out to exonerate the gas company. Now, there may be instances where, for the purposes of the Factories Act, 1937, two separate closes and curtilages with their precincts may be properly held to be one factory, but I can see no reason in this case for disregarding the plain facts to be found on the plan. From the point of view of the employee—so long as the western site was used for storing the company's gas—it was a factory to which all the appropriate sections of the Act applied, but once it failed to qualify under para. (xiii) of s. 151 (1) it ceased to be a factory at all so far as the gas company was concerned. It had never qualified under the principal provisions of that section, since nothing had ever been made there, and it now became a site on which the contractors were carrying on a work of engineering construction and possibly building operations. In addition, even if this site could properly be regarded as having been part of the gas company's general factory, we have to consider sub-s. (6) of s. 151. The facts of this case seem to me to be even stronger than those in Lewis v. Gilbertson & Co., Ltd. (2). That was the case of a site in the middle of factory premises which was cleared, and the erection of an iron mill was under construction where formerly there had been a copperas mill. On it was placed, for the purpose of making mortar and cement, an engine and mortar mill with an unfenced fly-wheel. It was held that this site—which was clearly defined—fell within sub-s. (6) being “solely used for some purpose other than the processes carried on in the factory,” namely, the erection of an extension of the iron mill. The general provisions of the Factories Act, 1937, therefore, had ceased to apply to this site. I am not prepared to say that that case was wrongly decided. These cases may depend on matters of degree, depending on how far the site is clearly separate from the factory, but on that score it is difficult to think of a clearer case than the one under appeal. I am not the less inclined to decide as I do in this case, seeing that the result accords with common-sense, and the gas company will not be found to have committed a breach of an Act with which they were never expected by anyone to comply so long as the contractors were in occupation of the site.

WYNN-PARRY, J. [after stating the facts]: The first question which arises is whether the premises on which the plaintiff was working at the time of the accident was a factory within the meaning of the Factories Act, 1937. For the plaintiff it was argued that the gas company have and always have had only one factory, and the circumstances that the western part of their land is physically divided by a highway from the eastern or main part of their land does not make that separated western land any less a part of the factory. On the other hand, the gas company submitted that prior to the damage by enemy action to the gas holder on the western land, they had two factories, one comprising the eastern land and the other the western land. The word “factory” is defined by s. 151 of the Factories Act, 1937 (so far as material) as follows:

(1) Subject to the provisions of this section, the expression “factory” means any premises in which, or within the close or curtilage or precincts of which, persons are employed in manual labour in any process for or incidental to any of the following purposes, namely:—(a) the making of any article or of part of any article; or (b) the altering, repairing, ornamenting, finishing, cleaning, or washing, or the breaking up or demolition of any article; or (c) the adapting for sale of any article; being premises in which, or within the close or curtilage or precincts of which, the work is carried on by way of trade or for purposes of gain and to or over which the employer of the persons employed therein has the right of access or control: And (whether or not they are factories by reason of the foregoing definition) the expression “factory” also includes the following premises in which persons are employed in manual labour, that is to say: . . . (xiii) any premises used for the storage of gas in a gasholder having a storage capacity of not less than five thousand cubic feet.

By s. 1 of the Interpretation Act, 1889, which applies to this definition, the singular includes the plural, and, therefore, the definition of factory in s. 151 of the Factories Act, 1937, includes premises which have more than one close or curtilage, and is, therefore, a definition which is apt to cover both the eastern land and the western land of the gas company within the single word “factory.” The second paragraph of that section opens with the words “And (whether or not they are factories by reason of the foregoing definition) the expression ‘factory’ also includes the following premises . . .” There is nothing in that language to make it necessary to treat as separate factories the several closes or curtilages which together constitute the premises, as that word is used in the first paragraph of s. 151. It follows that it must be a question of fact in each case, where several closes or curtilages have to be considered, whether or not the several closes constitute one factory or are each to be regarded as a separate factory. Prima facie, one would be inclined to regard the eastern and western parts of the gas company’s land as constituting one factory. To adapt the test put in by KENNEDY, J., in Lewis v. Gilbertson & Co., Ltd. (2) (91 L.T. 377, 380), if, prior to the damage occurring, the question had been put of a workman standing on the western land “Is he in the factory?”, prima facie the answer would have come, “Yes, he is.” The onus, in my view, is on the gas company to show, as a matter of fact, that that answer would not have been given, and, in my judgment, they do not discharge this onus by relying solely on the subsidiary definition in the second paragraph of s. 151 of the Act and sub-para. (xiii), which show no more than that, as the gas holder on the western land was of the requisite capacity, that land was qualified to be regarded as a separate factory. I, therefore, conclude that the gas company have failed to establish that the western land was a separate factory.

The second point taken on behalf of the gas company was that assuming that the two areas must be treated as one factory, then by virtue of sub-s. (6) of s. 151 of the Act in the events which happened, namely, the handing over by the gas company to the contractors of the western area and the work of reconstructing the gas holder carried on thereon by the contractors, the western area must be treated as a place situate within the close, curtilage or precincts of the factory, solely used for some purpose other than the processes carried on in the factory, and therefore deemed not to be a factory at the material time, viz., when the accident occurred. The corresponding provision, namely, s. 149 (4) of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, was judicially construed in Lewis v. Gilbertson & Co., Ltd. (2). The headnote reads as follows (91 L.T. 377):

The respondents were occupiers of a factory for the manufacture of iron and tin plates, and by the side of their factory and within the curtilage thereof, upon a site which had been cleared for the purpose of creating a new mill thereon, there was a crushing machine driven by a steam engine and used solely for crushing stone and making mortar and cement for the new works intended to be erected on that site. Both the steam engine and crushing machine were upon that site. Upon an information under the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, for not securely fencing the dangerous parts of this machinery, the justices were of opinion that the machinery was not securely fenced, but they decided that the place on which the engine and crusher stood, though within the close, curtilage, and precincts forming the factory, was a place solely used for a purpose other than the manufacturing process carried on in the factory, within the meaning of sub-s. (4) of s. 149 of the Act, and therefore could not be deemed to be a part of the factory, and was not a separate factory in itself, and they dismissed the information upon that ground. Held, that the justices having found that the site on which the machinery was was not a part of the area of the existing factory, but was a place or area separate and apart from the factory, they were right in law in holding that the case came within the exemption in sub-s. (4) of s. 149, as the machinery in this separate area was being solely used for a purpose other than the manufacturing process carried on in the factory.

In the course of his judgment, LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J., said (ibid., 379):

Speaking for myself, I do not think that the words "place situate within the close, curtilage, or precincts forming a factory" in sub-s. (4) of s. 149, mean the area of the factory. I think the words "place situate within the close, curtilage, or precincts forming a factory" do point to a separate area—an area separate from the area of the factory—which is being solely used for some other purpose than the manufacturing process carried on in the factory in the sense that it is separate from the factory; otherwise I do not think that the words "within the close, curtilage, or precincts forming a factory" would have been used . . . I decide that we cannot interfere, because it seems to me that the magistrates have stated that this was a building site for a new factory and was no part of the existing factory, and was only within the first part of the definition "within the close, curtilage, or precincts forming a factory"; but did not come within the second part. I desire to repeat that, should the case come up to us of simply using a part of a large factory—an area in a large factory—which is not separated from the factory, except by the fact that it is used at the time for the particular purpose, I do not think that that comes within the protection afforded by sub-s. (4) of s. 149. I wish to prevent this judgment from being used as giving or recognising the right not to fence machinery, which is in fact within a factory, simply upon the ground that the area which it occupies is used for a purpose which is not a manufacturing process.

WILLS, J., said (ibid., 380):

Therefore we are driven to ask ourselves what is meant by "place." Obviously, it is not necessary that the place should be inclosed on all sides. If it had been necessary the Act of Parliament would have said so; and, therefore, the absence of fencing on all four sides we cannot take as a test. But this place seems to be a place so entirely outside the factory altogether where the manufacturing processes are carried on, and to be so distinctly separated from it, that it may very fairly be considered to be a place—a definite spot, an area which is marked and defined and ascertainable, and which is dedicated, so to speak, to purposes quite other than those which are contemplated as a factory. This appears to me to be a spot which was marked out for the creation of a new building, and nothing else, and it would certainly, to my mind, be a very strained construction of this sub-section to say that that was the sort of place which was contemplated by this Act.

KENNEDY, J., said (ibid.):

I agree it is very difficult when we have in this sub-section the words "place" and

"used", as it has been found in other Acts of Parliament where the same words are used, to say what is a place and what is the user of a place, to which the sub-section refers; but I think that if the question was put to these magistrates, was A.B. in the factory? the answer would come, "No; he was on the site of the new sheet mills." A person on the new sheet mill site could not be described as being upon the factory, although he might have been upon the premises which are within the precincts and within the curtilage of the factory.

All three judgments proceed on the basis that "place" in the sub-section means an area outside the factory, though within the close, curtilage or precincts forming the factory. LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J., proceeded on the basis that the "place" was a place apart from the factory. WILLS, J., treated it as a place entirely outside the factory area. KENNEDY, J., held that a person on the new sheet mill site could not be described as being in the factory, although he might have been on the premises which were within the curtilage and precincts of the factory. No doubt, on the facts of that case, there was sound ground for holding that the site of the new sheet mill had never formed part of the factory, and that would be sufficient to support the decision, but, for myself, I have great difficulty in view of the language of sub-s. (6) of s. 151 of the Act of 1937 in accepting the view that in order that an area of land should qualify to be treated as a place within that sub-section, it must first be shown that it has never been part of the particular factory. The wording of the definition in sub-s. (1) makes the word "factory" include not merely the area comprised by the walls of a building in which a manufacturing process is carried on, but the whole area comprised within the boundaries of, e.g., the close of the premises in question. This appears to me to be borne out by the wording of sub-s. (6) where the close, curtilage or precincts are described as forming the factory. In my view, it follows that any area which is within the close, curtilage or precincts of any premises, which are a factory within the definition of that word in s. 151, is qualified to be treated as "a place" under sub-s. (6), provided it satisfies the other conditions of the sub-section as to user. I can find no ground for concluding that the factory area, to employ the phrase used in Lewis v. Gilbertson & Co., Ltd. (2), is less than co-terminus with the area comprised in the phrase "close, curtilage, or precincts" of the premises, otherwise it would be difficult to give any effect to the word "deemed" in the sub-section. The use of that word indicates that the place postulated is part of the factory area and would be treated as such for all purposes of the Act but for the conditions of the sub-section being fulfilled. If, however, those conditions are fulfilled, the place, though part of the factory area, is deemed not to be a factory, so that the Act ceases to be applicable to it while the conditions of the sub-section continue to be fulfilled. In the present case, the western land is physically separated from the eastern land, and, in my judgment, it constitutes a place within sub-s. (6). As regards "user," it is to be observed that the verb is employed in the present tense, "is used," and I take it to refer to the time of the accident. The word "solely" refers, I think, only to the exclusive nature of the user at the material time and imports no element of period or permanency of user. As regards the nature of the user, the contrast is between "purpose" and "process," and clearly, in this context, "purpose" has a much wider meaning than "process." At the time of the accident, the western land was being used for the purpose of reconstructing the gas holder, and, in my judgment, that was a purpose within the meaning of sub-s. (6). This view is supported by the reasoning of all three members of the court in Lewis v. Gilbertson & Co., Ltd. (2).

The result is that the western land is to be deemed not to have been a part of the gas company's factory at the time of the accident. This would be sufficient to dispose of the appeal, but, as the further question was argued whether or not the gas company were in occupation at the time of the accident, it will be desirable to deal with it. The relevance of this question is that, if the gas company were not in occupation at that time, they are not liable. The contract between the gas company and the contractors provided that the gas company should hand over the site to the contractors, and the evidence shows that this was done. All employees of the gas company were withdrawn from the site: the contractors erected offices; store sheds and mess huts and laid on a telephone. In fact, they took possession. It is true that under the contract the engineer of the gas company or his deputy had a right to enter, but only for the purpose of inspecting the work in progress, but this very right appears to me to be inconsistent with continued occupation by the gas company. The word "occupier" is not defined in the Act. In Ramsay v. Mackie (1) (1904) (7 F. (Ct. of Sess.) 106, 109) LORD MACLAREN said :

"Occupier" plainly means the person who runs the factory or warehouse, who regulates the work that is done there.

On the facts, it appears to me that over the material period the gas company were not the occupiers of the western land.

I have already stated that, in my view, prior to the destruction of the gas holder, the western land formed part of the factory. If the true view had been that s. 151 (6) did not apply in this case, I should still have been of the opinion that as the gas company were not in occupation of the western land they were not liable to the plaintiff, although they remained in occupation of the rest of the factory. I can find nothing in the Act which would compel me to the conclusion that, if the owner of a factory ceases to be the occupier of part of that factory, he remains liable under the Act in respect of an accident occurring on that part while he is out of occupation, merely because he remains the occupier of the remainder of the factory. Neither the policy nor the language of the section compel one to such a conclusion, against which one's common sense would rebel. For those reasons I would allow the appeal.

Appeal of the gas company allowed and judgment entered for them, as defendants, to the plaintiff's claim, with costs in both courts; also, on their claim as against the contractors on the third party proceedings, laid in contract on their indemnity and in tort under the Act of 1935. With regard to the costs of the third party proceedings, the contractors were directed, as third parties, to pay to the gas company, their costs of such proceedings in both courts, whether laid in contract on their indemnity or in tort under the Act of 1935. The gas company's costs to be paid direct to them by the contractors.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Tucker, Bucknill and Somervell, L.JJ.), July 27, 28, 30, 1948.]

Rent Restriction—Standard rent—Apportionment—Application by tenant of whole property—Property, as a whole, outside Rent Restrictions Acts—Property comprising principal dwelling-house and a lodge—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (c. 17), s. 12 (3).

By the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 12 (3): "Where, for the purpose of determining the standard rent or rateable value of any dwelling-house to which this Act applies, it is necessary to apportion the rent at the date in relation to which the standard rent is to be fixed, or the rateable value of the property in which that dwelling-house is comprised, the county court may, on application by either party, make such apportionment as seems just, and the decision of the court as to the amount to be apportioned to the dwelling-house shall be final and conclusive."

By a lease, dated July 31, 1946, the landlord let to the tenant property comprising a principal dwelling-house and a lodge, at a rent of £200 a year for 3 years, subject to a sub-tenancy of the lodge, granted by a previous tenant of the property, at a rent of £104 a year. There had never been a separate assessment for rating purposes of the two houses comprised in the lease. On an application by the tenant under the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 12 (3), for an apportionment of the rateable value and standard rent of the premises between the principal dwelling-house and the lodge for the purpose of ascertaining whether the Rent Restrictions Acts applied to the property:—

HELD : since, as between landlord and tenant, the rent and the rateable value of the property comprised in the lease were already fixed by the lease and the entry in the rate book respectively at figures in excess of the limits prescribed by the Rent Restrictions Acts, it was not "necessary to apportion the rent . . . or the rateable value" under s. 12 (3) of the Act of 1920, and, even if an apportionment were made, it would not bring either of the houses comprised in the lease within the Acts since the rent and the rateable value of the whole demised premises would remain the sum of the two apportioned figures; s. 12 (3) was inapplicable where the tenant applying for apportionment of the separate component parts of premises was the tenant of the whole premises; and, accordingly, there was no jurisdiction to make an order for apportionment.

APPEAL by the landlord from an order of His Honour JUDGE LANGMAN, at Worcester County Court, on Feb. 16, 1948, whereby, on an application by the tenant under the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 12 (3), the county court judge apportioned the rateable value and standard rent of premises comprising a principal dwelling-house and a lodge, the whole property being held by the tenant under one lease. The landlord appealed from the order and the Court of Appeal now allowed the appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of TUCKER, L.J.

Michael Browne for the landlord.

Smallwood for the tenant.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 30. The following judgments were read.

TUCKER, L.J. : This is an appeal from a declaration made by His Honour JUDGE LANGMAN at Worcester County Court on Feb. 16, 1948, whereby he apportioned the rateable value and standard rent of certain premises at Worcester comprising a dwelling-house known as "The Cedars" and the lodge adjacent thereto. The declaration was made on the application of the tenant of the whole property who held it under a lease dated July 31, 1946, from the landlord to the tenant. I think it is desirable to read the actual declaration as drawn up :

On the application of the said Geoffrey James Dorrell and upon hearing Mr. T. Tempest Dinen of counsel for the said applicant and Mr. Michael Browne of counsel for the said respondent, this court for the purpose of ascertaining whether the above mentioned Acts [the Rent Restrictions Acts] apply to certain property situate at Worcester and known as "The Cedars" Henwick Road Worcester demised to the applicant by a lease dated July 31, 1946, and made between the respondent of the one part and the applicant of the other part and comprising the following premises namely : the dwelling-house known as "The Cedars" Henwick Road aforesaid and the lodge adjacent thereto, and for the purpose of determining the respective standard rents of the said premises doth pursuant to the above mentioned Acts (i) Declare that the rateable value of the said property on Apr. 1, 1939, shall be apportioned between the said premises as follows, namely, £63 to the said dwelling-house known as "The Cedars" Henwick Road aforesaid and £17 to the said lodge adjacent thereto. (ii) Declare that by reason of the foregoing declaration the above mentioned Acts apply to the said property and that the rent at which the said property was let on Sept. 1, 1939, shall be apportioned between the said premises as follows, namely, £70 to the said dwelling-house known as "The Cedars" Henwick Road aforesaid and £20 to the said lodge adjacent thereto . . .

Then followed an order as to costs. I draw attention to the words "for the purpose of ascertaining whether the above mentioned Acts apply to certain property."

The relevant facts and the point of law involved are conveniently stated in the judgment of the learned judge from which I quote. He said :

Mr. Geoffrey James Dorrell, as the lessee of "The Cedars," holds the premises under a lease dated July 31, 1946, made between himself and the respondent, Mrs. Amphlett. It is subject to a rent of £200 for 3 years. The property which is comprised in the lease is defined in sched. I to the lease which reads "All the property comprised in and demised by the head lease the principal house erected thereon being now known as 'The Cedars' together with lodge and outbuildings and gardens the whole being numbered 224 Henwick Road in the parish of St. Clement in the city of Worcester subject nevertheless to but with the benefit of a sub-tenancy of the lodge aforesaid granted to . . . Cornfield by the previous tenant of 'The Cedars' at the rent of £104 per annum." So, therefore, it is quite clear that from the terms of the lease itself two individual houses were being let, namely, "The Cedars" and the lodge which was subject to a sub-tenancy. The applicant now comes before the court and asks the court to apportion the rateable value of these premises which he holds under this lease. I cannot help commenting on the fact that one of the covenants in the lease under his hand and deed in which he entered was this, "not at any time during the term, to make any application for any division of the rateable assessment of the premises into more than one assessment as it is now made." In spite of that he comes to the court and asks the court to make this assessment. He has taken advantage of the Rent Acts. It is obviously made, of course, with the intention of benefiting himself, but if the Acts allow him to get an apportionment made by this court then he is entitled, to ask the court to act accordingly. There is one rateable value [viz., £80] for the whole of these premises comprising both "The Cedars" itself and the lodge. There has never been a separate assessment of the two properties and under those circumstances the applicant comes here to ask the court to apportion the whole assessment between these two properties. Fortunately, the court is not troubled by any figures, but the point that is at issue is whether the applicant has any right to ask the court for this to be done.

The learned judge then read the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 12 (3) and said :

Since that Act was passed there have been many cases dealing with the words "dwelling-house to which this Act applies." It is obvious that they have to be read in accordance with the more recent decisions. In other words, sub-s. (3) must now be read as giving power to apportion even where the dwelling-house is on the face of it not within the Acts. The effect seems to be this, that, whether the property is prima facie one to which the Acts apply or not, the court has a duty to apportion either the rent, or if necessary, the rateable value. Now it is contended here in this case by [counsel for the landlord] that, in spite of the decisions which have been referred to, nevertheless the court has no jurisdiction to apportion, because the applicant had a tenancy of one undivided holding, at an entire rent, which comprised both "The Cedars" and the lodge, and that he cannot himself split up the holding and come to the court and ask the court to sub-divide the rent, or to apportion the rateable value in such a way as to entitle him to say that he comes within the Act.

The learned judge then referred to Rider v. Rollitt (1) and Upsons, Ltd. v. Herne (2), and proceeded :

It seems that the present position is that either the landlord or the tenant can come to the court, even when two properties are comprised in one letting, even when rent in the head lease is far outside the rent which would bring the house within the Act—that the landlord or tenant can come to this court and ask the court to make an apportionment. With regret I conclude that the applicant is entitled to have the apportionments made.

He then proceeded to make the apportionments to which I have already referred when reading the declaration, the figures with regard to which had been agreed.

The question turns on the proper construction of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 12 (3), which is as follows :

Where, for the purpose of determining the standard rent or rateable value of any dwelling-house to which this Act applies, it is necessary to apportion the rent at the date in relation to which the standard rent is to be fixed, or the rateable value of the property in which that dwelling-house is comprised, the county court may, on application by either party, make such apportionment as seems just, and the decision of the court as to the amount to be apportioned to the dwelling-house shall be final and conclusive.

This difficult sub-section has been the subject of numerous decisions in the courts, but no case has been cited to us in which the tenant of the whole comprising premises has ever claimed against his landlord to have an apportionment of its separate component parts. In all the cases the tenant applying for apportionment has at the material time been a tenant of one of the component parts of a larger comprising whole. In my view, the short answer to the present problem is to be found in the words :

... Where ... it is necessary to apportion the rent ... or the rateable value ...

A In the present case it appears to me to be quite unnecessary to apportion either the rent or the rateable value of the whole property, because, as between the landlord and the tenant, they are already fixed—the rent by the terms of the lease and the rateable value by the entry in the rate book—at figures in excess of the limits prescribed by the Act of 1920, and even if an apportionment is made it will not result in bringing either “The Cedars” or the lodge within the Acts since the rent and rateable value of the whole demised premises will remain the sum of the two apportioned figures. This is the result of the decision in Rider v. Rollit (1) and also accords with the view recently expressed by BIRKETT, J., in Langford Property Co., Ltd. v. Goldrich (3).

B In Rider v. Rollit (1) the headnote is as follows :

Where there is one letting of two flats at one entire rent, the letting is not divisible so as to bring each of the flats within the limit of rent below which dwelling-houses are brought within the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (War Restrictions) Acts.

LUSH, J., in giving judgment said (36 T.L.R. 687, 688) :

C This case raises a question of novelty and of some difficulty. The defendant is the tenant of two suites of bachelor chambers, under an agreement dated Apr. 16, 1918. He has been there a good many years. He first had the lower suite in 1904 and the upper suite he took, as he says, with the object (as the plaintiff knew) of sub-letting. In the 1912 agreement there was clearly a letting of the whole at one rent of £104. In 1918 the rent was raised to £130. There was an agreement not to under-let without the plaintiff's consent. At the present time the upper floor is vacant. Prima facie the Acts do not apply, for the rent of the two floors together considerably exceeds the limit mentioned in the Acts. The rateable value also exceeds the limit. But the defendant says that these are two separate dwelling-houses, each of which is below the limit, and that it is not a letting of one suite of rooms, but two lettings of two sets. I do not think that it is possible here to say that there were two separate lettings. It was one letting at one entire rent, which issues out of every part of the premises.

D In Langford Property Co., Ltd. v. Goldrich (3) the facts show that on Mar. 24, 1940, the valuation list in question reduced the rateable value of flat No. 13 from £98 to £54, and of flat No. 15 from £92 to £52, in each case retrospectively as from Apr. 1, 1939. BIRKETT, J., in dealing with these two flats, which had been let to the defendant by an agreement of July 1, 1941, at a rent of £300 per annum, increased by subsequent agreements to £525 per annum, held that the combination of the two flats did not constitute a separate dwelling-house, and he concluded his judgment ([1948] 2 All E.R. 443) :

F In these circumstances, I must give judgment for the landlords. I hold that this letting of the separated flats with the garage was not the letting of a dwelling-house as a separate dwelling to which the Act of Parliament applies. I further hold that, if the dwelling is to be regarded as a separate entity at the appropriate day, Apr. 1, 1939, the rateable value exceeded the sum of £100 ... There must be judgment for the landlords on the claim and counterclaim.

G These decisions, with which I respectfully agree, do not, in my view, in any way conflict with the decision of this court in Upsons, Ltd. v. Herne (2), where the apportionment was made in favour of the tenant of flat 2A, which was one of the component parts of the comprising property which consisted of flat 2A, flat 2B and a shop. This court decided that flat 2A was first let when it was let together with 2B and the shop in 1911, and not when it was first let separately in 1925. I can find nothing in the judgments to suggest that, if at the material date the tenant had held all three properties under a lease from the landlord, he could have obtained an apportionment of the entire rent between the different parts of the demised premises. In my view, s. 12 (3) of the Act of 1920 is wholly inapplicable to a case such as this and there was no jurisdiction in the county court to apportion on the application of the tenant of the whole comprising property. For these reasons, I think this appeal should be allowed and the declaration set aside.

H BUCKNILL, L.J. : I agree.

SOMERVELL, L.J. : In all the cases to which we were referred the tenant applicant was tenant of a dwelling-house forming part of the property covered by the assessment or rent which he was seeking to have apportioned, and was not tenant of the remainder. In such a case it was clearly necessary to apportion in order to discover the rateable value of that of which the applicant was tenant. The section also contemplates that the standard rent may be an apportioned amount of a larger rent covering other property. When this is so, it is necessary to apportion in order to discover the standard rent of the dwelling-house. The present case is quite different. The tenant here is and will remain during the period of his tenancy tenant of property which it is agreed is as a whole outside the Acts. It contains two houses, the big house and the lodge. He seeks, first, to have the rateable value apportioned between the big house and the lodge, but, as between him and his landlord, this seems to me irrelevant. This, of course, is a first step in order to get the court to fix standard rents of the two houses based on an apportionment of the rent payable on Sept. 1, 1939. He then claims that the rent which he has to pay for the whole property is the sum of these two standard rents as so fixed. The two rents so added together will come to the rent payable on Sept. 1, 1939. The result is plain. Although the property of which he took a lease was outside the Acts, he is claiming to be treated in the same way as if it were inside the Acts, and to pay no more than the rent payable on Sept. 1, 1939, with, of course, additions, if any, to the standard rent allowable under the provisions of the Acts. I can find no justification in the words of s. 12 (3) of the Act of 1920 for this procedure. Counsel for the tenant relied on the words "by either party." These words, I think, mean that in the normal case, such as those which have come before the courts, either landlord or tenant can apply. A landlord who was splitting up premises previously let as one dwelling-house into two or more dwelling-houses might wish to know the proportions in which the original rent should be apportioned.

Counsel also relied on the hardship which, he submitted, would arise if the sub-lessee of the lodge applied as against the tenant for an apportionment of rateable value which would, it seems, clearly bring the lodge within the Acts. He would then apply to have his standard rent based on an apportioned amount of the rent payable for the whole property on Sept. 1, 1939. This would be very much less than the £104 in the expectation of receiving which the tenant agreed to pay £200. Assuming that the sub-tenant would succeed in such an application, one answer to the argument is that, if a man becomes tenant of property part of which is sub-leased, he takes subject to any statutory rights the sub-tenant may have under the sub-leases or any Acts of Parliament. It is unnecessary to consider whether, if the sub-tenant succeeded in reducing his rent below the sum named in the lease with which we are concerned, the tenant would have any rights. If at the time when a lease was negotiated it was realised that sub-tenants might successfully claim to reduce their rents, an express provision could be inserted providing for a pro tanto reduction of the rent payable by the tenant.

The county court judge, I think, was wrong in regarding Rider v. Rollit (1) as overruled by later cases. That case was not an application for apportionment, but, if the learned county court judge was right, s. 12 (3) could be used to enable a tenant to effect what he was held unable to do in that case. Counsel for the tenant relied particularly on Upsons, Ltd. v. Herne (2). That case does not seem to me to throw any light on the present problem. It was a type of case contemplated by the section in which the tenant applicant was tenant of part only of the property covered by the rent which he was seeking to have apportioned. I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed with costs here and in the county court on scale "A."

THE BELLAMAN. THE AGOSTINO BERTANI.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Lord Merriman, P.),
July 15, 16, 29, 1948.]

Prize Law—Condemnation—Claims arising out of “purported exercise of belligerent rights” barred by peace treaty—Ships aground in port—Capture of port—Ships formally boarded and certificate of prize signed four years after armistice, but before signing of peace treaty—Naval Prize Act, 1864 (c. 25), s. 16.

The Treaty of Peace with Italy, by art. 76, provides : “ 1. Italy waives all claims of any description against the Allied and Associated Powers on behalf of the Italian government or Italian nationals arising directly out of the war or out of actions taken because of the existence of a state of war in Europe after Sept. 1, 1939, whether or not the Allied or Associated Power was at war with Italy at the time, including the following : (a) claims for losses or damages sustained as a consequence of acts of forces or authorities of Allied or Associated Powers ; (b) claims arising from the presence, operations or actions of forces or authorities of Allied or Associated Powers in Italian territory ; (c) claims with respect to the decrees or orders of Prize Courts of Allied or Associated Powers, Italy agreeing to accept as valid and binding all decrees and orders of such Prize Courts on or after Sept. 1, 1939, concerning Italian ships or Italian goods or the payment of costs ; (d) claims arising out of the exercise or purported exercise of belligerent rights. 2. The provisions of this article shall bar, completely and finally, all claims of the nature referred to herein, which will be henceforward extinguished, whoever may be the parties in interest . . . 5. The waiver of claims by Italy under para. 1 of this article includes any claims arising out of actions taken by any of the Allied and Associated Powers with respect to Italian ships between Sept. 1, 1939, and the coming into force of the present treaty, as well as any claims and debts arising out of the Conventions on Prisoners of War now in force.” It is provided by the Treaties of Peace (Italy, Rumania, Bulgaria, Hungary and Finland) Act, 1947, and the Treaty of Peace (Italy) Order, 1948, that, inter alia, art. 76 shall be and have effect as law.

The “Bellaman” and the “Agostino Bertani” were two Italian vessels which at all material times were lying aground in Tripoli harbour, having been sunk by Allied action while the port was in enemy hands. On Jan. 23, 1943, Tripoli was captured by British troops. On Sept. 3, 1943, the Italian armistice was signed, and it was admitted by the Crown that the right to capture Italian merchant vessels was precluded by the terms thereof, but not the right to render effectual in the Prize Court captures made before the armistice. In 1944, a standing order was issued by the Commander-in-Chief Mediterranean to the effect that such vessels as might be salvaged should be seized in prize. Nothing was done, however, in relation to the vessels until Feb. 3, 1947, when both were boarded by an officer of the Royal Navy, who hoisted the White Ensign in each and signed a certificate that each had been seized in prize that day. The Treaty of Peace with Italy was signed on Feb. 10, 1947, the writs in prize were issued on May 5, 1947, and on Sept. 15, 1947, the Treaty of Peace came into force. It was contended by the claimants that the Crown’s possession of the ships was wholly unlawful, the Crown had no rights in prize and did not even purport to exercise any rights as captors in prize or otherwise until any right they might have had in this respect had lapsed by the terms of the Italian armistice, that, consequently, art. 76 did not apply, and, therefore, the claimants were entitled to the release of their ships.

HELD : (i) the claims of the owners arose out of the “purported exercise of belligerent rights” within art. 76, which operated to bar those claims.

(ii) the failure for four years to comply with the Naval Prize Act, 1864, s. 16 (which imposes a duty to deliver up every ship taken as a prize to the marshal of the court forthwith) did not rebut the presumption that the vessels were seized when Tripoli was captured, and they were, therefore, condemnable as good and lawful prize.

ACTION IN PRIZE.

In this action for condemnation as prize the owners claimed to have released to them the two ships of which the Crown sought condemnation. LORD MERRIMAN, P., held that the claims by the owners were barred by the Treaty of Peace with Italy, art. 76, and that the ships were condemnable. The facts appear in the judgment.

Le Quesne, K.C., and Quintin Hogg for the Crown.
Gething for the owners.

Curr. adv. vult.

July 29. LORD MERRIMAN, P., read the following judgment. In these cases the Crown seeks condemnation of two ships, the "Bellaman" and the "Agostino Bertani" which at all material times were lying aground in Tripoli Harbour, having with many others been sunk there by Allied action while the port was still in enemy hands. When Tripoli and its harbour were captured by British troops on Jan. 23, 1943, the "Bellaman" was found lying in 22ft. of water not far from the quay. A photograph shows that her deck was well above water level. The "Agostino Bertani" was lying about the middle of the harbour. No photograph of her was produced, nor was it stated in what depth of water she was lying, but she is a vessel of 6,000 tons gross and 3,609 tons net and it was not disputed that in the case of a vessel of this size a considerable part of her hull would be above water. Both vessels are being salvaged by salvage contractors under an arrangement by which the contractors undertake to clear the harbour and to pay an inclusive sum for the right to keep for their own account such ships as can be made seaworthy. Except possibly on the question of the amount recoverable in the event of the claimants succeeding in their claim, it is not suggested that either the details of this arrangement, or the fact that the Admiralty have put salvage in the hands of contractors instead of salvaging the vessels themselves, are material to the questions at issue in this case. Moreover, the Procurator General has undertaken to bring into court, if called on to do so, the proper value of any particular ship, so as to ensure that her owner will not be prejudiced if she is sold by the salvage contractors at less than her true value.

The claimants, who are Italian nationals, are the respective owners of the two vessels. The Crown puts the case in two ways: first, that by the Treaties of Peace (Italy, Rumania, Bulgaria, Hungary and Finland) Act, 1947, and the Treaty of Peace (Italy) Order, 1948, it is provided that, amongst others, art. 76 of the Treaty shall be and have effect as law; that this binds the Prize Court: see the "Bathori" (1), with the result that, whatever rights the claimants might have had are barred, completely and finally; and, therefore, they have no locus standi to prosecute their claims. Alternatively, the Crown says that, on the merits, the ships are condemnable as good and lawful prize. The claimants, on the other hand, argue that the Crown's possession of the ships is wholly unlawful, that the Crown has no rights in prize at all, and did not even purport to exercise any rights as captors in prize, or otherwise, until any right they might have had in this respect had lapsed by the terms of the Italian armistice and, consequently, that art. 76 of the treaty had no application and they are entitled to the release of the ships ex debito justitiæ.

The material parts of art. 76 of the treaty are as follows:

1. Italy waives all claims of any description against the Allied and Associated Powers on behalf of the Italian government or Italian nationals arising directly out of the war or out of actions taken because of the existence of a state of war in Europe after Sept. 1, 1939, whether or not the Allied or Associated Power was at war with Italy at the time, including the following: (a) claims for losses or damages sustained as a consequence of acts of forces or authorities of Allied or Associated Powers; (b) claims arising from the presence, operations or actions of forces or authorities of Allied or Associated Powers in Italian territory; (c) claims with respect to the decrees or orders of Prize Courts of Allied or Associated Powers, Italy agreeing to accept as valid and binding all decrees and orders of such Prize Courts on or after Sept. 1, 1939, concerning Italian ships or Italian goods or the payment of costs; (d) claims arising out of the exercise or purported exercise of belligerent rights. 2. The provisions of this article shall bar, completely and finally, all claims of the nature referred to herein, which will be henceforward extinguished, whoever may be the parties in interest . . . 5. The waiver of claims by Italy under para. 1 of this article includes any claims arising out of actions taken by any of the Allied and Associated Powers with respect to Italian ships between Sept. 1, 1939, and the coming into force of the present treaty as well as any claims and debts arising out of the Conventions on Prisoners of War now in force.

In the "Bathori" (1), the vessel, in spite of the fact that she was sailing under a safe conduct, had been captured and sunk by the Royal Navy in September, 1914, and the question was whether her owners, a company carrying on business at Fiume, a Hungarian port, had the right to claim in prize for her loss under the terms of the Treaty of Trianon. Under annex III to arts. 163 and 169 of the treaty, the Hungarian government agreed on behalf of themselves, and so as to bind all other persons' interest, to waive all claims of any description against the allied and associated governments and their nationals in respect of the detention, employment, loss or damage of any Hungarian ships or boats, and by annex II to art. 232 it was provided:

No claim or action shall be made or brought against any Allied or Associated Power or against any person acting on behalf of or under the direction of any legal authority or department of the government of such a power by Hungary or by any Hungarian national or by or on behalf of any national of the former Kingdom of Hungary wherever resident in respect of any act or omission with regard to his property, rights or interests during the war or in preparation for the war.

By an Order in Council, the above provisions of the treaty were to have full force and effect as law, but, because Fiume had been recognised as an independent state before the Treaty of Trianon came into force, the difficult question arose whether the treaty applied to the claim at all. No such issue, of course, arises in the present case. Delivering the advice of the Privy Council, LORD ATKIN said ([1934] A.C. 97):

Whether the plaintiffs were or were not Hungarian nationals at the effective date of the treaty, their Lordships have come to the conclusion that the clause in question plainly was intended to cover them . . . This, however, determines only the question of construction. If the treaty operated by international law only, the tribunal in Prize might well have had to determine how far Hungary's attempt to affect the rights of ex-nationals could be treated as effective. But for an English court, whether in Prize or not, this question is precluded by the terms of the Treaty of Peace (Hungary) Act, 1921. The Orders in Council made under it are to have effect as if enacted in the Act. The Order provides that the scheduled sections of the treaty are to have full force and effect as law. If, therefore, the clause in question bears the construction which has already been imputed to it, that construction must be enforced in British courts as law. It follows that the claim of the plaintiffs is barred by the clause.

The terms of art. 76 are not identical with the relevant clauses of the Treaty of Trianon, but I am unable to find any distinction in principle. Manifestly, therefore, if art. 76 applies, there is an end of the matter so far as the claimants are concerned. To see whether or not it applies, it is necessary to examine the course of events. It is admitted that, apart from the capture of the port itself, no overt act was done, at the time, in respect of either ship to denote that she had been seized in prize. On Sept. 3, 1943, an armistice between Italy and the Allies was signed between Marshal Badoglio and General Eisenhower by their respective staff officers, and on Sept. 29 Marshal Badoglio and General Eisenhower signed additional conditions headed "Instrument of Surrender of Italy." I do not think it is necessary to refer to the terms of these instruments in detail or to examine such authority as is to be found in text-books on international law regarding the right to capture enemy merchant vessels during an armistice, inasmuch as it was admitted on behalf of the Crown that the right to capture Italian merchant vessels was precluded by the terms of this armistice, but this admission expressly excepted the right to take such incidental steps as might be necessary to render effectual in the Prize Court such captures as had been made before the conclusion of the armistice. Nor did the claimants contend that the armistice would prevent the Crown from proceeding to obtain condemnation of ships already seized. Their contention was that no attention was paid to these or any other ships lying sunk in the harbour, that seizure in prize was never contemplated, at any rate until long afterwards, and that, in effect, the ships were only regarded as obstructions to the harbour to be cleared away as soon as possible. But it is to be observed that in pursuance of instructions received from the Admiralty in November, 1943, and February, 1944, the Commander-in-Chief Mediterranean issued Mediterranean Shore Standing Order No. 9, which stated the Admiralty policy regarding the salvage, amongst other things, of ex-Italian merchant vessels lying in Libyan waters, in the following terms :

Such vessels [as] may be salvaged, or any gear, equipment or scrap which may be recovered therefrom, should be seized in prize and placed in the custody of the Admiralty Marshal's substitute for the area. While it is possible for the Admiralty to enter into contracts for the salvage of such ships, gear, etc., it is not possible to sell them without the authority of the Admiralty Marshal, who in turn must obtain an order from the court. The Custodian of Enemy Property is not concerned.

I am not informed of the precise date when this Order was issued, but I understand that it was some time early in 1944. In the light of this statement of policy which appears to regard vessels such as the two in question as being already subject to the jurisdiction of the Prize Court, I am unable to accept the contention that the steps I am about to mention were the result of a belated afterthought unconnected with any rights which the Crown might have acquired before the armistice.

Nothing was done, however, in relation to these vessels until, on Feb. 3, 1947, both were boarded by a lieutenant of the Royal Navy, who hoisted the White Ensign in each of them and signed a certificate that the vessel had been seized in prize that day. It is evident that this action was taken in view of the impending signature of the Treaty of Peace with Italy. This treaty was signed on Feb. 10, 1947. On Apr. 29 the Treaties of Peace (Italy, Rumania, Bulgaria, Hungary and Finland) Act, 1947, was passed, but, as is admitted, the treaty with Italy, under art. 90 thereof, only came into force on Sept. 15, 1947. Meanwhile, on May 5, 1947, writs in prize were issued in respect of both vessels. Thus, when art. 76 became law, it is indisputable that both vessels had been placed under the jurisdiction of the Prize Court by the Crown, and that each is now the subject of a claim in prize by an Italian national, though appearances were not in fact entered until Jan. 7 and June 9, 1948, respectively. It may be that it is unnecessary to say more ; but in view of the argument of counsel for the claimants that claimants in prize are in the position of defendants rather than of plaintiffs, and therefore that prize procedure and nomenclature should not be regarded as decisive, I prefer to base my judgment on broader considerations.

The "Progress" (2) was a case of prize salvage in respect of ships recaptured from the French at Oporto by the Allied army under Lord Wellington. To found the claim it was obviously necessary to show, first, that the enemy had captured the ships, and, secondly, that the captor had recovered the property. Dealing with these points, SIR W. SCOTT said (Edw. 210, 211) :

I think I may consider it as decided in fact, that the French had captured these ships, and were actually in possession of them ; it is not necessary to show that they had taken formal possession of each individual ship, because they had possession of the port itself ; and the taking of that which contained the vessels is in effect the same as taking bodily possession of the ships themselves. It is likewise clear in point of principle, that it is not necessary that it should be primarily the intention of the captor to recover the property.

In my opinion, the use of the word " likewise " in the last sentence is significant. This case was approved in The Roumanian (3). In The Edward and Mary (4), another case of prize salvage, SIR W. SCOTT, dealing with the question of capture, said (3 Ch. Rob. 306) :

... in this case the " Arethusa " came up for the very purpose of taking this French captor, if he is to be so considered, and actually took him ; and it is owing to this act of the " Arethusa " that this vessel was rescued from his grasp. The master, I must observe, has given an improper deposition, and very ill according with the entries in his log-book. By that it appears that the French vessel brought him to, and declared herself a French privateer, and ordered him to lie to; but owing to the boisterous state of the weather, she did not send a man on board. I can by no means agree to what has been advanced in argument, that it was on this account no capture. The sending of a prize master on board is a very natural overt act of possession, but by no means essential to constitute a capture. If the merchantman was obliged to lie to and obey the direction of the French lugger, and await her further orders, she was completely under the dominion of the enemy; there was no ability to resist, and no prospect of escape.

Although he was unable to make an award of salvage under the terms of the Act of Parliament, he held (ibid., 308) that salvage was recoverable under the general maritime law. This case was followed by the Privy Council in "The Pellworm" (5).

In "The Anichab" (6) LORD STERNDAL, P., dealing with a number of tugs, lighters and other craft and material belonging to a German shipping company in two ports of German West Africa which had been occupied by the Union forces, said (3 Br. & Col. Pr. Cas. 615):

When the Union forces took possession of these ports, I am satisfied that they also took possession of all these craft, which were then either afloat or beached above or below the high water line, and that, therefore, there was a seizure at that time of these craft.

In H.M. Procurator in Egypt v. Deutsches Kohlen Depot Gesellschaft (7), the Privy Council went behind the record of the Prize Court of Alexandria to examine whether there had in fact been a valid seizure of certain enemy tugs and lighters employed in coaling ships in the Suez Canal. In the event, their Lordships held that, although physical possession had not been taken of the individual craft, there had been a submission to treat the whole fleet as seized by consent, and that this sufficed, although the captors gave no further attention to the matter. I am not called on to consider any question concerning the limits of the port, for both vessels were clearly within the narrowest possible limits which could be drawn. Nor need I consider whether vessels lying in deep water, or hulks sunk to block the harbour entrance, can fairly be reckoned as vessels captured with the port. Such questions can be dealt with when they arise. Neither of these vessels was in any sense a total loss. The standing order already quoted shows that the salvage of vessels in their situation was contemplated, at least as early as 1944, on the basis that the salvage was the concern of the Admiralty Marshal. When, therefore, the White Ensign was hoisted in anticipation of the Peace Treaty, and prize writs were issued before the Treaty came into force, I find it impossible, whether the vessels were actually condemnable in prize or not, to hold otherwise than that these are claims arising, at the least, out of the "purported exercise of belligerent rights." In so holding I do not rely merely on the technical position of the claimants under the Prize Court Rules, though this would, doubtless, be present to the minds of the framers of art. 76. In TERMES DE LA LEY, adopting a definition by LORD DYER quoted in Stowell v. Lord Zouch (8), a "claim" is described as "a challenge by any man of the property or ownership of a thing which he hath not in possession but is withholden from him wrongfully." In the OXFORD ENGLISH DICTIONARY the primary meaning of the word is given as "a demand for something as due: an assertion of a right to do something." Seeing that art. 76 embraces "claims of any description," I have no doubt that these claims are included in its terms. I, therefore, hold that the claimants' right to sue is barred and their claims must be dismissed.

The disposal of the claims, however, does not necessarily involve the condemnation of the vessels in prize, whatever may be the rights of the Crown under the peace treaty. The right to condemnation depends on there having been a lawful seizure, i.e., a seizure before the conclusion of the armistice. I have already indicated my opinion that there is a presumption that the vessels were seized when the port was captured, but, in considering whether there was an effectual seizure, the requirements of the Naval Prize Act, 1864, s. 16, must be borne in mind. By that section:

Every ship taken as prize, and brought into port within the jurisdiction of a prize court, shall forthwith, and without bulk broken, be delivered up to the marshal of the court. If there is no such marshal, then the ship shall be in like manner delivered up to the principal officer of customs at the port. The ship shall remain in the custody of the marshal, or of such officer, subject to the orders of the court. ("Nothing in this section shall apply to ships of war taken as prize.")

This duty, which is peremptory, could have been performed without difficulty in this case. Yet, as has appeared, nothing was done for four years by the captors to put themselves in order with the Prize Court. This laxity in the performance of a cardinal duty might well suggest that these vessels had never in fact been seized before 1947. On the other hand, as the Standing Order shows, the Admiralty were fully alive to their duty, but it is in connection with possible salvage that emphasis is laid on the necessity of placing vessels seized in prize in the custody of the Admiralty Marshal, and it may well be that those on the spot assumed that no action was required until the time came to undertake salvage operations. After all, there was no possibility of these vessels, aground as they were, escaping at any time, nor, short of a recapture of the port by the Germans, was there any prospect of a change in the situation after the surrender of Italy. In these circumstances I think that to draw from the failure to carry out the statutory duties of a captor the inference that no seizure had in fact taken place would be to ignore the realities of the situation. I find, therefore, that these vessels were seized when the port of Tripoli was captured, and hold that they are condemnable as good and lawful prize.

Decree of condemnation. No order as to costs.

WOODBURY v. WOODBURY.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Tucker, Bucknill and Somervell, L.JJ.), July 14, 15, 16, 30, 1948.]

Divorce—Connivance—Consideration of conduct as a whole—Corrupt intention—Letters written by distraught wife amounting to licence to continue adulterous association.

In 1940 the wife discovered that her husband had been carrying on an adulterous association with their child's governess and, while in a nervous, hysterical state as the result of the shock of the discovery, wrote to the husband and to his mistress letters which, in their literal meaning and when divorced from the circumstances in which they were written, amounted to a licence to the husband to continue his adulterous intercourse, which, in fact, the husband did. On a petition for divorce on the grounds of the husband's adultery, adultery was admitted, but it was contended on behalf of the husband that the wife had connived at his adultery by reason of the letters which she wrote on first discovering the association.

HELD: the court should not hold the wife guilty of connivance on the letters written by her while in a distraught and hysterical condition as a result of the discovery of the adultery, but her conduct as a whole over a reasonable period of time should be considered, and on this basis there was no evidence that the wife willingly consented at any future adultery.

Dicta of LORD MERRIMAN, P., in Churchman v. Churchman, [1945] 2 All E.R. 190, 194, 195, applied.

Per BUCKNILL, L.J.: Construing "corrupt intention" as meaning that she shows by her conduct that she willingly consents to the continuance of the adultery, a wife who, on discovering that her husband is carrying on an adulterous association with a woman, behaves with such corrupt intention in such a way as to promote or encourage the continuance of the adultery, is guilty of connivance, but, if she shows by her conduct that she greatly desires the adulterous association to cease, communicates the desire both to the husband and his mistress, and takes the best steps available and known to her to stop it, she is not guilty of connivance, although at the time she takes no active steps to leave the husband or divorce him and even suggests to the husband that he continue the association.

APPEAL by the husband from an order of WALLINGTON, J., dated Nov. 27, 1947, granting to the wife a decree nisi on the ground of the husband's adultery. The Court of Appeal affirmed the finding of the learned judge that the wife had not been guilty of connivance. The facts appear in the judgments of BUCKNILL and SOMERVELL, L.JJ.

Fairweather for the husband.

Arthian Davies, K.C., and Roland Adams for the wife.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 30. TUCKER, L.J. : I will ask BUCKNILL, L.J., and SOMERVELL, L.J., to read their judgments first.

BUCKNILL, L.J. : This is an appeal from a judgment of WALLINGTON, J., granting a decree nisi to the wife on the ground of her husband's adultery with a woman named Sylvia Macintosh. The adultery is admitted, and the only point is whether the wife connived at the adultery. The trial judge held that there had been no connivance.

The parties were married in 1929, when the wife was 23, and her husband about 39 years old. One child, James, was born in 1931. In 1936 a Miss Macintosh was employed as governess to James, and the husband subsequently started to commit adultery with her, with the result that in 1939 she had a child who died shortly afterwards. The husband and the governess concealed their adulterous intercourse from the wife. When war broke out in 1939 the husband, who was living in London with his wife and James, sent Miss Macintosh to Ramsgate with James for his greater safety. In February, 1940, the wife, in consequence of an anonymous letter, went down to Ramsgate and asked the governess what were her true relations with her husband. Miss Macintosh confessed to the adultery. This was a great shock to the wife. She took James away from Miss Macintosh and brought him back to London with her. The wife also spoke to her husband about the adultery and begged him to give it up, but he refused. In consequence of this distressing shock the wife became ill, and about March consulted a Dr. Blake, who was called as a witness and said that she was at that time "very nervous and from the mental point of view in a very bad way, in a hysterical highly nervous tearful state." He said that she was not certifiably insane, but she was hardly responsible for her actions at that time. It was in these circumstances that the wife wrote certain letters to her husband and to Miss Macintosh to which I shall have to refer in detail, because it is argued on behalf of the husband that they amounted to connivance at the adultery. On May 2 the wife went into hospital for an operation in connection with her nose and remained there until May 27. Whilst she was there the husband, against the wife's wishes, took James back to Miss Macintosh at Ramsgate and continued his adulterous association with her. After the wife came out of hospital she got James back again and took him with her to stay with some friends in Wiltshire, and she also instructed her solicitors to start divorce proceedings against her husband. The wife then discontinued these proceedings because she was still fond of her husband and did not wish the marriage to be broken up, and she wrote to her husband and asked him to meet her in London. They met, and the wife then told the husband that he must choose between a divorce or a complete reconciliation with her, in which case she suggested they should live together again in the hope that she might conceive another child by him. At this time it was obvious that there were likely to be heavy bomb attacks on England and the husband and wife agreed that she should take James to America, where it was hoped she might give birth to another child. If the husband refused to be reconciled and to give up his mistress, then the wife said she would proceed with the divorce. The husband elected for the reconciliation, but did not tell his wife that Miss Macintosh was again pregnant by him. She, in fact, gave birth to a child in the following December. In pursuance of this arrangement the wife came to London on several occasions during the next few weeks and stayed with the husband and intercourse took place between them. On July 20 the wife and James and the husband went up to Liverpool where he stayed another two nights with her, and she and James then set sail for the United States. In the following month the husband rejoined the Army. The wife stayed in America until October, 1947.

On Apr. 3, 1947, the wife filed this petition asking for a divorce on the ground of her husband's adultery with Miss Macintosh in 1940, 1941 and 1947. Adultery in 1940 and in 1947 was formally proved by inquiry agents. At the trial the husband did not go into the witness box and no evidence was called on his behalf. It was argued on behalf of the husband that the wife connived at the husband's adultery, not only by reason of the letters which she wrote to her husband in 1940, but also because, so it was said, she must have known that the husband would go on living with Miss Macintosh after his wife went to America. It was contended that the wife must have known of that probability and nevertheless continued to make her husband an allowance.

I must now refer to the letters which the wife wrote shortly after she learned about her husband's adultery, to him, or to Miss Macintosh. I do not propose to set them out in full. The learned judge in his judgment commented on the circumstances in which they were written as follows, and counsel for the husband did not criticise the statement :

The result of the statements made by the wife in regard to those letters—all of which I accept as being true, because I am satisfied that she was a credible witness—is that they satisfy me that in writing the things that she did write, including the letter on which reliance is placed by the husband, she was using every possible endeavour to induce her husband to give up this association—not to countenance, but to indicate the strongest possible objection to, the adultery that she had discovered was going on, and for some time after her first discovery of the horrible state of things she really was at her wits' end and was beside herself, and in the condition that the news produced on her she was trying to visualise the present and the future. She was trying to do the best for her husband and the boy and she was struggling, in every way she could conceive it possible to make a struggle, to induce this woman not to continue, but to discontinue, the adultery with her husband. I cannot imagine any more that this wife, in these particular circumstances, could have done to indicate her abhorrence of what her husband was doing in complete disregard of the marriage and in complete disregard of this woman's peace of mind . . . I am satisfied that her husband was bringing to bear upon her, cruelly, the greatest possible pressure at this time in order to appeal to her not only to consent to his adultery but also to consent to the boy remaining with the adulteress.

The high water mark of the husband's charge of connivance, if such a simile is suitable for such a case, is reached in two letters, written on Mar. 8, 1940, by the wife, one to the woman and the other to the husband. I will read the first part of the letter to Miss Macintosh :

Dear Sylvia, After a literally sleepless night and a long talk with my beloved husband I want to be big about it—he needs you as a lover and friend quite apart from his fondness for me, for whom he no longer feels any desire in the way in which you gratify him—so please go ahead, if you wish as friend and lover—it will not hurt me after all I have suffered but I cannot give you James as well—that situation is vile and you have lived this vileness for three years without your Scotch conscience forcing you to give up an indecent situation, but now you know that I know, you cannot bear it any longer, of this I am certain. James must become my son and you must not share him with my husband. Share everything else but not my legal heir and my dearly beloved only son. Your goodness to the boy has been perfection but that you could combine the roles was very far from God-like. I leave you the half which appeals to you most, the moral aspect of the whole affair is for God to judge and not for me to comment on.

The second letter was written by the wife to the husband and was as follows :

Terms for a peaceful settlement. (1) You share your son with his mother from this day on. (2) You continue with Sylvia as her friend and lover. (3) Is it (sic) clear that you can still have both James and Sylvia, but on different sides of your life, cleanly and happily, without agony to your son's mother. At last and for the last time I will not budge. Your wife. Show to Sylvia please.

Counsel for the husband argued that these letters amounted to a licence to the husband to continue his adulterous association with Miss Macintosh. They were certainly not intended as such by the wife, although they may be so regarded in their literal meaning and when divorced from the circumstances in which they were written.

The question then arises whether in these circumstances the wife was in law guilty of connivance at her husband's adultery. In so far as it is a question of fact, the learned judge has decided that the wife did not connive. On this aspect of the case two questions in particular arise : (1) What are the circumstances in which a wife, who discovers that her husband is carrying on an adulterous intercourse, is guilty of connivance if he continues the adulterous intercourse ? (2) How far is the motive of the wife material, when considering her conduct towards her husband, which may appear to tolerate the continuance of adulterous intercourse ? As regards the first point, LORD MERRIMAN, P., when he delivered the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Churchman v. Churchman (1) said ([1945] 2 All E.R. 190, 194) :

The judge did not deal expressly with the question whether he regarded the connivance at the continuance of the adultery as amounting by ratification to connivance at the earlier adultery. It would seem that he regarded connivance at any stage of the adultery charged as fatal. The point is of importance because it is of the essence of connivance that it precedes the event and, generally speaking, the material event is the inception of the adultery and not its repetition, although the facts may be such that connivance at the continuance of an adulterous association shows that the husband must be taken to have connived at it from the first.

In the present case, once the adulterous intercourse had started without any fault on the part of the wife, her position, when she did discover it, was very difficult. If she, with a corrupt intention, then behaved in such a way as to promote or encourage the continuance of the adultery, to quote the words used by LORD MERRIMAN, P., in Churchman v. Churchman (1) in another part of his judgment (ibid., 195), I think she would be guilty of connivance, but, in my opinion, " corrupt intention " would mean in this case that the wife showed by her conduct that she willingly consented to the continuance of the adultery. If she showed by her conduct that she greatly desired it to cease, and communicated the desire both to her husband and his mistress, and took the best steps available to her, as she thought, to stop it, I do not think she was guilty of connivance, although at the time she took no active steps to leave her husband or to divorce him and even suggested to him " to continue with Sylvia as her friend and lover." The principle which underlies the doctrine of connivance, that a spouse must come into court with clean hands, and the maxim volenti non fit injuria, seem to me inapplicable to such a case as this.

In my opinion, therefore, the letters written by the wife to her husband and Miss Macintosh after she discovered their adulterous intercourse did not amount to connivance at the husband's adultery during the few months in 1940 between the date of the discovery and the date when the wife forgave her husband and started to have marital relations with him again, on the assumption that the husband was not going to continue to commit adultery with Miss Macintosh.

It was argued before us that, assuming the wife did not connive at the husband's adultery in 1940, she nevertheless connived at his subsequent adultery after she went to America. It was suggested that this adultery, in fact, persisted up to 1947 when the wife started her petition, and that the wife must have known of it, and, by continuing to send her husband an allowance, encouraged or promoted it. In my view, there was no evidence that the wife knew of this further adultery. On this point counsel for the husband asked permission of the court to put in further letters from the wife to the husband during this period, but we refused permission. To do so might have involved a new trial. The husband gave no reasonable explanation why he had not produced the letters at the original hearing. They were in his possession then and he could have done so without difficulty. There was nothing in the letters produced at the trial by the husband from the time when the wife left England until 1947 to show that she knew that the adultery was continuing, and there was nothing in the husband's letters, which the wife produced, to indicate that he was committing adultery, and the husband did not go into the witness box to say that he told his wife that he was committing adultery with Miss Macintosh or that his wife knew about it. I, therefore, think that there is no evidence that the wife connived at any future adultery, which ended, so far as she knew, with the reconciliation in 1940, until she caused inquiries to be made through her solicitors in 1947. In my judgment, the wife rightly proved to the satisfaction of WALINGTON, J., that she has not at any time connived at her husband's adultery, and this appeal should be dismissed.

SOMERVELL, L.J. : The parties were married in 1929. In 1931 a boy was born, James. In 1936 Miss Macintosh, the woman named, was engaged as governess to the boy. It is plain that the wife formed a very high opinion of Miss Macintosh as governess and that they became personal friends. The wife was in America from the end of 1938 to March, 1939. When she returned she found to her surprise and regret that Miss Macintosh had left and the boy sent to a day school. In the summer of 1939 the husband and the wife had their summer holiday at Deauville and lived together as man and wife. They returned on the outbreak of war. The wife was naturally worried about the boy and the possibility of air raids and was delighted when the husband told her that he had arranged for Miss Macintosh to come back and look after the boy in a cottage which he had taken for them at Ramsgate. In February, 1940, the wife received an anonymous letter telling her that the husband had spent a summer at Dieppe with Miss Macintosh, at a time when the wife was away. This was a terrible shock to her. The husband at first denied the allegation. The wife went to Ramsgate to see Miss Macintosh, who told her that she had been the husband's mistress since 1937. She also said she knew it was very wrong. The wife was convinced that Miss Macintosh was deeply in love with the husband.

It is, I think, difficult to exaggerate the horror which the wife felt at this disclosure. She was deeply in love with her husband. That he should have carried on this adulterous association in the home with the governess to whom she was attached and whom she trusted implicitly, and that her son should have been at Ramsgate with his father and his mistress was more than could be borne. In her own words : " I was in a state of grief and misery beyond any description and memory of it." She brought the boy back with her to London. She had a hysterical conversation with her husband. She remembered that she begged him not to leave her. She believed that she could break up the association. At a date shortly after this she wrote a letter to her husband in which she is contemplating taking her life. We now come to the documents on which the charge of connivance is based. The husband had told the wife that he would not give up Miss Macintosh sexually. He seemed to see " no sin whatever in it." In the first letter relied on from the wife to Miss Macintosh she is urging her to go away as " the only honourable thing." The wife clearly took the view that her best chance was to appeal to Miss Macintosh. There is, I think, no element of connivance in this letter. The documents which raise the issue are two letters to Miss Macintosh of Mar. 8 and 10, 1940, and an undated document headed " Terms for a peaceful settlement." These documents suggested an arrangement which, if persisted in and acted on by the three parties concerned, would, in my opinion, have amounted to connivance. The husband was to continue with Miss Macintosh as her friend and lover ; the boy was never to be with them ; the wife was prepared to live with the husband as his friend.

The first point that is clear is that this suggestion was never accepted or acted on by the parties to whom it was made. The wife seems to have been unaware of her legal rights and clearly believed that she must somehow get the husband to agree not to take the boy with him when he went to commit adultery with Miss Macintosh. To secure this was the main point of the suggestion. Very shortly after this the wife had to go into hospital for an operation. The husband at once takes the boy with him to the cottage at Ramsgate where he stays with Miss Macintosh. The suggestion, therefore, was not accepted. It is plain that the husband was determined to continue sexual intercourse with Miss Macintosh, if she was willing, and the suggestion in no way contributed to his adultery. So far as Miss Macintosh was concerned, there is evidence in a letter she wrote later, on June 10, when the wife was considering divorce proceedings, that the wife's general attitude including this, if you will, dishonourably generous suggestion had made Miss Macintosh angry with the husband for bringing the boy. It is possible that in a half conscious way the wife put the suggestion forward hoping that it might bring home to Miss Macintosh the misery she was inflicting, and lead her to give up the husband. On May 1 the wife writes to the husband hoping that he will not continue " this crucifixion indefinitely," and not sacrifice all for sake of sexual relationship. On June 7 she writes to Miss Macintosh making a last appeal to her to give up the husband - if not, divorce proceedings will be taken. " The present conduct is wrong and damaging to all three souls. It must not continue." " If you do not give him up, I shall never see him again."

"It must be a clean break, one way or the other." All trace of connivance had disappeared.

Before considering the mental condition of the wife during these weeks the question may be put in this way. A wife, desperately anxious to get her husband back and away from his mistress, is convinced that at the moment anyhow this is hopeless. She says in effect: "I will connive if you will not take our son to your mistress." No attention is paid to the suggestion and a few weeks later she realises this is an impossible and wrong idea altogether. That the wife throughout this time was in a distraught and hysterical condition is clear from the letters themselves. The first letter in which the suggestion appears begins: "After a literally sleepless night." In her evidence she said she did not remember writing the memorandum. It was produced by the husband. She did not remember what she had done with it. "I must obviously have given it to my husband." "My grief and mental stress were so grave it had the still further effect of undermining my health, which had not been very good." On May 1 she had to go into hospital for an operation. "I began to pull myself together with prayer and thought." In cross-examination she said to the learned judge: "May I say again everything I wrote in that period was written in the most appalling distress, and that I would not stand by now." A doctor gave evidence and said, speaking of this time, that she was very nervous and "from the mental point of view she was in a very bad way . . . in a hysterical and tearful, highly nervous state . . . on one occasion she sobbed for a quarter of an hour without ceasing . . . she is not certifiably insane, of course . . . but I would say she was hardly responsible for her actions at all, at that time."

In the judgment of the court delivered by LORD MERRIMAN, P., in Churchman v. Churchman (1) ([1945] 2 All E.R. 190, 195) he says:

Much of the difficulty in dealing with the question of connivance arises from the fact that in the past judges have gone beyond the facts of the particular case in an attempt to lay down general principles of wider application. In our opinion it is of the utmost importance to bear in mind that the issue is whether on the facts of the particular case the husband was or was not guilty of the corrupt intention of promoting or encouraging either the initiation or the continuance of the wife's adultery . . .

I shall endeavour not to add to the difficulty referred to in the first sentence of this passage. The second sentence contains a concise definition of the essentials of connivance. Bearing this in mind and other statements of the law in cases cited to us and in other cases which I have considered, it might be sufficient to say I hold that the wife has satisfied me that she was not guilty of connivance. The facts which have led me to this conclusion are probably sufficiently apparent. Where a petitioner is in a distraught and hysterical condition as a result of the discovery of adultery I think he or she is entitled to have his or her conduct considered as a whole over a reasonable period of time. It would, therefore, in my opinion, be wrong to hold the wife guilty of connivance on the letters in March considered in isolation. She is entitled to be judged in the light of her initial reactions and the attitude she took up when she recovered from her operation. If it could be shown that, in spite of her condition, she had acted in a way which had, in fact, promoted adultery which would not otherwise have taken place, a question would arise which does not arise here. A case like the present where the wife on discovering the adultery does her utmost to stop it, where the conduct relied on is after she has realised that this is at the moment hopeless, and is against a background of hope that the husband will ultimately return—such a case is a long way from what I may call the primary conception of connivance. I am, however, not suggesting that as a matter of principle such facts might not be consistent with connivance. This is, I think, a good example of a case which turns on its own particular facts. I have not thought it necessary to set out the documents in full as they are to be found in the learned judge's judgment. Although the main argument on this part of the case is based on documents, the character and credibility of the wife is an important element and I would naturally have hesitated to differ from the learned judge who saw her examined and cross-examined. I agree with his conclusion and as will be seen for much the same reasons.

I have little which I wish to add to what BUCKNILL, L.J., has said on later events. At one meeting, although Miss Macintosh's name was not mentioned, the husband clearly assured the wife that he would give up Miss Macintosh. In the wife's words: "I said to him 'Which will you have' and he chose." It would be unfair, as he gave no evidence, to doubt the sincerity of his intention at that time and on the subsequent occasions when they lived as man and wife. The letter from the wife written on board the ship on the way to America clearly shows that she believed she had been successful. Miss Macintosh had told her in February that if the husband had sexual relations with the wife she would have nothing more to do with him. There is, I think, no foundation for the submission that when she went to America she believed that the association with Miss Macintosh would revive. I agree that there is nothing in the letters from America which raise a suspicion of connivance. I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

TUCKER, L.J.: I have had the advantage of reading the judgments which have just been delivered and I agree that this appeal fails for the reasons stated therein. The doctrine of connivance is based on the principle that the complaining spouse must come to the court with clean hands and that it would be unconscionable to give relief to one who had been willingly blind to or encouraged the adultery of his or her matrimonial partner. The conduct of the wife must, I think, be viewed as a whole and not by considering in isolation one or two letters in a large volume of correspondence. I agree with SOMERVELL, L.J., that the documents of March, 1940, if they stood alone, would clearly amount to connivance, but, viewed in their context, they merely reflect the mental reactions of the wife at one stage of her struggle to put an end to her husband's adulterous association and regain his affection. I venture to think that no reasonable person viewing the correspondence as a whole and accepting the learned judge's estimate of this wife could regard it as unconscionable that she should be granted the relief she claims. In coming to this conclusion I do not wish unduly to stress the state of the wife's health referred to in the medical evidence. She was naturally in great distress but the letters are not those of an hysterical woman. They display a high degree of clarity of thought and reasoning. Holding, as I do, that there has been no connivance, I desire to reserve the question whether connivance to adultery in 1940 would necessarily preclude the wife from relying on adultery with the same person in 1947.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

LEE v. K. CARTER, LTD. AND ANOTHER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Tucker, Bucknill and Somervell, L.J.J.), July 20, 21, 22, 1948.]

Lease—Assignment—Withholding of consent—Reasonableness—Prevention of creation of statutory tenancy.

Rent Restriction—Costs—Action in High Court—Claim arising out of Acts raised in defence—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interests (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (c. 17), s. 17 (2).

By a lease, dated Mar. 1, 1940, the landlord let to a limited liability company for 7 years premises which, by reason of their rateable value, were within the Rent Restrictions Acts. The tenants covenanted not to assign the lease without the previous consent in writing of the landlord, such consent not to be unreasonably withheld. Towards the end of the tenancy the tenants applied to the landlord for his consent to an assignment of the unexpired portion of the lease to B., one of their directors, who, in accordance with the terms of the lease, had resided on the premises from the commencement of the lease. The landlord refused his consent on the ground that he wished to prevent a statutory tenancy arising as a result of accepting B. as the assignee. The tenants thereupon purported to assign the remainder of the lease to B. The landlord issued a writ against the tenants for possession and B. was added as a defendant. On a summons before a master for judgment under R.S.C., Ord. 14, B. filed an affidavit that, as there had been a lawful assignment to her by reason of the landlord's unreasonable refusal to give consent, she was entitled to the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts. The landlord was aware before the issue of the writ that B. intended to raise this issue. The master made an order remitting the action to the county court, where judgment was given for immediate possession with costs on the High Court scale down to the date when the action was remitted.

HELD : (i) the refusal to give consent was connected with the person or personality of the proposed assignee and with her user of the premises, and directly affected the subject-matter of the contract, and consent was not unreasonably withheld.

Re Gibbs & Houlder Brothers & Co., Ltd.'s Lease, Houlder Brothers & Co., Ltd. v. Gibbs ([1925] Ch. 575), applied.

Re Swanson's Agreement, Hill v. Swanson ([1946] 2 All E.R. 628), distinguished.

(ii) by virtue of s. 17 (2) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, the landlord was not entitled to recover any costs in the High Court, and the county court judge's order should be varied by the substitution of an order that there be no costs prior to the date of remission.

APPEAL by the tenants from an order of His Honour JUDGE DALE, made at Bloomsbury County Court, and dated Jan. 28, 1948, granting possession to the landlord of premises held under a lease, the unexpired portion of which the tenants had purported to assign despite the refusal of the landlord to give his consent to the assignment. The Court of Appeal now affirm the learned judge's finding that consent was not unreasonably withheld. The facts appear in the judgment of TUCKER, L.J.

Charles Lawson for the tenants.

Heathcote-Williams and Plume for the landlord.

TUCKER, L.J. : This is an appeal from a judgment of His Honour JUDGE DALE whereby he gave judgment for the landlord for possession forthwith of No. 3, Cavendish Court, London, in an action brought against the tenants, K. Carter, Ltd., and Mrs. Kate Bowman, to whom the tenants had purported to assign the unexpired portion of a lease of a flat dated Mar. 1, 1940, for a term of seven years from Mar. 28, 1940, at the inclusive yearly rent of £275 per annum. The sole question is whether or not the tenants were entitled to assign the benefit of this lease to Mrs. Bowman without the consent of the landlord. In other words, was the landlord's consent unreasonably withheld?

The facts of this case are unusual and it is necessary to refer in some detail to the provisions in the lease. It was made between the landlord, as lessor, the tenants, as lessees, and Mrs. Kate Bowman, as the guarantor. The lease contained the usual provisions, including lessees' covenants to this effect:

2 (6) Not at any time during the said term to use the said flat or any part thereof or permit the same or any part thereof to be used for the exercise or carrying on of any art profession trade business charity occupation or calling whatsoever except that of a model dress designer and manufacturer nor as a receptacle for lunatic or invalid persons or otherwise than as a private residence and for the business of a model dress designer and manufacturer . . . (7) Not without the lessor's previous consent in writing to assign underlet or part with the possession of the said flat or any part thereof (such consent to an assignment or underletting of the whole of the said flat not to be unreasonably withheld) provided always that the lessor may as a condition of such consent to an assignment require the proposed assignee to enter into direct covenants with the lessor to perform and observe all the covenants on the lessee's part herein contained and non-compliance with such condition shall be deemed to be a reasonable ground for refusing such consent notwithstanding the respectability and financial responsibility of the proposed assignee provided however that the use of the flat as a residence by Mrs. Kate Bowman and her family or any director of the lessee shall not be deemed a breach of this covenant.

Clause 2 (18) of the lease is a covenant at the expiration of the term to deliver up to the lessor the said flat in good and substantial repair and condition, and cl. 4 contains a provision for forfeiture in the event of any non-observance or breach of any condition contained in the lease.

Throughout all the times material to this action the tenants remained in possession and occupation of the premises and Mrs. Kate Bowman resided in the flat, as she was entitled to do by the express provisions of the lease. She was also the guarantor for the tenants for the due performance by them of their covenants under the lease. It is clear from the provisions of the lease that it was expressly designed to ensure for the landlord that, at the expiration of the lease, he should have as tenant, if he was so minded, a limited liability company which would not be able to claim the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts in answer to any proceedings he might desire to take to obtain possession of the premises. It is conceded that by reason of their rateable value these premises are within the Rent Restrictions Acts. On Mar. 8, 1946, when the end of the lease was in sight, the tenants' solicitors wrote as follows to the landlord:

Our clients, K. Carter, Ltd., are proposing to assign their lease of the above flat to Mrs. Kate Bowman who is, as you know, the principal shareholder and a director of the company and is already a guarantor of the company's obligations under the lease. Your licence is, of course, necessary to the assignment, and we shall be glad to know that it will be forthcoming.

The landlord refused to give his consent and the subject was dropped until the next year, when, on Jan. 17, 1947, the tenants' solicitors again wrote a letter in which they gave the names of several people as references for Mrs. Bowman, said that the tenants desired to assign the lease to her, and added:

We understand that application for this assignment was made to you in March, 1946, and that you then refused to give your consent. As Mrs. Bowman's references are of the highest character, we must point out that under the terms of the lease your consent cannot be unreasonably withheld, and we shall be glad if, in view of our letter, you will reconsider the matter and give your licence for this assignment.

The reply, on Jan. 20, was:

We have already written to your clients, Messrs. K. Carter, Ltd., reminding them that their lease of the above premises expires at Lady Day next, and requesting them to make the necessary arrangements to give up possession of the premises as at that date. In view of this, our client is not prepared to give his consent to the assignment of the lease to Mrs. Kate Bowman, and as you are now acting for Messrs. K. Carter, Ltd., perhaps you will kindly let us know that your clients are making the necessary arrangements to vacate the premises on the expiration of the lease.

Consent was not forthcoming, and, accordingly, on Jan. 27, 1947, the tenants purported to assign the lease to Mrs. Bowman, sent the assignment to the landlord, together with a guinea registration fee, which the landlord returned.

Although in the correspondence the landlord had not clearly indicated the precise reason for his refusal other than that the lease was coming to an end in the near future and he had written indicating his desire to have possession of the premises at the end of the lease, it was agreed at the hearing before the county court judge by counsel on both sides that the reason for the landlord's refusal was that he wished to prevent a statutory tenancy arising as a result of accepting Mrs. Bowman as the assignee. The position would then have been that at the expiration of the lease in March, 1947, he would be faced with a tenant in actual occupation of the premises, which were partly used as a dwelling-house, and, provided she continued to comply with the conditions of the tenancy, he would not be able to evict her except for one or other of the special reasons contained in the Rent Restrictions Acts, whereas, if K. Carter, Ltd., had remained his tenants, nothing could have prevented him getting possession of his own property at the end of the lease.

The learned judge, having had all the relevant authorities cited to him, came to the conclusion that the landlord was not unreasonable in withholding his consent on that ground and that, accordingly, the purported assignment was unlawful and the landlord was entitled to possession. In the reasons for judgment he said :

I held that K. Carter, Ltd., had no right to assign to Mrs. Bowman and the landlord was within his legal rights in refusing to consent to such assignment. The premises let to K. Carter, Ltd., were not controlled by the Rent Acts in view of their being a limited company, whereas Mrs. Bowman was a person who, if she became tenant, would be protected by the Acts and the whole nature of the tenancy would be changed. I consider the facts of the case of Swanson (1) were not comparable with the facts of the present case in view of the difference in the legal entities of the assignor and assignee in the present case. I held that the objection by the landlord to the assignee in the present case was reasonable within the principles of Houlder Brothers v. Gibbs (2) and Tredegar v. Harwood (3).

It must be remembered at the outset, as was stated by WARRINGTON, L.J., in Houlder Brothers & Co., Ltd. v. Gibbs (2) ([1925] Ch. 575, 584) :

The question whether a particular act is reasonable or unreasonable is obviously one that cannot be determined on abstract considerations. An act must be regarded as reasonable or unreasonable in reference to the circumstances under which it is committed . . .

I quote that observation because I think it requires to be borne in mind, in approaching this case and in approaching all other cases where the question is whether or not the withholding of consent was in the particular circumstances reasonable or unreasonable, that it must always depend on the facts of the particular case, and the facts of this case that I desire to emphasise are these. At the time of the assignment, and at the time of the previous application for consent in March, 1946, Mrs. Bowman was residing in and occupying and having the full benefit of this flat. The tenants were the lessees under the lease. Those conditions would have continued in any event for three months more until March, 1947, so that, if an assignment took place in January, no practical benefit from that date until Mar. 25, 1947, would result to Mrs. Bowman. In any event, she would have been entitled to remain in the flat and the tenants would have been lessees of the premises, but the result of the assignment would have been to alter the legal relationship between Mrs. Bowman and the landlord, to put her in the position of a tenant, with the result that at the end of the lease in March, 1947, the landlord would have been unable to enforce the provisions of para. (18) of cl. (2) in the lease containing the tenant's covenant to give up possession at the termination of the lease. Furthermore, at the termination of the lease, he would have found himself faced with a statutory tenant who could only have been evicted on the special grounds contained in the Rent Restrictions Acts. It is obvious that that was the whole reason why the landlord refused to give his consent.

It is said that the learned county court judge's decision was erroneous because he had not applied the principles laid down by TOMLIN, J., in Houlder Brothers & Co., Ltd. v. Gibbs (2) the headnote of which is as follows ([1925] Ch. 198) :

In a lease for years the lessees covenanted not to assign the premises, or any part thereof, without the consent in writing of the lessor, such consent not to be withheld unreasonably in the case of a respectable and responsible person or corporation. The lessees agreed to assign the premises, subject to the consent of the lessor, to R., Ltd., who were in possession of adjoining premises on a yearly tenancy from the same lessor. The lessor refused to give his consent to the assignment on the ground that he would lose good tenants of the adjoining premises, and would have great difficulty in re-letting them: Held, that the licence had been unreasonably withheld, and that the lessees were free to assign. Grounds of objection unconnected with the person of the assignee or the user or occupation of the premises are not reasonable. Dicta tending to the contrary not followed.

TOMLIN, J., reviewed all the relevant authorities down to that time and he summed them up as follows (ibid., 209):

The question is what I am to make of all that. I come to the conclusion that the principle as stated—and I hope I am not disrespectful in putting it this way—by A. L. SMITH, L.J., in Bates v. Donaldson (4) is accurately stated, and when he said what he did say, he meant what he said, and that it is by reference to the personality of the lessee or the nature of the user or occupation of the premises, that the court has to judge of the reasonableness of the lessor's refusal. It is quite true that the injury threatened or apprehended to the lessor may be in respect of something which has nothing to do with the lease of the demised premises; it may be in relation to other property of which he is the owner, but the danger must come from the nature of the user or occupation or from the personality of the assignee. In the present case what is the real reason of the refusal? The real reason is not one which had anything to do with the personality of the lessee, or with the user or occupation of the premises; the real reason is that the lessor wants to prevent the assignee from giving up other premises of which he is also lessor; in other words, his real purpose in refusing an assignment is not in relation to the demised premises at all, but in relation to other property, and to bring pressure to bear on the assignee not to give up a tenancy of different premises belonging to him.

Once again it is necessary, I think, to emphasise that that language must be considered in the light of the facts of the particular case with which the learned judge was dealing. I do not think for one moment that TOMLIN, J., was purporting to lay down some principle of universal application which would cover every conceivable case, and it is clear that he had not in his mind any such situation as that which has arisen in this case, viz., the results which might follow at the end of a lease from the acceptance of a particular assignee for the termination of that lease.

That case came before the Court of Appeal, who upheld the decision of TOMLIN, J., and approved his reasoning; but all the members of the court, the MASTER OF THE ROLLS and the two Lords Justices, put the matter in their own words in the course of their judgment and used expressions to which I think it is necessary to refer having regard to the emphasis that counsel for the tenants has paid in the presentation of his case on the exact words used by TOMLIN, J. After dealing with Bates v. Donaldson (4) POLLOCK, M.R., said this ([1925] Ch. 575, 583):

For my part, I agree with A. L. SMITH, L.J., and I think that one must look at these words in their relation to the premises, and to the contract made in reference to the premises between the lessor and lessee; in other words, one must have regard to the relation of the lessor and lessee inter se, or, perhaps one may add, to the due and proper management of the property, as in Governors of Bridewell Hospital v. Fawcner (5). The latter case is an illustration of a withholding of consent on broad grounds bearing upon the estate of the lessor, or it may be on grounds which are important between the lessor and other lessees of that property, or that estate, of which the lessee had cognizance. But I do not think the words of the covenant can be so interpreted as to entitle the lessor to exercise the right of refusal when his reason given is one which is independent of the relation between the lessor and lessee, and is on grounds which are entirely personal to the lessor, and wholly extraneous to the lessee.

WARRINGTON, L.J., after using the language to which I have already referred, went on in these words (ibid., 585):

Now, what is to be inferred from what may be treated as having been in the contemplation of the parties when the contract was made? I think it must be, as I have said, that it was intended to protect the lessor as against a lessee, who, although respectable and responsible, might well be reasonably objectionable in other ways, and, secondly, from the point of view of the property, to prevent the lessor from having to accept a lessee whose user of the property might again be reasonably objectionable.

SARGANT, L.J., said this (ibid., 587) :

In the present case Mr. Stamp has shown in his able argument that it is not necessary for the success of the respondent that the operation of the covenant should be limited even to the extent laid down by A. L. SMITH, L.J. ; because Mr. Stamp points out that not only is the reason given here something that is not in relation to the use or occupation of the premises, or to the personality of the tenant, but that the reason has nothing whatever to do with the subject-matter of the demise. I was very much impressed by his argument that in a case of this kind the reason must be something affecting the subject-matter of the contract which forms the relationship between the landlord and the tenant, and that it must not be something wholly extraneous and completely dissociated from the subject-matter of the contract.

In the concluding words of his judgment he said (ibid., 588) :

In the present case the reason for refusing has nothing whatever to do with the relationship of landlord and tenant in regard to the subject-matter of the demise. The sole reason is that if the property is allowed to be assigned to the new tenants, the new tenants, in respect of a tenancy of a completely different property which they hold from the lessor, will probably desire to terminate their tenancy of that other property.

I have quoted those observations at some length to show that all four of the judges who had to deal with that case expressed their views in somewhat differing language. For myself, I think that the present case comes within the language used both by TOMLIN, J., and by POLLOCK, M.R., and WARRINGTON and SARGANT, L.JJ., that the refusal to give consent must be connected with the person or personality of the proposed assignee and must directly affect the subject-matter of the contract. It is true that the consequences would not show themselves until the expiration of three months from the date of the assignment, and counsel for the tenants is right when he says that the contractual relationship would be the same had the landlord consented to the assignment, but none the less it was a contractual relationship pregnant with future possibilities, or more than possibilities, which would not have resulted from the previous existing contractual relationship between the landlord and the tenants.

In Tredegar v. Harwood (3) some doubt was expressed by LORD DUNEDIN and LORD PHILLIMORE with regard to the precise language that had been used by TOMLIN, J. I need not refer to what was said on the subject because Houlder Brothers v. Gibbs (2) still remains a binding authority on this court, and I have already indicated that I think this case comes within the reasoning of the Court of Appeal as well as of TOMLIN, J.

There is one other case to which I must refer and that is the recent decision, much relied on by counsel for the tenants, of EVERSLED, J., in Re Swanson's Agreement (1). In that case questions were raised by an originating summons which were as follows :

Whether according to the true construction of the tenancy agreement and in the events which had happened the refusal of the landlord to grant a licence to the tenant to assign the premises was unreasonable ; (ii) whether, notwithstanding such refusal, the tenant was at liberty to assign the premises without any such licence.

In the course of the examination of the facts of that case EVERSLED, J., eventually came to the conclusion that at the time of the assignment in question the contractual tenancy was not subsisting and, therefore, the question whether consent to the assignment could or could not be reasonably withheld did not arise and everything EVERSLED, J., said in his judgment on that part of the case was really obiter. None the less he dealt with the question at some length and it is necessary to observe that in that case, assuming the contractual tenancy to have been subsisting, the proposed assignor was a person who, if he had remained the tenant, would have become a statutory tenant at the termination of the agreement ; and the proposed assignee was in a similar position. But the tenant, the assignor, was minded to go out and to assign to the tenant who would come in. The landlord desired to obtain possession of the premises when his tenant went out and preferred to have possession rather than a statutory tenant, which would result from the assignment. That was a case where the landlord's real objection to the assignment, if there had been a contractual tenancy subsisting, was that he would have been thereby deprived of his opportunity of getting possession of the premises before the expiration of the lease, and therefore the case would have been almost identical with Bates v. Donaldson (4), where A. L. SMITH, L.J., held that that was not a good reason for a landlord to refuse consent to the assignment. For those reasons I do not think the observations of EVERSLED, J., on this point in Re Swanson's Agreement (1) are conclusive in any way of the matter which comes before us, because I think that on the facts of Swanson's case (1), assuming a subsisting agreement, the reasons for the landlord's refusal were unreasonable having regard to the decision of Bates v. Donaldson (4). If the observations of EVERSLED, J., go beyond that and are inconsistent with the view I take of the present case, then I must respectfully differ from him; but for the reasons I have indicated I think that Swanson's case (1) was an altogether different one from the present. For those reasons, I think that this appeal fails and that the decision of the county court judge on the particular facts of this case was correct.

BUCKNILL, L.J. : I agree that the appeal should be dismissed, for the reasons given by my Lord, and I have nothing to add to them.

SOMERVELL, L.J. : I agree. To succeed in this appeal counsel for the tenants must show that the learned judge misdirected himself in what was primarily clearly a question of fact. I think he sought to do that by submitting that the learned county court judge had decided that the landlord was reasonable in refusing his consent by taking into account matters which, as a matter of law, he was not entitled to take into account. He submitted, as I understood him, that the question as to what would happen when the tenancy came to an end was something which was wholly irrelevant and which, as a matter of law, could not be relied on by the landlord in submitting that he was reasonable in what he did. All I want to do is to make it quite clear that I am not suggesting that there is any principle under which, in all cases and in all circumstances, a lease which is originally a lease to a company may not be assigned by that company to an individual, or perhaps, to put it more accurately, that the landlord would always be held to be reasonable if he refused his consent to such an assignment. I would like to add to the citations which TUCKER, L.J., has made from Houlder Brothers & Co., Ltd. v. Gibbs (2) one sentence only from the end of the judgment of POLLOCK, M.R., in which he said ([1925] 1 Ch. 575, 594): "... I think it is impossible to give an exact definition which will fit all cases . . ." That, I think, is an observation which is particularly applicable to the sort of subject-matter with which courts may be concerned in deciding issues under covenants of this kind in a lease; and, like my brother, I think it is a most important circumstance and a relevant circumstance in this case that the assignment which the landlord was asked to assent to lacked the normal circumstance in which a request for an assent to an assignment is put forward. The normal circumstance in which a lessee asks for consent to an assignment is because he no longer desires the use of the premises and he has found someone who is anxious to enter and occupy them. As has been pointed out in the present case, the circumstances here were exceptional and wholly different, because the proposed assignee, as she stated in her affidavit, had from Mar. 25, 1940, in accordance with the provision in that behalf contained in the lease, occupied the flat and used it as a private residence for herself and her family. I agree with and I do not wish to add anything to what my brother has said with regard to the law, and, in my opinion, the circumstances which clearly actuated the landlord's mind were circumstances which the learned county court judge was entitled to consider in deciding whether or not the landlord acted reasonably. The matter being one of fact and the learned county court judge having, as it seems to me, applied correct principles of law, the appeal must fail.

[Counsel addressed the court on the question of costs and the following judgments were delivered on that question.]

TUCKER, L.J. : A further question has now arisen in this case with regard to the costs. The action was commenced by the landlord by a writ issued in the High Court against the tenants on Oct. 20, 1947, and Mrs. Bowman was added as defendant. The whole case for the landlord was that the assignment to Mrs. Bowinan was unlawful, and, if that was correct, then Mrs. Bowman

A and the tenants were, at the time of the issue of the writ, trespassers. If, on the other hand, the assignment was lawful, Mrs. Bowman would have been protected by the Rent Restrictions Acts. The case came before the master under a summons for judgment under R.S.C., Ord. 14, and Mrs. Bowman put in an affidavit setting up that she was entitled to obtain possession under the provisions of the Rent Restrictions Acts and claiming that there had been a lawful assignment to her by reason of the unreasonable refusal of the landlord to give his consent. On the hearing of that summons the master, without any opposition from either side, made an order remitting the action to the county court. The learned judge gave judgment for possession, and gave the landlord costs on the High Court scale down to the date when the action was remitted.

B It is argued by counsel for the tenants that the county court judge had no jurisdiction to make that order with regard to High Court costs. He relies on s. 17 (2) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, which is in these words :

C A county court shall have jurisdiction to deal with any claim or other proceedings arising out of this Act or any of the provisions thereof, notwithstanding that by reason of the amount of claim or otherwise the case would not but for this provision be within the jurisdiction of a county court, and, if a person takes proceedings under this Act in the High Court which he could have taken in the county court, he shall not be entitled to recover any costs.

The County Courts Act, 1934, s. 48, is as follows :

A county court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine any action for the recovery of land where neither the value of the land in question nor the rent payable in respect thereof exceeds the sum of one hundred pounds by the year.

D The rent in the present case was £275 per annum, and, accordingly, the county court would have had no jurisdiction under s. 48 of the County Courts Act, 1934. Counsel for the landlord, on being asked where the county court derived the jurisdiction to give the judgment which he has successfully upheld, answered that the jurisdiction was to be found in s. 17 (2) of the Rent Restrictions Act, 1920. I think he must fail with regard to the costs in the High Court because that same sub-section which gives the county court a jurisdiction to entertain proceedings which it would not otherwise have had deprives a party who takes such proceedings in the High Court of his right to recover any costs, the assumption being that they could have been commenced in the county court.

E Counsel argues that the county court got its jurisdiction under the first two lines of that sub-section, but that the last three lines do not apply to this case. He says : " When my client started his proceedings the county court had no jurisdiction by reason of the amount of rent of these premises, but as soon as I got before the master and Mrs. Bowman put in this affidavit, it became a claim arising under the Rent Restrictions Acts, the claim being a claim by Mrs. Bowman to be entitled to the protection of the Acts. Accordingly, the master thereupon had jurisdiction to remit the action and the county court had jurisdiction to entertain it." With regard to the concluding words he says : " Although the county court derived jurisdiction as soon as Mrs. Bowman had produced an affidavit, it was not an action which could have been commenced in the county court originally."

G I am unable to accept that argument. I do not think jurisdiction can depend on the precise stage at which a defendant raises his defence. It was known at all times before the issue of the writ what the issue was going to be and what the issue was which was being raised by Mrs. Bowman in these proceedings. That appears from the statement of claim on the writ and by previous correspondence between the parties, so it was no surprise to the landlord when he found before the master that this issue had been raised by Mrs. Bowman. Accordingly, I think if counsel for the landlord is right in saying that the county court did get jurisdiction under s. 17 (2) of the Act of 1920, he cannot now be heard to say that the consequential provisions of that section with regard to costs do not apply.

H For those reasons I think the submission with regard to costs made by counsel for the tenants is correct. I do not think it is necessary to give a final decision whether or not the county court would originally have had jurisdiction under

s. 17 (2). My decision rests on the fact that the landlord, having chosen to uphold a judgment on the ground that it can only be held by virtue of the jurisdiction conferred by s. 17 (2), cannot now be heard to say that that subsection does not apply with regard to the costs of the proceedings incurred in the High Court. I do not think it necessary to express any opinion with regard to the difficult questions which have been discussed or to refer to authorities such as Russoff v. Lipovitch (6), Jaslowitz v. Burstein (7) and Gunter v. Davis (8), which raise a question as to proceedings for the recovery of premises brought against persons who are trespassers, cases in which the landlord does not seek to rely on any of the provisions of the Rent Restrictions Acts in order to enable him to get possession. It is not necessary to decide the extent to which those authorities apply to the facts of this particular case, or whether they are applicable. I think this case depends on the particular course which was taken prior to the order to remit.

BUCKNILL, L.J. : I agree, and will only add one word on the doubt which was raised by ATKIN, L.J., in Russoff v. Lipovitch (6), where he says ([1925] 1 K.B. 628, 640) :

I desire to add that I propose to reserve consideration of the question that arose in Gunter v. Davis (8), whether proceedings against a mere trespasser, who has never filled the position of tenant or sub-tenant, for the recovery of possession of a house to which the Act applies are proceedings arising out of the Act.

It seems to me in this case it cannot possibly be said that Mrs. Bowman was a trespasser. Not only did the landlord agree that the use of the flat as a residence by her and her family was not to be deemed a breach of the covenant not to assign without the lessor's previous consent in writing, but she did in fact get an assignment from the tenants which was valid in every respect except that the consent in writing had not been previously obtained. Therefore I do not think this case falls within the kind of case in respect of which ATKIN, L.J., expressed that doubt.

SOMERVELL, L.J. : I agree.

TUCKER, L.J. : The order of the learned judge will be varied by striking out that part of his order in which he gave costs on the High Court scale down to the date of remission. There will be substituted for that an order that there be no costs prior to the date of remission. With regard to this appeal the successful landlord will have his costs less the sum of five guineas.

Appeal dismissed on these terms.

AMERICAN FLANGE AND MANUFACTURING CO., INCORPORATED v. VAN LEER.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Sellers, J.), June 23, 24, 25, 29, 30, July 1, 30, 1948.]

Patent—Use by Crown—Patent for whole article, not for component part—Application to unpatented article of Patents and Designs Act, 1907 (c. 29), s. 29 (1) (1A) (as amended to 1946) and Defence (Patents, Trade Marks, etc.) Regulations, 1941 (S.R. & O., 1941, No. 1780), reg. 3 (5).

By the Patents and Designs Act, 1907, s. 29 (1) (as amended by the Patents and Designs Act, 1919, s. 8) : "A patent shall have to all intents the like effect as against His Majesty the King as it has against a subject : Provided that any Government department may, by themselves or by such of their agents, contractors, or others as may be authorised in writing by them at any time after the application, make, use or exercise the invention for the services of the Crown on such terms as may, either before or after the use thereof, be agreed on, with the approval of the Treasury, between the Department and the patentee, or, in default of agreement, as may be settled in the manner hereinafter provided. And the terms of any agreement or licence concluded between the inventor or patentee and any person other than a Government department, shall be inoperative so far as concerns the making, use or exercise of the invention for the service of the Crown." By s. 29 (1A) (as amended by the Patents and Designs Act, 1942, s. 2 (1)), the power of a Government department under s. 29 (1) was extended to include "power during any war period to make, use, exercise or vend an invention, upon such terms as are mentioned in the said sub-s. (1), for any purpose which appears to the department necessary or expedient for the efficient prosecution of any war in which His Majesty may be engaged or for the maintenance of supplies and services essential to the life of the community; and the terms of any such agreement or licence as is mentioned in the said sub-s. (1) shall be inoperative so far as concerns the making, use, exercise or vending of an invention under this sub-section as they are inoperative so far as concerns the making, use or exercise of an invention under that sub-section." By the Defence (Patents, Trade Marks, etc.) Regulations, 1941, reg. 3 (5): "In connection with the making, use, exercise or vending of any invention . . . on behalf of, or for the services of, the Crown (whether by virtue of the Patents and Designs Act, 1907, or otherwise) . . . the Minister of Supply . . . may authorise the use of any drawing, model, plan or other document or information in such manner as appears to him or them to be expedient in the interests of the defence of the realm or the efficient prosecution of the war, notwithstanding anything to the contrary contained in any licence or agreement; and any licence or agreement, if and so far as it confers on any person, otherwise than for the benefit of the Crown, a right to receive any payment in respect of the use of any document or information in pursuance of such an authorisation, shall be inoperative."

A manufacturer, who was licensed, on payment of royalties to the licensor, to manufacture, sell and use articles known as "sputs" and "plugs," supplied large numbers of each to the Minister of Supply under a contract which authorised him, under the provisions of s. 29 of the Act of 1907 (as amended) and reg. 3 (5) of the regulations of 1941, "for the purpose of performing the contract (but not otherwise) to make, use, exercise or vend such inventions and designs as may be required for that purpose and in connection with the making, use, exercise or vending of any inventions or application of any design as aforesaid to use any drawing, model, plan or other document or information as may be required for that purpose." The contract further provided: "The authority hereby conferred has the effect of relieving the contractor from liability, whether under licence agreements . . . or otherwise, to make any payments, whether by way of royalties and licence fees or otherwise in respect of the contractor's making use, exercise or vending of any invention or design . . . for the purpose of performing the contract." The "sputs" and "plugs" formed part of a closure device for the filling of a metallic container for which there was a British patent. In an action by the licensor for the recovery of royalties in respect of the sputs and plugs so supplied:—

HELD: (i) there was no patent covering either the sput or the plug separately as independent units, since the patent relied on by the defendant covered a whole assembly, of which the sput and plug were only component parts, and there had not been any "constructive" user of a patented invention, since a patent for a combination was not a patent covering the component parts of the combination.

Clark v. Adie (1877) (2 App. Cas. 315) and Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co., Ltd. v. David Moseley & Sons, Ltd. ([1904] 1 Ch. 612), applied.

(ii) the Patents and Designs Act, 1907, s. 29 (1) and (1A), as amended, applied only to a patented invention and an alleged invention which was the subject of an application for a patent.

(iii) the Defence (Patents, Trade Marks, etc.) Regulations, 1941, reg. 3 (5) applied to any invention whether patented or not, and, as the authority given in the contract by the Minister of Supply was an express authority under reg. 3 (5), the defendant was relieved thereby of his obligation to pay the royalties.

ACTION to recover royalties alleged to be due to the plaintiffs by the defendant in respect of articles made and sold to the Minister of Supply in 1944 and 1945. The defendant contended that he was relieved from his obligation to pay the royalties by the Patents and Designs Act, 1907, s. 29 (1) and (1A) (as amended by the Patents and Designs Act, 1919, s. 8, and the Patents and Designs Act, 1942, s. 2) and the Defence (Patents, Trade Marks, etc.) Regulations, 1941, reg. 3 (5). SELLERS, J., held that the Act of 1907 (as amended) applied only to patented inventions, that the inventions in question were not covered by any British patent, and the Act, therefore, did not apply, but that the regulations of 1941 applied to any inventions, whether patented or not, and, therefore, the defendant was relieved of his obligation to pay the royalties. The facts appear in the judgment. D

Sir Valentine Holmes, K.C., and J. P. Graham for the plaintiffs.

Lloyd-Jacob, K.C., and J. P. Ashworth for the defendant.

P. J. Stuart Bevan (as amicus curiae) for the Minister of Supply. E

July 30. SELLERS, J., read the following judgment. The plaintiffs Cur. adv. vult. are an American company carrying on business in Chicago. The defendant is a Dutchman who carries on business in Holland, England and elsewhere. The action is brought to recover a sum of £59,340 3s. (being the agreed sterling equivalent of 239,436 dollars and a few cents) which is claimed as being due under two written agreements between the plaintiffs and the defendant, relating respectively to articles called sputs and plugs, sometimes referred to alternatively as flanges and bungs. By the agreements the plaintiffs granted to the defendant licences to manufacture, sell and use in Great Britain and elsewhere closure devices of which a sput and a plug formed part and in respect of such sput and each plug manufactured, used and/or sold it was provided that the defendant should pay to the plaintiffs one half cent of United States of America currency during the period of the agreements. The "sput" agreement is to be found in an agreement dated May 1, 1928, together with a letter of the same date and a further notification thereof dated Jan. 1, 1932. The "plug" agreement is dated Jan. 1, 1932. The defendant has paid the royalties due under the agreement in respect of the sputs and plugs which he sold except those which he made and sold to the Ministry of Supply in 1944 and 1945; i.e., the defendant has paid royalties in respect of the sales to private customers, but in respect of sales to the Ministry of Supply he has not paid and asserts that he is relieved from the obligation to pay the amount claimed by reason of s. 29 of the Patents and Designs Act, 1907 as amended by the Patents and Designs Act, 1919, F

s. 8, and the Patents and Designs Act, 1942, s. 2, and/or by the Defence (Patents, Trade Marks, etc.) Regulations, 1941 (S.R. & O., 1941, No. 1780). The ultimate question for decision, therefore, is whether or not the statutory provisions do in the circumstances of this case relieve the defendant of what would otherwise be his clear and admitted obligation under the agreement.

A The "sput" agreement recites that the plaintiffs have been engaged for some years past and are still engaged in the manufacture of sputs (meaning plug receiving pushings for containers) and have highly developed such sputs, practically and commercially, and have patent protection thereon in Great Britain and elsewhere. It further recites that the defendant is desirous of exploiting the manufacture, use and sale of the said sputs (which he may purchase from the plaintiffs) in European countries and elsewhere, as specified, and the plaintiffs are willing for him to do so and to grant to him a licence under such patents and applications and all other patents and applications owned or controlled by the plaintiffs for sputs, granted or filed, or to be granted or filed, in any and all European countries and Great Britain during the life of the agreement. It was agreed in arts. I and II :

C I (a) The term "sputs" as herein used, shall mean and embrace not only sputs disclosed in American's patents but also any and all other sputs, now or hereafter during the life of this agreement, designed, exploited, manufactured, sold or controlled by either party hereto, whether the same are patented anywhere or not. (b) The term "said patents," as used herein, shall mean and include (inclusively of the patents and application above enumerated) any and all European and British patents and application covering "sputs," whether original, divisional, renewal, reissue or of extension, and whether heretofore or hereafter applied for or granted. II. American hereby grants unto Van Leer a licence to manufacture "sputs" and to sell and use "sputs" so manufactured by him, upon and subject to the following terms, conditions and limitations.

D Then there follow provisions for an exclusive licence to the defendant to manufacture, use and sell sputs in Great Britain and specified countries (Van Leer territory) for two years, with provision for extension in certain circumstances, which, if operative, may become non-exclusive if a minimum royalty is not maintained, and for a non-exclusive licence in other parts of the world except certain defined territory. Article IV is :

E Van Leer shall have the right and power to manufacture "sputs" and use and sell the "sputs" manufactured by him in said "Van Leer territory" and said "competitive territory," under such trading names as he may desire, but Van Leer shall pay royalties as hereinafter provided on any and all "sputs" manufactured, used and/or sold by him, whether trading under his own name and/or under or through other names in said "Van Leer territory" and "competitive territory," it being understood and agreed that Van Leer shall be personally responsible for any and all royalties accruing under this agreement.

F Article V makes provision for the payment of a royalty of one half cent United States currency for each sput manufactured, used and/or sold during the life of the contract. Article VIII is :

G Each party hereto grants to the other party hereto and the representatives of the other party, the right to inspect the manufacturing methods of the first party and to furnish the other party with blue prints and all drawings of dies and machinery employed in the usual course of manufacture of "sputs"; it also being understood that each party hereto shall have the right to embody in its "sputs" any and all improvements now or hereafter, during the life of this agreement, made or acquired by the other party hereto.

Article XII provides that the contract shall run for the life of the said patents and each of them unless otherwise sooner terminated.

H The "plug" agreement adapts the "sput" agreement and incorporates and embodies its terms and conditions, substituting "plugs" for "sputs" with certain exceptions, including the following :

I (b). For the first "Whereas" clause of said "sput licence" the following is substituted : "Whereas, American has designed and/or invented various plugs for containers, has highly developed the same, and has successfully placed certain of the same on the market, and has or is about to file patent applications in several European and other countries covering said plugs, either alone and/or in combination with flanges and/or in combination with flanges and cap seals; and . . ." (c). For art. I (a) of said "sput licence," as amended, the following is substituted : "(a) The term 'plugs' as herein used, shall mean and embrace plugs like or similar to those heretofore or hereafter designed and/or invented by American and shall be inclusive of, but without limitation to, plugs known as 'Tri-Sure' and plugs similar thereto, whether the same are now or hereafter patented anywhere or not; it being also understood that the term 'plugs' includes plugs which are or may be covered (either alone and/or in combination with flanges and/or seals) by applications and/or patents now or hereafter owned or controlled by American."

Under these agreements the defendant had for many years been manufacturing and selling sputs and plugs in association with various companies controlled by him. A brief description of these articles is, I think, necessary. Both the parties are interested in the manufacture and sale of metal containers or drums for holding liquid. It is necessary or desirable to have an opening in the containers through which the contents can be emptied. That opening has to be closed so as to be liquid-tight until it is desired to open the container. In non-technical language, and in what I intend to be merely descriptive language, the sputs or plugs form part of the following device for a liquid-tight closure of the opening. The opening is made in some part of the container—the metal has been referred to as the drum stock—by cutting out a piece of the metal and passing the metal round the opening with a flange and making an octagonal indent to receive a sput. The sput has an octagonal outside surface and threaded interior and a projecting flange. The flange is designed to be curled over the flange of the container itself, thereby strengthening the flange of the opening. The sput has a gasket or washer on it but not attached to it. The plug is a threaded member with a small projecting flange at the top, with projections inside for enabling it to be screwed up or unscrewed and with a groove just under the top in which there is a gasket. The plug is so threaded that it fits into the sput. These parts were all exhibited and formed the component parts of the device as far as this case is concerned, but there is, in addition, a cap seal with a cork gasket. This seal is intended to be placed over the plug when screwed into the sput. The first process involved in this device is the cutting of the hole and the making of the flange and indentions on the drum stock. The sput is separately made of sheet metal and zinc plated and pressed by a machine into position in the recess, and its flanged edge turned over making a bead over the flange of the drum stock. It is then ready to receive the plug which is screwed in.

Between July, 1943, and March, 1945, 20 contracts were concluded between the defendant and the Ministry of Supply and under those contracts over 15,000,000 sputs and 19,000,000 plugs were made and sold to the Ministry of Supply, and the claim in this action is for the royalties on those sputs and plugs. The contracts were all made in a similar way and I shall refer to the first in date by way of illustration, and as typical. On July 27, 1943, the Ministry gave the defendant an instruction to proceed (commonly called an "I.T.P."). Part I of it is as follows:

Gentlemen, I am directed by the Minister of Supply to instruct you to proceed with the manufacture and supply of the stores detailed in the schedule below, on the terms and conditions of part II hereof and tender form attached. One copy of the inclosed form of tender must be returned duly completed and signed. Your quotation should be returned within 14 days from the date of this letter. The present instruction to proceed should not be regarded as an acceptance of any estimate or suggested price which may have been given orally or in writing in discussions or correspondence preceding this letter.

There is then set out the schedule specifying the commodity and the quantity, and a detailed specification, and provision is made for inspection and so forth. Then under the heading of "Price and Delivery" it says:

Delivery is required to commence at the earliest possible date, and I am to request you to state on your tender the date upon which deliveries can commence, the rate per week at which you can guarantee to maintain supplies thereafter, the information required in connection with the variation of prices (materials) clause and your lowest net quotation (exclusive of packages) for delivery of the stores "ex-works" (to include loading into road vehicles or loading into rail vehicles at a siding in your works) . . . Formal contract. Subject to agreement as to prices, a formal acceptance which will bear the reference number—(which should be quoted in full in all correspondence in connection with this order) will be forwarded to you as early as possible.

Part II is headed "Contract Conditions" and states :

The contract will be governed by the terms and conditions embodied in the Department's Contracts Form "A" and Standard Contract Conditions (January, 1942, ed.), Numbers . . .

Then there are set out various numbers described as "SC." standing for "Standard Conditions," and the one which is relevant here is "SC. 43. Patent Rights, etc."

A The next document which plays its part in building up this contract is a tender dated Aug. 31, 1943, addressed to the Ministry and making a quotation, as is requested in the instructions to proceed. In the body of that tender there is to be found this :

B The price quoted shall be exclusive of purchase tax in respect of any sale resulting from this order. If any claim is made for purchase tax in respect of any sale, the Department will indemnify the contractor against such tax. The undersigned hereby offers to provide and deliver the articles specified above at the prices and upon the terms set forth in parts I and II and Contracts Form "A" and in any specification mentioned in the schedule. It is further agreed that any printed conditions of contract or general reservations which may be printed on any correspondence or documents received from the contractor in connection with this contract shall not be applicable to this contract.

C The next document in this particular contract is dated Jan. 12, 1944. An extract from the letter is set out in the correspondence :

We inclose herewith our tenders in respect of Tri-Sure components and dies against the above contracts . . . Royalty—Our prices as quoted are exclusive of royalty which would normally be due on supplies of this patented closure, but for which we are not liable on the authority of the letter received by Messrs. Freshfields, Leese & Munns, from your Ministry dated 15/6/43.

D Following that there is, on Feb. 1, 1944, an acceptance by the Ministry :

With reference to the Department's Instructions to Proceed under the above reference, dated July 27, 1943, I am directed by the Minister of Supply to inform you that he hereby accepts the quotation contained in your tender dated Jan. 12, 1944, in conjunction with your letter of the same date, for the supply of the following . . .

E Then the goods and quantities are set out and the price. It then says : "Delivery has already been effected." Then, under the heading "Premises" it says :

The work performed under this contract was carried out at various sub-contractors' works and the various items assembled at Merseyside Works, Ellesmere Port, Cheshire, prior to despatch.

I think the word "assembled" there means "collected."

F A table of the contracts was put in as scheduled so as to make it unnecessary for me to refer in detail to any of the other contracts. That document (P.4) sets out the details of the contracts, the goods ordered and the quantities. I think the only reference I need make to it is that in respect of some of the contracts—I think Nos. 15, 17 and 18—a reference is made to Standard Condition 32 instead of Standard Condition 43. The condition is substantially the same, as will be apparent later on. Standard Condition 43 is as follows :

G Patent Rights, etc. (A). (1) Under the provisions of the Patents and Designs Act, 1907, ss. 29 and 58A, as amended by the Patents and Designs Act, 1942, s. 2, and under the Defence (Patents, Trade Marks, etc.) Regulations, 1941, reg. 3 (5), the contractor is authorised for the purpose of performing the contract (but not otherwise) to make, use, exercise or vend such inventions and designs as may be required for that purpose, and in connection with the making, use, exercise or vending of any inventions or application of any design as aforesaid to use any drawing, model, plan or other document or information as may be required for that purpose. No royalty, licence fee or other expense in respect of the making, use, exercise or vending by the contractor of any invention or design for the purpose of performing the contract or in respect of the use by the contractor of any drawing, model, plan or document or information in connection with the making, use, exercise or vending of any invention or application of any design for that purpose will be allowed as a proper item of cost incurred by the contractor unless it shall have been specifically agreed by the Minister of Supply and no such royalty, licence fee or other expense not so agreed shall be included in the contractor's tender, quotation, offer, acceptance or contract price. (2) The authority hereby conferred has the effect of relieving the contractor from liability, whether under licence agreements and similar agreements or otherwise, to make any payments, whether by way of royalties and licence fees or otherwise in respect of the contractor's making use, exercise or vending of any invention or design, or use in connection therewith or with the application of any design, of any drawing or model or plan or other document or information, for the purpose of performing the contract. If any claim for any such payment is made against the contractor, it shall be referred to the Minister of Supply. (3) The contractor shall inform the Minister of Supply as soon as possible (a) of any licence or other agreement under which he would or might but for this authority have been liable to make any payment in respect of the making, use, exercise or vending as aforesaid of any invention or design or the use as aforesaid of any drawing, model, plan or other document or information, and (b) of any patented invention or registered design the making, use, exercise or vending of which by the contractor is likely to be required for the purposes of the contract and which the contractor would not have been entitled to make, use, exercise or vend if this authority had not been given: Provided that if and in so far as the contractor has already given any of the information so required to the Minister of Supply in connection with a previous contract it shall be sufficient for him to identify such contract and the letter giving such information. (4) The contractor shall incorporate in any sub-contract or order, made or placed by him for the purposes of the contract, of the classes specified in the schedule or of any further classes which may be agreed upon between the Minister of Supply and the contractor, the provisions set out in sub-cl. (1), (2) and (3) of this condition with the substitution of a reference to the sub-contractor for each reference to the contractor.

In the negotiations with the Ministry of Supply efforts were made by the defendant to have the royalties payable by him to the plaintiffs included in the price of the goods, but after correspondence and interviews during 1943 the Ministry wrote on Dec. 17, 1943, that the Department's Standard Condition 43, "Patent Rights," would be incorporated in all the formal contracts for the closures and dies and that the price quotations were to be exclusive of royalties. It was at the time thought, it seems, that no claim for royalties in respect of the closures would be made by the plaintiffs as it was mistakenly believed that the matter would be dealt with under a patent interchange agreement with America. The position, therefore, is that the defendant has not been paid by the Ministry of Supply the royalties now claimed against him in this action.

It will be convenient now to refer to the Patents Act, 1907, s. 29, as amended, and to the Defence (Patents, Trade Marks, etc.) Regulations, 1941, on which provisions the defence in this action solely rests. It is alleged by the defendant that, on their true construction and application, they make the terms of the licence under which the plaintiffs sue inoperative in so far as the claims for royalties in this case are concerned. All the closure parts involved were sold, it is alleged, by the defendant to the Ministry of Supply in pursuance of contracts in writing whereby the defendant was authorised to make, use, exercise or vend such inventions as might be required for the purpose of performing the said contracts and in connection with the making, use, exercising or vending of any inventions to use any drawing, model, plan or other document or information as might be required for the said purpose. Paragraph 6 of the amended defence is as follows:

The performance of the said contracts and each of them concerned the making, use, vending or exercise of the plaintiffs' invention or inventions for the service of the Crown. Further or in the alternative, the making, use, vending or exercise of the plaintiffs' invention or inventions and the use of the plaintiffs' drawings, models, plans documents and information for the service of the Crown included the performing of the said contracts and each of them. In the premises the terms of the letters and agreements referred to in para. 3 of the statement of claim were and are inoperative so far as concerns the said closure parts.

The Patents and Designs Act, 1907, s. 29 (1), [as amended by the Act of 1919] is as follows:

A patent shall have to all intents the like effect as against His Majesty the King as it has against a subject: Provided that any government department may, by themselves or by such of their agents, contractors, or others as may be authorised in writing by them at any time after the application, make, use or exercise the invention for the services of the Crown on such terms as may, either before or after the use thereof, be agreed on, with the approval of the Treasury, between the department and the patentee, or, in default of agreement, as may be settled in the manner hereinafter provided. And the terms of any agreement or licence concluded between the inventor or patentee and any person other than a government department, shall be inoperative so far as concerns the making, use or exercise of the invention for the service of the Crown.

Sub-section (1A), which incorporates an amendment of the statute of 1942, provides :

The power of a government department under sub-s. (1) of this section to make, use or exercise an invention for the services of the Crown shall include power during any war period to make, use, exercise or vend an invention, upon such terms as are mentioned in the said sub-s. (1), for any purpose which appears to the department necessary or expedient for the efficient prosecution of any war in which His Majesty may be engaged or for the maintenance of supplies and services essential to the life of the community ; and the terms of any such agreement or licence as is mentioned in the said sub-s. (1) shall be inoperative so far as concerns the making, use, exercise or vending of an invention under this sub-section as they are inoperative so far as concerns the making, use or exercise of an invention under that sub-section.

The effect of sub-s. (1A), therefore (as far as is material to this case) is to add "or vend" to the words "make, use or exercise" on the two occasions on which they occur in s. 29 (1).

Section 29 (2) of the Act of 1907 [as amended by s. 2 (1) of the Act of 1942] provides :

In case of any dispute as to the making, use, exercise or vending of an invention under this section, or the terms thereof, or as to the existence or scope of any record or trial as aforesaid, the matter shall be referred to the court for decision, who shall have power to refer the whole matter or any question or issue of fact arising thereon to be tried before a special or official referee or an arbitrator upon such terms as it may direct. The court, referee, or arbitrator, as the case may be, may, with the consent of the parties, take into consideration the validity of the patent for the purposes only of the reference and for the determination of the issues between the applicant and such government department.

For the purposes of this case I need not read any more of that section. In the definition section, s. 93, it says :

"Invention" means any manner of new manufacture the subject of letters patent and grant of privilege within s. 6 of the Statute of Monopolies . . . [1623], and includes an alleged invention.

The other provision relied on by the defendant is in the Defence (Patents, Trade Marks, etc.) Regulations, 1941, reg. 3 (5) :

In connection with the making, use, exercise or vending of any invention, or application of any design, on behalf of, or for the services of, the Crown (whether by virtue of the Patents and Designs Act, 1907, or otherwise), a Secretary of State, the Admiralty, the Minister of Supply or the Minister of Aircraft Production may authorise the use of any drawing, model, plan or other document or information in such manner as appears to him or them to be expedient in the interests of the defence of the realm or the efficient prosecution of the war, notwithstanding anything to the contrary contained in any licence or agreement ; and any licence or agreement, if and so far as it confers on any person, otherwise than for the benefit of the Crown, a right to receive any payment in respect of the use of any document or information in pursuance of such an authorisation, shall be inoperative.

The plaintiffs' main contentions were as follows :

(1) That s. 29 relates only to patented inventions and that the defendant did not make, use, exercise or vend any patented invention nor was the defendant authorised in writing to make any patented invention. (2) That on the proper construction of reg. 3 of the Defence (Patents, Trade Marks, etc) Regulations, 1941, para. (5) relates only to a case in which the Minister authorises the use of any drawing, model, plan or other document or information in connection with the making, use, exercise or vending of a patented invention, and that therefore it has no application where, as in the present case, the defendant did not make, use, exercise or vend a patented invention. (3) That even if reg. 3 (5) is to be construed so as to apply to an unpatented invention and even if the goods which the defendant made and sold to the Ministry could be called an unpatented invention (both of which the plaintiffs dispute), the authority given to the defendant was limited to an authority to use drawings, models, plans or other documents or information in connection with the making, use, exercise or vending of a patented invention and was not an authority to use those things in connection with the making, use, exercise or vending of an unpatented invention (which alone the defendant made and sold). Therefore the regulation has in any event no bearing in the case. (4) (a) That the licence did not give the plaintiffs any right to receive any payment in respect of the use of any document or information because the royalties were not payable by the defendant to the plaintiffs for the use of documents or information. (b) That, if on the proper construction of the licence the royalties were payable in part in respect of the use by the defendant of any document or information, and if the defendant used any document or information, the use of the documents or information by the defendant was not "in pursuance of the authorisation" as it was not in pursuance of any authorisation that the defendant used whatever documents or information he did use. He needed no such authorisation as there was nothing in the licence "to the contrary," i.e., to preclude him from using the documents or information in making sputs and bungs for the Ministry. (5) That as regards a large part of the sputs and bungs which the defendant made and sold to the Ministry, there was no authority given by the Minister under s. 29 to make, use, exercise or vend them. The purported authority was given after those particular goods had been sold and delivered and the authority in s. 29 cannot be given retrospectively.

The defendant's summarised submissions were as follows :

(1) The use, under s. 29, of a patented invention is use by the Crown. The defendant in supplying material either (i) made use of the inventions "constructively," or (ii) took part as an authorised agent of the Crown in the use of the inventions. (2) Regulation 3 (5) is expressed to apply not only to s. 29 use but also "otherwise." It cannot therefore be limited to patented inventions and relates equally to the use of information, etc., in connection with "alleged" or unpatented inventions. (3) The authority given to the defendant related to the proposed or intended user by the Crown, for which purpose the supply of component parts of the closures was an essential ingredient. Such supply involved the use of information, etc., received from plaintiffs in connection with the manufacture and assembly of what they alleged to be invented closure parts of their devising. (4) (a) The royalties were expressed to be payable in respect of the manufacture and use of sputs and plugs. If such manufacture incorporated, as it did, the use of information, etc., payment of royalty covered payment for such use. (b) The defendant manufactured and supplied sputs and plugs pursuant to the authority given in each "I.T.P." such authority covering all inventions, information, etc., if any, which fell to be used in such manufacture. Such authority was necessary, not because the licence precluded the defendant from using it at all but because the licence precluded him from using it except upon the terms of the licence. (5) The authority given by the Ministry was contained in the "I.T.P." which is in fact the order and which was expressed to be on terms and conditions which included the authority set out in Standard Condition 43 (or 32). The subsequent conclusion of a formal contract when costings, etc., had been determined did not post-date either the order or the authority given thereby. It confirmed formally the authority already given. In any event s. 29 enables retrospective authority to be granted, and contains nothing to the contrary effect.

Section 29 has recently been considered in the Court of Appeal in No-Nail Cases Proprietary, Ltd. v. No-Nail Boxes, Ltd. (1) and Foster Wheeler, Ltd. v. Green & Son, Ltd. (2). The plaintiffs rely on both those decisions in support of the construction that the plaintiffs advance. The actual decision in the No-Nail case (1) was, on the issue which is material, that a licensee or the owner of a patented invention may be included in the word "others" in that part of the proviso :

Provided that any government department may, by themselves or by such of their agents, contractors, or others as may be authorised in writing . . .

The plaintiffs expressly asked to keep this point open should the case go in due course beyond the Court of Appeal. I do not think it necessary to refer to the facts of the case. Both courts held that s. 29 relieved the licensees from liability to pay the royalty under the agreement.

In the Foster Wheeler case (2), it was decided that patentees are not included in the word "others," and that the defendants, who were patentees of a patent for making economisers for use in marine boilers, and who had contracted to sell the patented economisers exclusively to the plaintiffs, were not relieved of their obligation to the plaintiffs by an authorisation by the Crown to manufacture and supply the economisers to the Crown. The patentees were, therefore, restrained from selling to the Crown. The judgment of the court was delivered by DU PARCQ, L.J., who had also read the judgment of the court in the No-Nail case (1). DU PARCQ, L.J., said ([1946] 1 All E.R. 63, 65, 66) :

Shortly stated, the question for our decision is this : When s. 29 empowers a government department to act "by themselves or by such of their agents, contractors, or others as may be authorised in writing by them" is the word "others" to be read as including the patentee ? If it cannot properly be so read, it must follow that the judge wrongly construed this difficult section, and that the appeal must be allowed.

Section 29 was recently considered by this court, and it was then held that a government department might lawfully authorise persons who were making patented articles under a licence from the patentee to make them on its behalf for the services of the Crown on terms to be agreed between the department and the patentee or settled as provided in the section : see No-Nail Cases Proprietary, Ltd. v. No-Nail Boxes, Ltd. (1). The question now before us is a different one, and is bare of authority. It must be answered, like all questions of construction, by reading the words of the section as a whole, with due regard to the apparent purpose of the section and to the context in which the words appear. The section begins by enacting that "a patent shall have to all intents the like effect as against His Majesty the King as it has against a subject." This enacting part of the section, in our opinion, provides the key to the interpretation of the section as a whole. The legislature is concerned with the effect which letters patent granted by the Crown are to have as against the Crown. Is the monopoly granted to the patentee to avail him as against the Crown, or only as against his fellow-subjects ? Having answered that question in favour of the patentee, Parliament has proceeded, by a proviso, seriously to qualify the right which it has conferred. Any government department may do what, done by a subject, would prima facie be an infringement of the patent, namely, make, use, exercise and vend the invention. But this right is qualified in its turn. First, the department must be dealing with the invention in the permitted manner "for the services of the Crown." Secondly, the department must come to an agreement with the patentee (subject to the approval of the Treasury) as to the terms on which the invention is to be dealt with, or, failing agreement, must abide by such terms as may be settled in the manner prescribed by sub-s. (2). Finally, not only may the government department make, use, exercise or vend the invention "by themselves," but (to put the matter as briefly as possible) they may authorise "others" to do the like on their behalf. So far the section has dealt solely with the rights of the patentee as against the Crown. Then, having disposed of that question, it goes on to provide that the terms of any agreement or licence concluded between the inventor or patentee and any person other than a government department shall be inoperative so far as concerns the making, use, exercise or vending, of the invention for the services of the Crown.

Later in his judgment DU PARCQ, L.J., said (ibid., 66, 67) :

The court will always lean strongly against an interpretation of a statute which deprives the subject of rights without compensation, and if there be any ambiguity in the words of the section, this consideration must lend great weight to the contention advanced on behalf of Foster Wheeler.

Although neither of the two cases deals directly with the point in issue before me, I have read substantially from this judgment because it deals generally with the interpretation of the section, and I think both cases together justify the propositions which the plaintiffs asked me to draw from them, namely : (i) a licensee from the patentee may be included in the word "others" in the proviso to s. 29 ; (ii) a patentee is not included ; (iii) in considering the section the court will lean against a construction which deprives the subject of rights without compensation ; and (iv) the key to the interpretation of the section as a whole is to be found in the first two lines of the section, and the proviso enables a government department to do that which would, prima facie, be an infringement of a patent. I think that all these propositions taken together indicate, and, perhaps, involve, as was submitted, that the section is dealing with patented and not unpatented inventions.

Looking at the position historically, it was decided in the House of Lords in Dixon v. London Small Arms Co., Ltd. (3) :

The Crown has the right to the use of a patented process or invention without compensation to the patentee. Per LORD SELBORNE : This right of the Crown is not because the Crown is impliedly excepted from the effect of the letters patent, but because the privilege thereby granted is granted against the subject only and not against the Crown.

Following that decision, the Patents, Designs and Trade Marks Act, 1883, was passed, s. 27 of which provided :

(1) A patent shall have to all intents the like effect as against Her Majesty the Queen, her heirs and successors, as it has against a subject. (2) But the officers or authorities administering any department of the service of the Crown may, by themselves, their agents, contractors, or others, at any time after the application, use the invention for the services of the Crown on terms to be before or after the use thereof agreed on, with the approval of the Treasury, between those officers or authorities and the patentee, or, in default of such agreement, on such terms as may be settled by the Treasury after hearing all parties interested.

That section is the forerunner of the present s. 29 and would clearly seem to refer to a patented invention. Section 29 re-models and amplifies s. 27 of the Act of 1883. It replaces "but" with "provided that." It requires authorisation in writing and makes different provisions for settling the compensation in default of agreement. The last sentence in s. 29 is entirely new, but, if s. 27 of the Act of 1883 applied only to a patented invention, nothing in the substituted s. 29 would appear to alter that aspect of the section.

On behalf of the defendant it was submitted that the definition of "invention" in s. 93 did not, properly construed, mean a patented invention and that, e.g., in s. 1 (1) which provides:

An application for a patent may be made by any person who claims to be the true and first inventor of an invention . . .

the word "invention" could not mean a patented invention because a claim of an invention must exist before the application for a patent. The definition of the word "invention" is, I think, wider than a patented invention, but s. 29 provides that the government department may give the necessary authority in writing "after application." The section, in my opinion, applies to a patented invention and to an alleged invention which is the subject of an application for a patent. Unless the sputs or the plugs are patented inventions or are the subject of an application for a patent, the defence under s. 29, in my view, fails. No question arises in this case of an application for a patent and I will postpone consideration of the question whether there is any patent until after I have dealt with the regulations relied on. The defendant contends that reg. 3 (5) of the regulations of 1941 relates to the use of both patented and unpatented inventions and that the Crown is entitled to authorise the use of drawings, information, etc., in connection with the sputs and plugs, even if they are unpatented inventions. It is said that the defendant was so authorised to use, and did use, the plaintiffs' information in the manufacture for the Crown and that the agreements between the parties provide for payment in respect of the use of such information and, therefore, are inoperative under the regulation. The plaintiffs, on the other hand, contend that reg. 3 (5) is ancillary or complementary to s. 29 of the Act and enables a person who is authorised to use a patented invention to use any information which by any agreement he is precluded himself from using.

The Defence (Patents, Trade Marks, etc.) Regulations, 1941, are made under the Emergency Powers Defence Acts. They deal with patents, trade marks and registered designs, and reg. 3 controls various matters relating to them. Regulation 3 (1) makes provision for prohibiting publication of information with respect to the subject-matter of an application for a patent. Regulation 3 (2) restricts application for a patent in a foreign country. In reg. 3 (3) and (4), which go together, the word "invention" cannot be restricted to a patented invention because reg. 3 (4) gives the right to a person to apply for and obtain a patent in respect of an invention notwithstanding that there has been previous publication or use by reason of the compulsory powers given by reg. 3 (3). Then comes reg. 3 (5). If I am right in the construction of the previous two sub-sections, I think "invention" in sub-section (5) must also refer to a patented or unpatented invention, and this interpretation is strengthened by the words in brackets:

. . . (whether by virtue of the Patents and Designs Act, 1907, or otherwise) . . .

The making, using, etc., of an invention on behalf of or for the services of the Crown may be by virtue of the Patents Act, 1907, s. 29, but it may be otherwise. It may be the use of an invention revealed to the authorities mentioned by directions given under reg. 3 (3) and not the subject of any patent or application for a patent. In either case, the production of the drawings, information, etc., may be authorised:

. . . notwithstanding anything to the contrary contained in any licence or agreement; and any licence or agreement, if and so far as it confers on any person, otherwise than for the benefit of the Crown, a right to receive any payment in respect of the use of any document or information in pursuance of such an authorisation, shall be inoperative.

This construction of the regulation may deprive an inventor of a secret, but not patented, invention or process of compensation for such use as the Crown makes of his invention, but the provision is in Emergency Regulations to meet national necessity and there are general provisions for ex gratia payments in suitable cases.

I now turn to consideration of the patents. In the particulars given under para. 6 of the defence, the defendant relied on the inventions or designs covered by letters patent numbers 219,610, 294,740, 322,205, 348,285, 363,180, 391,050 and 391,051. The first four patents expired before any date material to this action, but they were all examined in some detail before me. I accept the evidence of Mr. H. A. Gill, an experienced chartered patent agent and consulting engineer, with regard to the various patents. It was not challenged by the evidence of any other patent agent. The effect of it and of my interpretation of the patents is that neither the sput nor the plug as a separate unit or integer is covered by any of the patents. On behalf of the defendant this was conceded in respect of the sput, but it was alleged that the plug was covered as an integer of British Patent 391,051, the application date of which in the United Kingdom is Oct. 31, 1932. The heading is "Improved closure device for the filling and/or discharge opening of a metallic container." It is said that that indicates a distinction between the closure device and the filling and discharge opening of a metallic container, and it is submitted that it follows that the expression "closure device" cannot include the flange because the flange is the member and the sput is the member which is so attached to the container that there can be no filling or discharge opening of the container which is not also a filling or discharge opening in the sput.

Emphasis is placed on p. 1, line 27 :

Another object of the invention is to provide an improved closure plug which is light in weight, cheap to manufacture, serves to reduce shipping and storage costs, and which may be easily and quickly applied to or removed from the container opening without the use of special tools.

Consequently, it is contended that "container opening" means the whole assembly without the plug and the distinction is between the plug as such and the rest of the container.

I have been referred to Nobel's Explosives Co., Ltd. v. Anderson (4), and I have been guided by the observations therein on the principles of construction. I have also been referred to the more recent Electric and Musical Industries, Ltd. v. Lissen, Ltd. (5) and, in particular, the passage in the speech of LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN ([1938] 4 All E.R. 221, 224).

I am of opinion that this patent does not cover plugs alone but only in combination with sputs and the flange of the drum stock. Claim 1 is as follows :

A closure device for the filling and/or discharge opening of a metallic container, characterised by said opening being defined by a bushing part comprising an outwardly extending flange integral with a wall part of the container, a threaded member within the flange, and an interlocking bead at the outer or exterior ends of the flange and member, the threaded member having an inclined gasket seat adjacent its outer end, a threaded closure plug being adapted to be secured into said threaded member, the plug having a head and a groove between said head and the outermost thread of said plug and at least as deep as the threads, and a gasket formed of compressible material, mounted in said plug groove and substantially wholly confined and compressed between said seat, groove and head when the plug is screwed into position in the threaded member.

I construe this claim as saying that it is for a closure device characterised by the various features set out, including "a threaded closure plug being adapted to be secured into said threaded member" and then the plug is described. The opinion I have formed is, I think, supported by many parts of the specification and by comparison with the plaintiffs' Indian patent which claims "a closure plug or a closure device" having certain characteristics. The patent covers the whole device or assembly, including the drum stock with the flange with octagonal seating. I, therefore, find in favour of the plaintiffs' contention that there is no patent covering either the sput or the plug separately as independent units.

The defendant's contention (1) next calls for consideration. It was submitted strongly on behalf of the defendant that the defendant was supplying the sputs and plugs as component parts of the closure device with the necessary dies and tools for the assembly of the patented invention and that that established user of the invention by the defendant under the authority of the Crown, and, but for that authority, there would have been an infringement of the patent. Secondly, it was submitted that the Crown assembled the parts by some agent other than the defendant and in so doing utilised the invention. The government contracts with the defendant were for sputs and plugs, but not for drums with the completed and assembled closure device. The government also bought a certain number of insertion dies and piercing and flanging dies. The evidence shows that of the sputs and plugs supplied by the defendant to the Ministry some were kept as spare parts and never assembled and many of these were returned to or collected in this country mixed with others of American manufacture. Some were probably assembled in this country, some abroad, and of the quantity sent or assembled abroad some probably returned to this country. I do not think anything more definite than that was established. Patent No. 391,051 is a patent for a combination and so, I think, are some of the others. It is established authority that a patent for a combination is not a patent which covers the integers or component parts of the combination. In Harrison v. Anderston Foundry Co. (6), there is a dictum of LORD CHELMSFORD (1876), 1 App. Cas. 574, 581):

If a patent is solely for a combination nothing is protected by it, and consequently nothing can be an infringement but the use of the entire combination.

I will make reference also to Clark v. Adie (7), the headnote of which reads as follows:

A patent may be granted not only in respect of a whole and complete thing described, but in respect, also, of a subordinate integer of that whole. But then the invention must be so described as to make it clear in respect of what (the whole, or the integer) the patent has been asked for and granted. Where a person has invented an improvement in the form of a particular apparatus or machine, but combines that individual improvement with other things which are not his inventions, his specification must claim that particular individual thing, and not leave it doubtful whether the claim is made for the whole combination, of which that thing really only forms a part.

There is a passage in the speech of LORD CAIRNS, L.C. (1877), 2 App. Cas. 315, 320, 321), which is very much in point, likewise Townsend v. Haworth (8) in which I refer to the whole of the speech of SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R. (1875), 12 Ch.D. 831, n.). Then there is the more recent Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co., Ltd. v. David Moseley & Sons, Ltd. (9), the headnote of which is:

The sale of a component part of a combination, the subject of a patent, the vendor knowing that the purchaser intends to use the article for the purpose of infringing the patent, is not an infringement by the vendor.

In the course of the judgment of VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., this passage occurs ([1904] 1 Ch. 612, 619):

I wish to say a word about United Telephone Co. v. Dale (10). In that case in the course of the argument PEARSON, J., said: "If there was a patent for a knife of a particular construction, and an injunction was granted restraining a defendant from selling knives made according to the patent, and he was to sell the component parts so that any school-boy could put them together and construct the knife, surely that sale would be a breach of the injunction." I have not now to determine whether that observation was right or not, but, so far as I am concerned, I can see no reason for saying that it is wrong, and there is nothing in my present judgment which is intended to be inconsistent with it. If you are in substance selling the whole of a patented machine, I do not think that you can save yourself from liability for infringement, because you sell it in parts which are so manufactured as to be adapted to be easily put together. But that is not the present case. What is complained of here is merely the sale of one or other of the parts of the tyres patented by the plaintiffs.

It is this passage, and particularly, I think, the quotation from what PEARSON, J., said in argument, which is the foundation—perhaps the sole foundation—of the defendant's argument of constructive infringement. I cannot find that there is any authority to support the contention; indeed, the authorities seem to me to be against it. I do not think that this case is a suitable one in which to consider the topic further. On the facts there is no satisfactory evidence on which to find conclusively what use was made of the sputs or plugs or when or where or by whom, and I think no evidence at all that the defendant supplied an essential component, the drum stock. There is also some evidence that sputs or plugs could be used otherwise than with a metal container. There is no evidence of any person being authorised in writing to use the plaintiffs' invention except the defendant himself.

A In my judgment, therefore, the plaintiffs' contention (1) is established, but not their contention (2). I therefore turn to contention (3). Regulation 3 (5) requires an authority to use the drawing, information, etc., and it is alleged that no authority was given to use those things in connection with the use of an unpatented invention. It may well be that the defendant and the Ministry of Supply acted throughout on the basis that the sputs and plugs were the subject of patent protection. This might have been avoided if attention had been given to para. 3 (b) of the Standard Condition 43. Such differences as there are between Standard Condition 43 and Standard Condition 32 do not affect the construction on the point which arises here. I take Standard Condition 43 :

B Under the provisions of s. 29 . . . of the Patents and Designs Act, 1907 . . . and under the Defence (Patents, Trade Marks, etc.) Regulations, 1941, reg. 3 (5), the contractor is authorised for the purpose of performing the contract (but not otherwise) to make, use . . . such inventions . . . as may be required for that purpose and in connection with the making, use . . . of any inventions . . . as aforesaid to use any . . . information as may be required for that purpose.

C The plaintiffs submitted that this authority should be read distributively. Section 29 sanctions the giving of authority to make or use, etc., the invention and reg. 3 (5) sanctions the giving of authority to use information. If, it is contended, s. 29 relates only to patented inventions (as I have found), then the authority to use the information is only in connection with the use of any invention "as aforesaid," i.e., only in connection with a patented invention. The argument has force, but it seems to me not to do justice to the regulation and the conditions read together. If reg. 3 (5) has been rightly construed, it D permits authority to be given for the use of information in respect of unpatented inventions. Standard Condition 43 is an express authority under reg. 3 (5), which regulation does not require the authority to be in writing. It is drawing too fine a line to restrict the authority to an authorisation only in connection with a patented invention. There was here no patented invention. I think the defendant's contention on this point is to be preferred and I accept the defendant's contention (3).

E The plaintiffs' fourth contention and the defendant's corresponding answer calls for the consideration of the licences which I have set out earlier in this judgment. Paragraph 8 of the licences deals expressly with information. The plaintiffs submit that no royalty is payable for information and that there is nothing in the licences precluding the defendant from using any information which he obtains concerning the sputs and plugs or their manufacture. Here F again I accept the view set out in the defendant's answer which, in respect of their contention 4 (b), is supported by the decision in the No-Nail case (1).

G There remains only for consideration the subsidiary claim which is dealt with in the respective contentions numbered (5). In the first contract of the Ministry of Supply, to which I referred at the outset, the acceptance dated Feb. 8, 1944, of the defendant's tender states that the delivery of the goods has already been effected, and it was submitted that under s. 29 the authority in writing must be given before the act which would constitute the infringement if no such authority were given. In view of my findings, this does not now arise, but a similar contention could be raised in respect of the authority given under reg. 3 (5) in respect of the use of information, etc. I do not accept it and I think it is adequately dealt with in the defendant's corresponding answer.

H In the result, the defendant is relieved, in my judgment, of his obligation to pay the royalties claimed by reason of reg. 3 (5) of the Defence (Patents, Trade Marks, etc.) Regulations, 1941, and I give judgment for the defendant.

Judgment for the defendant with costs.

FLOOD v. FLOOD.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Lord Merriman, P., and Ormerod, J.), July 21, 1948.]

Child—Custody—Maintenance—Order made under Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895 (c. 39), s. 5 (b)—Discharge of order—Order for custody under Guardianship of Infants Acts, 1886 and 1925.

On Feb. 4, 1943, a wife obtained an order under the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Acts giving her the custody of the two children of her marriage, with maintenance for herself in the maximum amount of £2 per week and for the children in the maximum sum of 10s. per week each. On Mar. 15, 1948, the wife applied to have the order varied by revoking such parts thereof as referred to the custody and maintenance of the children, it being intended, if the order was varied as asked, to apply for a summons under the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1925, returnable immediately, to obtain an order for custody and maintenance at a higher figure under that Act. There was evidence that the husband's means had increased and that one of the children was in poor health. It was contended that no cause was shown for discharging the provision of the first order with regard to custody as it was proposed to have custody restored immediately by another order, but the justices granted the application. On appeal by the husband:

HELD: in the matter of custody the paramount consideration was the welfare of the children, and in that connection the adequacy of the provision for maintenance was of great importance, and, the decision of the justices was right.

APPEAL by a husband from an order of Bury, Lancashire, justices, made on May 3, 1948, whereby an order made on Feb. 4, 1943, was varied by revoking parts thereof referring to the custody and maintenance of the children of the marriage. The appeal was dismissed. The facts appear in the judgment of LORD MERRIMAN, P.

Clifford Mortimer and John Mortimer for the husband.

Quintin Hogg for the wife.

LORD MERRIMAN, P.: This is a husband's appeal from a decision of the justices for the county borough of Bury in which he complains that, on May 3, 1948, the justices, on the wife's application, discharged an order for custody previously made in favour of the wife although her application was avowedly made, not to change the custody itself, but to get that custody under another Act of Parliament under which she could get larger maintenance for the children.

On Feb. 4, 1943, the wife obtained, on the ground of persistent cruelty, an order giving her the custody of the two children, with maintenance in the maximum amount of £2 a week for herself and in the maximum sum of 10s. for each child in respect of the two children whose custody was awarded to her. That order remained in force until the wife applied on Mar. 15, 1948, that the order might be varied by revoking such parts thereof as referred to the custody and maintenance of the two children. There is a side-note to the application in these words: "If the order is varied as asked, application will be made for a summons under the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1925, returnable immediately." There was, therefore, no doubt what the object of that summons was. It is said that the justices had no jurisdiction to discharge this custody order merely in order to substitute another custody order in favour of the same parent, although thereby that parent was enabled to obtain larger maintenance. It is necessary to bear in mind the terms of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, s. 7, for it is on that section alone (at any rate, so far as concerns this case) that the very special right of a court of summary jurisdiction dealing with matrimonial causes to vary or even to discharge its own orders depends. The material words are :

A court of summary jurisdiction . . . may, on the application of the married woman or of her husband, and upon cause being shown upon fresh evidence to the satisfaction of the court at any time, alter, vary, or discharge any such order, and may upon any such application from time to time increase or diminish the amount of any weekly payment ordered to be made, so that the same do not in any case exceed the weekly sum of £2.

I need not repeat the analysis of that section which was given by this court in Underwood v. Underwood (1). Suffice it to say that, in so far as the mere question of quantum is concerned, it is clear that the words "upon fresh evidence" with all their implications are no longer applicable, but that they are still applicable to anything other than a mere question of amount, and counsel for the husband rightly called attention to the fact that this is not a mere question of amount.

This is the discharge of the original custody order itself, and I agree with him that it is necessary, therefore, before justices have jurisdiction to act, that cause must be shown on fresh evidence to the satisfaction of the court. Again, I need not repeat at length the definition of what is meant by "fresh evidence," beyond saying, as I said in Underwood v. Underwood (1), that I accept absolutely the summary of earlier judgments given by HILL, J., in Timmins v. Timmins (2), a summary which he concluded by saying ([1919] P. 80) (after quoting what was said in Johnson v. Johnson (3)) :

. . . that "fresh evidence" means evidence of something which has happened since the former hearing or has come to the knowledge of the party applying since the hearing, and could not by reasonable means have come to his knowledge before that time . . . But they [the justices] can discharge or vary their order only upon cause shown. In my judgment that means cause shown for discharging that part of the order which is sought to be discharged, and the order cannot be discharged as a whole unless cause is shown for discharging every part of it.

From that it is argued that there cannot be any cause for discharging this custody order, because it is not said that the wife is no longer to have custody. On the contrary, she states in her summons that it is her intention, the moment this order is discharged, to ask for a fresh order to be made to the same effect under another statute. One must bear in mind that there are two concurrent jurisdictions in this respect. By the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, s. 5 (b), one of the orders that may be made on proof of the wife's complaint, is that "legal custody of any children of the marriage . . . while under the age of 16 years, be committed to the applicant," and then, 25 years later, by the Married Women (Maintenance) Act, 1920, s. 1 (1), where an order has been made "which contains a provision committing the legal custody of any children of the marriage to the applicant," the court may, in addition to any other provision authorised by the Act, include a provision that the husband shall pay to the applicant, or to any officer of the court or third person on her behalf, a weekly sum not exceeding 10s. for the maintenance of each such child until such child attains the age of 16 years.

It is not compulsory to deal with the question of custody under that Act. It is permissible. At the same time, by the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1925—the Act which contains the well-known direction to the court to give paramount consideration to the welfare of the child as distinct from the supposed rights of either parent—the wife may apply for guardianship of a child, and, if she obtains it, the husband may be ordered to pay a sum not exceeding £1 as against the 10s. payable under the other Acts.

It is said that once the wife has elected to proceed under one of these Acts, she cannot recall her election and proceed under the other. It is necessary to examine this contention, but before doing so, I must refer (without reading them all) to the justices' reasons, and I would like to say that this case, in my opinion, has been most admirably tried. The justices find that the husband's income had increased and that this fact, together with the difficulties in which the wife found herself with one of the children, which was in poor health, amounted to fresh evidence. They say that, if they were merely dealing with an order under the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, for something less than the maximum amount for the wife or the children, these new facts would have amounted to fresh evidence which would have entitled them to increase the amount. I accept that only with this criticism, that, so far as the question of amount is concerned, "fresh evidence" is not necessary, but certainly those circumstances would have been good cause, if they were established to the satisfaction of the court, without the special considerations attaching to the need for "fresh evidence." I go further. If the words "upon fresh evidence" had still been material, those circumstances would, in relation to the amount, unquestionably have been within the accepted definition of the words "fresh evidence." The justices then face the difficulty which I have already stated, whether they could vary the order by revoking that part which related to the custody of the children when the wife was anxious to retain that custody. After referring to the passage in HILL, J.'s, judgment in Timmins v. Timmins (2) which I have mentioned, and the argument, based on that, that because the wife was anxious to retain custody of the children she had not shown cause why that part of the order which related to custody should be revoked, and to the judgment of VAISEY, J., in Re Kinseth (4), they conclude by saying that they do not think that there is any authority for saying that once a wife has chosen under which Act she seeks maintenance for her child she is at all times precluded from taking advantage of any other Act.

The judgment of VAISEY, J., in Kinseth v. Kinseth (4) deals, not with the revocation or discharge of an order already in existence, but with the double remedy. In that case the wife, on the ground of desertion, had obtained an order in favour of herself under the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, but she deliberately refrained from asking for custody under that Act (no doubt, for the same reason as prevailed in this case) and sought to obtain guardianship under the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1925. The justices held that she could not take two bites at the cherry, and that this procedure was misconceived and they had no jurisdiction to make the order. On appeal, VAISEY, J., expressed the view, with which I am in complete agreement, that the wife had a right to take the course she did. He said in conclusion ([1947] 1 All E.R. 202) :

I am told that in the courts of summary jurisdiction in the metropolis it is a matter of routine or practice not to allow summonses under both Acts to proceed or be taken out . . . I myself can see no possible reason why women who have been deserted by their husbands should not be entitled to have the benefit of both these sets of statutes and the rule or practice that they may not proceed under more than one of the two appears, in my judgment, as at present advised, to be misconceived.

I do not understand VAISEY, J., as saying that the justices could make a custody order under both statutes simultaneously. All he was dealing with was the right to proceed under two alternative summonses. This matter was dealt with by this court on Apr. 27, 1948, in Heworth v. Heworth (5), when it was made clear that, although that was perfectly proper procedure, there must come a moment at which either the party or the court or both must decide under which Act the order is going to be made. In Heworth v. Heworth (5) two summonses were before the court, and the court had made a custody order under both summonses and had awarded maintenance of £1 a week under the Guardianship of Infants Act. We said that this was to be deprecated, for the reason, if for no other, that it embarrassed the question of appeal, and then I went on to say (p. 716 post; 112 J.P. 303) :

If two summonses are taken out regarding custody, the proper course is for the justices to choose one summons, instead of making an order for custody on both. I ended by saying that I trusted that course would be followed in all similar cases.

That, of course, does not deal directly with the point which is now before us, but I think it has an indirect bearing, which I can perhaps best illustrate by taking a hypothetical case. If the wife in the present case had asked, not only for an order for herself in the summons under the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, but also for custody and maintenance under that Act, and at the same time had presented, as in Heworth v. Heworth (5), a summons under the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1925, for custody and maintenance, there would have come a point at which either she or the court must choose under which summons the court should act. If the evidence was that at that time all the husband could afford was £3 a week—that is to say, £2 for herself and 10s. for each of two children—and she admitted that she could well manage to look after the children on that sum (in other words, if she satisfied the justices that the total sum of £3 a week was all that was required for the welfare and benefit of herself and of the children), she might well have elected to take, or the justices might well have decided to deal with, custody and maintenance under the same order as that made in her own favour under the Act of 1925. Then, let it be supposed, some years later the situation changes. The husband's means have increased, the value of money has decreased, and the children's needs have increased, and the wife says to the court: "I ask for this custody order to be set aside, not because it is in the interests of the children that my husband should have custody of them from this moment, but because it is in their interest that I should have more money with which to look after their welfare. Circumstances have changed for the worse so far as I am concerned and for the better so far as my husband is concerned. The children's needs have increased and so have my husband's means." That relates, not to a question of amount, but to an essential element of the question of custody, that essential element being: "What is for the welfare of the children?" My brother pointed this out very forcibly in the course of the argument, and I do not think that one can divorce the two integrated questions of custody and welfare of the children, on the one hand, and the means of supporting them, on the other. They seem to me to be completely bound up together, or, at any rate, to be so in this case. It is said that it cannot be right to allow some indirect motive, something unconnected with the actual custody, to come into this matter, but I think we have got to the stage in which it is impossible to lay down a hard and fast rule like that. The Court of Appeal have sanctioned the procedure of getting rid of a non-cohabitation clause in an order, not because the order was wrongly made or because it is any less right that it should continue for the protection of the wife, but for the express purpose of enabling her to found a charge of desertion against her husband. In my opinion, it is sufficient for us to be satisfied in this case, as I am satisfied, that the welfare of the children is involved in the change of the jurisdiction under which the new custody order has been made. I think that the justices came to a right decision, and that this appeal should be dismissed.

ORMEROD, J.: As I see this case, the real point is whether the evidence of the increased cost of maintaining the children and of the increased means of the husband was relevant to the question of the custody of the children apart from the amount which should be allowed for their maintenance, and, as the paramount interest is the interest of the children, and that is the matter to which the court must predominantly direct its consideration, it is clear that any question of amount which may involve the making of an order under one Act, on the one hand, or under another Act, on the other hand, is something which must be relevant to the issue of custody. In those circumstances I agree that this appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

HEWORTH v. HEWORTH

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY (Lord Merriman, P., and Willmer, J.), April 27, 1948.]

Husband and Wife—Custody—Maintenance—Summonses by wife under both Summary Jurisdiction and Guardianship of Infants Acts—Proper course for justices to follow.

A wife took out two summonses, the one under the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Acts, 1895 to 1925, complaining of her husband's desertion and claiming maintenance for herself and the child of the marriage, and the other under the Guardianship of Infants Acts, 1886 and 1925, claiming custody of and maintenance for the child.

HELD: the proper course for the justices was to make an order for custody on one only of the summonses, choosing that under the Guardianship of Infants Acts if they wished to grant maintenance for the child at the higher rate permitted by those Acts, for it would be inconvenient, if the husband wished to challenge the justices' decision on the question of custody, for him to have to proceed in the Chancery Division in respect of the order under the Guardianship of Infants Acts and in the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division in respect of that under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts.

APPEAL from Grimsby justices.

The wife took out two summonses against the husband, the one under the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Acts, 1895 to 1925, complaining of desertion and wilful neglect to maintain, and the other under the Guardianship of Infants Acts, 1886 and 1925, claiming the custody of and maintenance for the child of the marriage. The justices awarded the wife 30s. a week on the first summons and 20s. a week for the child on the second, making on each summons an order for custody of the child. The husband appealed.

Trapnell for the husband.

Edgelow for the wife.

LORD MERRIMAN, P.: I attach some importance to a subsidiary aspect of this case. Apparently the justices determined the question of custody under both summonses, but have awarded the amount of £1 a week under the summons brought under the Guardianship of Infants Acts. This practice is to be deprecated, for it would be extremely embarrassing if a husband wished to challenge the question of custody, as distinct from the question of amount, since he would have to appeal to this Division to set aside the custody order under the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Acts and to the Chancery Division to set aside the custody order under the Guardianship of Infants Acts. If two summonses are taken out regarding custody, the proper course is for the justices to choose one summons, instead of making an order for custody on both. If the justices here had wished to make an order for £1 a week in respect of this child, as against 10s., which is all they could order under the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Acts, then they should have ignored the question of custody under the summary jurisdiction order and dealt with the whole matter under the guardianship order. I trust that that course will be followed in all similar cases, for it is a real embarrassment that a husband, even if he is challenging only the amount, and certainly if he is appealing against the order for custody on the merits, should have to appeal to two different courts.

[His LORDSHIP then gave judgment allowing the appeal on the merits.]

Interrogatory—Libel—Newspaper—Defence of fair comment—Interrogatory to writer of article as to identity of informant—Writer paid servant of newspaper. Practice—Interlocutory proceedings—Cross-examination on affidavit.

In an action for libel in respect of an article published in a newspaper, the plaintiffs sued the proprietors, printers and publishers of the newspaper, the editor, and H., who had written and signed the article. The defendants pleaded that the words complained of were fair comment on a matter of public interest, made in good faith and without malice. On an application by the plaintiffs to administer interrogatories to H., H. swore an affidavit stating that he was at all material times in the sole and exclusive employment of the newspaper proprietors, and at the adjourned hearing of the application he was cross-examined on his affidavit. The plaintiffs obtained from the master an order for an interrogatory addressed to H. asking him from whom he had obtained the information on which he relied when writing the article, but, on an appeal by H. from this order, the interrogatory was disallowed by the judge. The plaintiffs appealed to the Court of Appeal:—

HELD : it was open to the judge to recognise the existence of the special rule of practice not to allow an interrogatory of this kind to be administered to the proprietor or publisher of a newspaper, and to take the view that, as a matter of discretion, he should not allow an interrogatory also to a person in the position of H.

INTERLOCUTORY APPEAL by the plaintiffs from an order of JONES, J., in chambers, dated July 29, 1948, disallowing an interrogatory which had been allowed by MASTER SIMNER.

The action was brought in respect of an alleged libel published in a newspaper, the defendants being the proprietors, printers and publishers of the newspaper, the editor, and the author of the article complained of. The author swore an affidavit stating that he was a paid servant of the newspaper. The defence was a plea of fair comment made in good faith and without malice. The plaintiffs applied (inter alia) to be allowed to administer an interrogatory directed to the author asking him from whom he had obtained the information on which the article was based. On an appeal by the plaintiffs from the order of the judge disallowing the interrogatory, the Court of Appeal held that it was within the discretion of the judge to disallow the interrogatory, and dismissed the appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of TUCKER, L.J.

Neil Lawson and Dare for the plaintiffs.

Sir Valentine Holmes, K.C., and J. Davidson for the defendants.

LORD GREENE, M.R.: I will ask Tucker, L.J., to deliver the first judgment.

TUCKER, L.J.: This is an appeal from an order of JONES, J., in chambers disallowing an interrogatory addressed to one of the defendants which had been allowed by MASTER SIMNER. The action was brought by the plaintiffs, Frederick Thomas Lawson and George Francis Harrison, against the defendants, Odhams Press, Ltd., Alan John Fraser Hoby and Renton Stuart Campbell, in respect of an article published in THE PEOPLE newspaper on Aug. 17, 1947. It is not necessary to refer to the promotion and organisation of a boxing contest or exhibition which had taken place shortly before at Yeovil with which the plaintiffs were concerned. The defendants, Odhams Press, Ltd., were sued as the proprietors, printers and publishers of THE PEOPLE, Renton Stuart Campbell was sued as the editor, and the defendant, Hoby, was described as being a journalist who writes a sports column in the newspaper circulating in the United Kingdom. He was alleged to have been the author of the article in question which contained the alleged libel and to have signed the article. By their defence all three defendants admitted that they had printed or caused to be printed and published the words complained of. They denied that the words were capable of bearing the meanings alleged or any defamatory meaning and, in the alternative, by para. 6 they pleaded that the words were fair comment on a matter of public interest made in good faith and without malice towards the plaintiffs. A reply was delivered alleging that the defendants and each of them was actuated by malice in writing and publishing the words complained of.

On those pleadings the following, among other interrogatories, was directed to the second defendant, Hoby:

“From whom did you, the second defendant, obtain the information on which you relied in writing and/or causing to be printed and published the said expressions of opinion, or any, and which, of them?”

That interrogatory was allowed by the master and disallowed by JONES, J. Mr. Hoby had sworn an affidavit in which he stated that he had at all material times been and still was in the sole and exclusive employment of the defendant company, and that he had been so employed continuously save for war service since Sept. 14, 1937, and he said:

“I am now employed by the defendant company as a writer on sports and sporting events and I write weekly articles under my own name in THE PEOPLE, the newspaper on which I am employed. Everything written by me is based upon information which I obtain in the course of my employment by the said newspaper and under the control and instructions of my editor.”

The somewhat unusual course in cases of this nature was taken of requiring that the defendant should attend for cross-examination on that affidavit. It is not necessary for the purpose of this appeal to refer to that cross-examination, which I do not think in substance produced any evidence substantially differing from that to which Mr. Hoby had sworn in his affidavit.

It is said by counsel for the plaintiffs that the learned judge was wrong as a matter of law in disallowing this interrogatory. He says that we ought to infer from all the circumstances that the learned judge disallowed this interrogatory because he considered that as a matter of law he was precluded from allowing such an interrogatory, the matter of law being that such an interrogatory cannot be directed in an action of this kind to a newspaper or to the proprietor and publisher of a newspaper, and that as a matter of law that protection also applied where such an interrogatory was directed to a servant of the company who had contributed an article to the newspaper which was also a defendant in the proceedings. It is conceded that the fact that the article was signed by Mr. Hoby adds nothing in support of the plaintiffs' appeal. Counsel for the plaintiffs says that once a plaintiff finds out who is in fact the author of a particular article and makes him a defendant, such defendant as a matter of law—I think he must put it as high as that—can always be required to answer an interrogatory as to the source of his information on which the article is based and the name of his informant.

Counsel for the plaintiffs has taken us through the authorities on this point and it is not necessary to refer in detail to them. It has now become a matter of practice, and, possibly, a matter of law, that an interrogatory of this kind will not be allowed to be administered to the proprietor or publisher of a newspaper. I do not think it is necessary to go further than Plymouth Mutual Co-operative and Industrial Society, Ltd. v. Traders' Publishing Association, Ltd. (1). In that case VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., after referring to Hennessy v. Wright (No. 2) (2) and Hope v. Brash (3), and quoting from them, said ([1906] 1 K.B. 415):

“It seems to me that under these circumstances the question which we have to ask ourselves is whether there are any special circumstances in this case which would justify a departure from the general rule of practice as to not compelling the disclosure of the names of the persons who supplied the information on which the alleged libel was based in cases of this kind, where the proprietors of a newspaper or other periodical publication set up a defence such as is here pleaded. I do not find any such special circumstances in this case.”

That is, as VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., said, the general rule of practice which had sprung up by 1906 and which has prevailed ever since.

At the other end of the line of cases on this subject comes, in 1937, South Suburban Co-operative Society, Ltd. v. Orum (4), where this court had to consider whether that rule of practice extended to the case of a letter appearing in a newspaper from an ordinary outside correspondent. It was held that the learned judge in chambers had rightly allowed in his discretion the administration of an interrogatory in such a case. The headnote in that case is as follows:

“Where, to an action for libel in respect of a letter published in a newspaper, there are pleas that the letter is fair comment made in good faith and without malice on a matter of public interest, an issue being thus raised as to the attitude of mind of the defendant at the time when the letter was published, the special rule of practice which in such a case exempts a defendant who is the proprietor or the publisher of the newspaper from disclosing the name of a person who supplied information contained in the letter notwithstanding that such information is otherwise relevant to that issue, does not extend to protect a defendant who is the writer or contributor of the letter from disclosing the names of his informants.”

SCOTT, L.J., in delivering the judgment of the court, referred to the line of authorities with regard to the newspaper cases and came to the conclusion that this practice existed, but that there was nothing in the authorities to extend it to the case of a member of the public writing a letter to a newspaper. Accordingly, he was of opinion that LEWIS, J., had properly allowed the interrogatory. I do not think it is necessary to refer in detail to the learned judge's judgment. Counsel for the plaintiffs says that the defendant, Hoby, in the present case is on exactly the same footing as the defendant, Orum, in South Suburban Co-operative Society, Ltd. v. Orum (4). He says that they are both persons who committed a tort jointly with the proprietors of the two newspapers, and that it is irrelevant that in the one case the defendant is the servant of the proprietor of the newspaper in question and that in the other case he was not in that relation to the newspaper.

I think that counsel for the plaintiffs is in a difficulty with regard to this appeal for the reason that we have no information as to the reasons for which the learned judge disallowed this interrogatory. The allowing or disallowing of an interrogatory in a particular case is a matter purely within the discretion of the judge in chambers. If the learned judge had intimated, or if we were driven to the conclusion, that he had disallowed this interrogatory purely on the ground that he considered that as a matter of law the defendant, Hoby, was entitled to the protection which has been accorded to the proprietors and publishers of newspapers, I think that the case would have required more detailed consideration and that it would have been necessary to hear counsel for the defendants on that matter. I express no opinion as to what the ultimate result might have been. As, however, this is a pure matter of discretion and as there is nothing, in my view, in the material before us to indicate that the learned judge dealt with this as a matter of law by which he was bound, and that he did not exercise his discretion, I think we ought to assume that the learned judge did deal with it as a matter within his discretion. If that is so, there is nothing to indicate that he did not exercise his discretion judicially or on proper material. I think it was open to him to take the view that, recognising the existence of this practice in the cases of the proprietors and publishers of newspapers, recognising that the rule of practice had grown up in what was considered to be the public interest, as a matter of discretion he should not allow an interrogatory to be administered to a person in the position of Mr. Hoby, which would have the effect to all intents and purposes of nullifying the usefulness of this rule of practice. I think if he disallowed the interrogatory in the exercise of his discretion on grounds of that kind, as he may well have done, no complaint could be made. Taking the view, as I do, that there is nothing in this case to show that the learned judge either failed to exercise his discretion judicially or that he erroneously considered himself bound by some unalterable rule of law, I think this appeal fails.

LORD GREENE, M.R. : I agree. I only wish to say one thing in regard to the procedure adopted. On the application to deliver interrogatories to Mr. Hoby, he swore an affidavit which showed on the face of it that he was a paid servant of the newspaper and that the information he had obtained had been obtained by him in that capacity. The plaintiffs thought fit to apply to cross-examine on that affidavit. The adjourned hearing of that application took place in the presence of Mr. Hoby and it was obvious to everybody, I think, that, if a discussion had been entered into whether or not it was proper in respect of an affidavit sworn in interlocutory proceedings to allow cross-examination, having regard to certain matters it might have involved a great deal of delay. The result of that was that Mr. Hoby was cross-examined then and there, and that was a very reasonable course to be taken and acquiesced in by all parties. It need not be thought, therefore, that I am making any comment on the practice that was followed on the facts of the particular case, but I am bound to say that I am happy to hear from counsel for the defendants that in his experience it is not the practice, in the absence of special circumstances, to allow cross-examination on an affidavit of this kind sworn in interlocutory proceedings. It appears to me that if such a practice existed, it might be said to be a deplorable one, because it would mean that actions of this kind are subject to the multiplication of expense by cross-examination in interlocutory proceedings. The question whether or not cross-examination ought to be allowed is a matter of discretion. I only express the hope, if I may properly do so, that in interlocutory proceedings no such order will be made in the absence of special circumstances of some kind. I thought it desirable to say that, because I think it would be unfortunate if it was thought that orders for cross-examination on affidavits of this kind are to be given as a matter of course. I agree that the appeal must be dismissed.

NOTE.

GILLAN v. LANDLESS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Greene, M.R., Tucker and Somervell, L.JJ.), October 5, 1948.]

Court of Appeal—Fresh evidence—Power to hear—County court appeal.

A landlord applied unsuccessfully to the county court for possession of certain premises. Subsequently he applied to the Court of Appeal for leave to call fresh evidence on the hearing of an appeal against the decision of the county court.

HELD: the Court of Appeal had no power to hear fresh evidence in an appeal from a county court.

MOTION by the landlord for leave to call fresh evidence at hearing of appeal.

The appeal was from a judgment given by His Honour JUDGE PEEL at Blackpool County Court on Apr. 15, 1948, in a case under the Rent Restrictions Acts, in which possession was sought by the landlord of certain premises on the ground that they were furnished. The county court judge found that they were not furnished within the meaning of the Acts and refused possession.

O'Malley for the landlord.

Shackleton Bailey for the tenant.

O'Malley: This is an appeal from the county court judge on the ground that he applied a test which was wrong since there was not sufficient evidence to entitle him to apply it. In such a case the court has an inherent jurisdiction to hear fresh evidence to provide the material on which to found this submission.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: Has any court ever done it?

O'Malley: There is no case of which I know where it has been done.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: Do you suggest that on the fresh evidence the court must then consider the facts of the case?

O'Malley: No. My case would be that, having regard to all the matters brought before you in the Court of Appeal, this is a proper case to be sent back to the county court judge for re-trial.

LORD GREENE, M.R.: We cannot give you any relief.

Motion dismissed with costs.

LANGFORD PROPERTY CO., LTD. v. ATHANASSOGLOU AND ANOTHER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Greene, M.R., Tucker and Somervell, L.JJ.), September 29, 1948.]

Rent Restriction—Possession—Personal occupation—Tenant living elsewhere and passing two nights a week in premises.

The tenant of a flat in London which came within the Rent Restrictions Acts had a home in the country, but slept at the flat whenever he required to do so for the purpose of his business, that being on an average twice a week. He rarely had any meal in the flat. The landlords of the flat claimed possession on the ground that the tenant was not in personal occupation.

HELD : there was no evidence that the tenant was not in personal occupation, and, accordingly, his right to possession was protected by the Rent Restrictions Acts.

Skinner v. Geary ([1931] 2 K.B. 546 ; 145 L.T. 675), distinguished.

Per curiam : In my view, there is nothing in the Rent Restrictions Acts to prevent a man having more than one home. His business may require him at different times in the week or different times in the month to be in different parts of the country, and there is nothing to prevent him having a home in those different places.

(1) Skinner v. Geary, [1931] 2 K.B. 546 ; 100 L.J.K.B. 718 ; 145 L.T. 675 ; 95 J.P. 194 ; Digest Supp.

APPEAL by the tenant from an order of His Honour JUDGE BENSLEY WELLS at Marylebone County Court, made in an action by the landlords for possession of a flat occupied by the tenant, on the ground that the tenant was not in personal occupation of the flat. The Court of Appeal now reversed that decision. The facts appear in the judgment of TUCKER, L.J.

Raymond Stock for the tenant.

Heathcote-Williams for the landlords.

LORD GREENE, M.R. : I will ask TUCKER, L.J., to deliver the first judgment.

TUCKER, L.J. : This is an appeal from a judgment of His Honour JUDGE BENSLEY WELLS given in the Marylebone County Court, whereby he made an order for possession against the two defendants in the present action, called Athanassoglou and Tureman, of certain premises situate at 12a, Lancaster Close. It was common ground that the premises were within the Rent Restrictions Acts. The plaintiffs claimed possession on two grounds. The first was that there had been a breach by the first defendant of a covenant in his lease against assigning or sub-letting the premises, it being alleged that he had sub-let them to the second defendant. On that issue the learned judge found in favour of the first defendant that there had been no sub-letting but that Tureman was present on the premises purely as a guest of the other defendant. The second ground on which possession was claimed was that Athanassoglou was not in personal occupation of the premises as his home so as to entitle him to claim the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts. The plaintiffs relied on the decision of this court in Skinner v. Geary (1), to which I will refer, to the effect that a tenant can only claim the protection of the Acts if he is in personal occupation of the premises.

With regard to the facts, the learned county court judge in the course of his judgment said this :

"Both defendants and Mrs. Tureman, all of whom gave evidence, impressed me favourably as witnesses, and I was satisfied that their evidence was substantially true in all material respects."

Then he proceeded to set out what his findings of fact were. He found that :

"The flat was fully furnished and all the furniture was the property of the defendant, Athanassoglou. The defendant, Tureman, and his wife had been occupying the flat since about the beginning of 1945 as guests of the defendant, Athanassoglou. There was no assignment or sub-letting."

Then, dealing with what is material to the present appeal, he said :

"The defendant, Athanassoglou, has a cottage at Great Missenden, Bucks, where he and his wife and family have lived since about 1940. This cottage is and has been since about 1940 the defendant, Athanassoglou's, home. He took the flat in question because he found it convenient to stay the night in London. Occasionally he slept in the flat, on the average two nights a week, always occupying the same room. On the occasions when he slept at the flat he arrived late at night, at any time after 9 p.m., and left very early the following morning. He very rarely had any meal in the flat."

Then the learned judge went on to refer to Skinner v. Geary (1) and certain passages in the judgment of SCRUTTON, L.J., and proceeded as follows :

"Applying these observations of SCRUTTON, L.J., to the present case I was of opinion that it was impossible to find as a fact that the defendant, Athanassoglou, was at any material time residing in the flat or occupying it in the sense that it was his home, nor was there any evidence that he ever intended to return to the flat to occupy it as his home, or otherwise than as a place where he might occasionally sleep as a matter of convenience."

Turning to Skinner v. Geary (1), SCRUTTON, L.J., dealt with the matter in this way ([1931] 2 K.B. 560) :

"Parliament was dealing with a tenant who was in occupation and who was not to be turned out ; it was not dealing, and never intended to deal, with a tenant who was not in occupation but who wished to say : ' Although I am not in actual occupation I claim the right so long as I pay the rent to retain my tenancy.' If that had been put forward Parliament would have received the suggestion with contempt."

Then he goes on :

"Parliament, says Mr. Safford, has not dealt with that case. In my opinion it has not done so because it never contemplated the possibility of the tenant living somewhere else. A non-occupying tenant was in my opinion never within the precincts of the Acts, which were dealing only with an occupying tenant who had a right to stay and not be turned out. This case is to be decided on the principle that the Acts do not apply to a person who is not personally occupying the house and who has no intention of returning to it. I except, of course, such a case as that to which I have already referred—namely, of temporary absence, the best instance of which is that of a sea captain who may be away for months but who intends to return, and whose wife and family occupy the house during his absence."

In the concluding paragraph of his judgment he says :

"For the reasons I have given the Act does not in my opinion apply to protect a tenant who is not in occupation of a house in the sense that the house is his home and to which, although he may be absent for a time, he intends to return. If it were to be held otherwise odd consequences would follow. The appellant in this case has contented himself with living in one house and claiming another."

Counsel for the landlords submits that this is a pure question of fact, and that, although we might have come to a different conclusion on the facts, we are bound by the facts as found by the learned county court judge. In my view, there was no evidence on which the learned judge could come to the conclusion at which he arrived, namely, that the defendant, Athanassoglou, was not in personal occupation of this flat. The facts found by the county court judge were that he habitually used it as a place in which to sleep when on business in London. His bona fides and truthfulness are not attacked. The fact that he has a house at Great Missenden which is also his home does not in any way prevent other premises which he may have occasion to use from also being his home. In another part of the judgment of SCRUTTON, L.J., in Skinner v. Geary (1) he refers to residence in a week-end cottage as being the kind of occupation which would be within the protection of the Acts. In my view, there is nothing in the Rent Restrictions Acts to prevent a man having more than one home. His business may require him at different times in the week or different times in the month to be in different parts of the country, and there is nothing to prevent him having a home in those different places. I think the learned judge has misapplied the judgment of SCRUTTON, L.J., and that on the facts as found by him there was really no evidence on which he could come to the conclusion that the defendant, Athanassoglou, was not in personal occupation of this flat. It contained his furniture, and he slept there whenever he required to do so for the purpose of his business, which was on an average twice a week, and his friends were residing there with his permission. Although I appreciate that there may be borderline cases, I think it is quite clear that the present case falls on the side of the dividing line which makes it amount to personal occupation by Mr. Athanassoglou. I have come to the conclusion that there was no evidence on which the learned judge could arrive at the decision at which he did arrive, and that this appeal should succeed.

CHAMPANHAC & CO., LTD. v. WALLER & CO., LTD.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Slade, J.), July 28, 29, 30, 1948.]

Sale of Goods—Breach of warranty—Sale by sample—"With all faults and imperfections"—Goods not up to sample—Liability of vendor.

On Apr. 14, 1947, the plaintiffs' representative, M., visited the defendants' premises and was offered for purchase a quantity of government surplus balloons. He was shown a sample of the material of which they were made, and, having examined and tested it and found it strong and merchantable, he orally agreed to purchase 200 balloons at 30s. each. The defendants' agent then drew up a letter which was handed to M., and it was found as a fact that the material terms of the concluded oral agreement were contained therein. It was stated in the letter that the goods sold were "as sample taken away" and "it is distinctly understood that these are government surplus goods and we sell them to you with all faults and imperfections." On delivery of the balloons it was discovered that the material was perished and unmerchantable. The sale having been found to be by sample :—

HELD : the inclusion in the contract of the words "with all faults and imperfections" meant that, providing the bulk corresponded in type and quality with the sample, it would be accepted with whatever faults and imperfections it had, but that the fabric of the balloons did not correspond with the sample, and, the goods not having been rejected, the plaintiffs were liable for breach of warranty.

Case referred to :

(1) Robert A. Munro & Co., Ltd. v. Meyer, [1930] 2 K.B. 312; 99 L.J.K.B. 703; 143 L.T. 565; Digest Supp.

ACTION for damages for breach of a contract for the sale of goods. The facts are set out in the headnote. Judgment was given for the plaintiffs.

Morle, K.C., and J. P. Perkins for the plaintiffs (the buyers).

Caplan for the defendants (the sellers).

SLADE, J. [after stating the facts] : I am satisfied that Mr. Marks, as agent for the plaintiffs, consented to the admission of those words "with all faults and imperfections" because he had been warned by Mr. Abrahams, the defendants' agent, that some of the goods might be dirty. If Mr. Abrahams had said : "The sample you have seen and tested you have found to be reasonably strong and merchantable, but I warn you that, by adding these words 'with all faults and imperfections,' when you get the remaining balloons you may find that they are perished and absolutely worthless," I can well imagine what Mr. Marks would have replied, but I cannot allow my mind to be influenced by these considerations, because this is an action for breach of warranty and not an action for deceit. Once the words in the concluded oral agreement had been determined, as I hold they had been because they are in substance the same as the document itself, it becomes a matter of construction as to what are the terms of the contract. It does not matter what one party had intended, i.e., what he had in his mind, or what the other party had in his mind. The test is : What are the obligations of the parties inter se in the light of the language they have used ? That is the first problem of construction. Secondly, I have to give effect, if I can, to every word and expression in the contract. Thirdly, if there were two phrases used which were repugnant to each other I might be forced to say that the contract was too vague and uncertain to be capable of interpretation. Fourthly, I am entitled to bear in mind, if all other canons of construction fail, that this document was, as I find it to be, the composition of the defendants—that is, of Mr. Abrahams on behalf of the defendants—and, if there was any ambiguity in it which was incapable of being resolved by any other form of construction, I should be entitled to resolve it in favour of the person to whom the composition of Mr. Abrahams was tendered, that is to say, the plaintiffs. I find it unnecessary to rely on this last canon of construction, because I think a meaning can be attached to each of the expressions "as sample taken away" and "with all faults and imperfections."

For many purposes there is all the difference in the world between a sale by description and a sale by sample. There are different legal consequences attaching to sales of these two kinds which are set out respectively in ss. 13 and 15 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, but they have this much in common, that one may describe the goods which one is selling by giving expression to their colour, class, quality, nature, or type, or one can say in effect : "I am not very good at expressing myself, and in any case I may leave something out. This is the type of goods that I am offering to sell you"—producing a sample.

Although that is a sale by sample, it is none the less, in my view, an offer to sell goods the bulk of which will conform to the description which is conveyed to the buyer's mind by his being tendered the sample.

I do not desire to cite a large number of authorities, but I have been referred to a decision of WRIGHT, J., in Robert A. Munro & Co., Ltd. v. Meyer (1), where goods were sold under the description of a certain specified quality, and it was a term of the contract that they should be "taken with all faults and defects; damaged or inferior, if any, at a valuation to be arranged mutually or by arbitration." That I understand to mean that if any damaged goods were tendered they were to be accepted by the buyers and any difference in value was to be adjusted by arbitration, i.e., the buyers were not entitled to reject them. The goods were bone meal, and should have contained guaranteed quantities of albuminoids 40-45 per cent., oil and/or fat 10-12 per cent., and phosphates about 30 per cent., whereas what was delivered contained a percentage of 3.66 of cocoa husks. WRIGHT, J., held that the provision that the goods should be taken with all faults and defects did not have the effect of forcing the buyer to accept, albeit at a lower price assessed by valuation, goods which were not of a certain specified quality because they contained this added percentage of cocoa husks. In other words, effect could be given to the existence in that contract of a sale by description into which the law implies the condition that the goods shall correspond with the description. That requirement was reconciled with the provision that the goods should be taken "with all faults and defects"; i.e., "all faults and defects" meant that, if and when goods of the appropriate description were tendered in performance of a contract, those goods should be taken with all faults and defects, but the buyer was not bound to accept goods which were defective in the sense that they failed to correspond with the description. That, as I have pointed out, was a sale by description. This is a sale by sample, but, in my judgment, on this point the two matters are in pari materia. Here Mr. Marks, on behalf of the plaintiffs, was induced to enter into this contract by being shown a sample which he tested and re-examined before he agreed a price. He saw, according to his evidence, that it was merchantable and "quite strong." Having found that sample strong and of merchantable quality, he agreed to buy 200 balloons with all faults and imperfections.

There are two ways of reconciling those two phrases. One is: "I will accept any goods the bulk of which corresponds to the sample, whatever faults and imperfections there turn out to be in the sample." Another way of reading them is: "I will accept goods which correspond with the sample, i.e., which are of the same nature and type of goods as those which I have been shown and on the faith of which I decided to buy, and so long as I get goods of that type and quality I will take them with any other faults and imperfections they may transpire to have." I prefer the latter of those two constructions, and that is the one I propose to hold to be the true construction of this contract, though I think the contract is also capable of being understood to reconcile the two phrases in the way which I first mentioned. I bear in mind, for example, that to comply with a sale by sample the law requires the seller to do two things: first, to deliver bulk which corresponds with the sample, and then to deliver goods which shall be free from any defect rendering them unmerchantable which would not be apparent on reasonable examination of the sample. That seems to me to show that goods may very well correspond with sample and yet have defects of which the buyer is ignorant because they do not appear on any reasonable examination of the sample, and it may well be that those words, "with all faults and imperfections," would be apt to relieve the seller in a sale by sample of the requirement that he should be liable for any defects in the sample which were not apparent on a reasonable examination, but not to exonerate him from the additional liability of delivering goods which themselves correspond with the sample.

I find as a fact that the bulk of the goods which were delivered in purported performance of this contract did not correspond with the sample. I do not think it is contested (and, if it is, I accept Mr. Marks's evidence) that the sample was strong and merchantable, and I find as a fact that the bulk as delivered was perished and unmerchantable—for all practical purposes commercially useless. In the circumstances, therefore, I find that the buyers would have had a right to reject the goods. They did not reject them. They accepted them, and, therefore, the breach of condition under the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, s. 15, becomes a breach of warranty, and the measure of damages is, in the first place, the difference in value between the goods as they were and the value which they would have had had they complied with the warranty. Secondly, as it is not denied that it was known to the sellers that the goods were bought by the plaintiffs for the purpose of re-sale, the sellers are, in my judgment, also liable for a reasonable loss of profit which the buyers have sustained by reason of having lost the contract for the re-sale of the balloons. It is not disputed that there was a contract for re-sale on the same terms, but, even if there had been no such contract, it has been shown that there was a market price for these goods, if they had been of merchantable quality, of 45s. each. The plaintiffs have still got the balloons and I must attach some value to them. Although I think that I am probably attaching a higher value to them than they, in fact, possess, I propose to assess the value of them in the plaintiffs' hands at £50. I find, therefore, that the difference in value between the goods as delivered and the goods as warranted was £300 less the £50, which is £250. I find that the contract for re-sale is evidence which I accept of the market value of the goods for the purpose of re-sale, that is to say, a profit of 15s. each. I add, therefore, another £150, and give judgment for the plaintiffs for £400 with costs.

Adoption—Guardian ad litem—Person other than Official Solicitor—“Special reasons”—Adoption of Children Act, 1926 (c. 29), s. 8 (3)—Practice Direction (see ANNUAL PRACTICE, 1941, pp. 2619, 2620).

A daughter of the applicants, aged 15 years, became pregnant and a child was born before she attained 16 years of age. At an early stage of pregnancy the family doctor was consulted and the applicants arranged for their daughter to leave home until after the birth of the child. The applicants also moved their home to another district, and after the birth of the child both the daughter and her child went to reside with them. The family doctor did not attend the daughter in the confinement, she being sent to another district. The applicants applied for an adoption order under the Adoption of Children Act, 1926, and exhibited with their affidavit in support the consent of their daughter in the usual form whereby the daughter would be deprived of all parental control over the infant. On the first hearing of the originating summons the applicants applied ex parte that the family doctor should be appointed as the guardian ad litem of the infant pursuant to s. 8 (3) of the Act of 1926, and alleged that there were special reasons why a guardian ad litem other than the Official Solicitor should be appointed.

HELD : that the matter was one of public policy and not one concerning only the family ; that the intention of the Act of 1926 was that applications should be the subject of special judicial investigation ; that the Official Solicitor was experienced in these matters ; and that he would be appointed guardian ad litem.

[AS TO ADOPTION ORDERS, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 17, p. 680, para. 1408 ; and AS TO THE APPOINTMENT OF THE OFFICIAL SOLICITOR AS GUARDIAN ad litem, see THE ANNUAL PRACTICE, 1941, pp. 2619, 2620.]

CHAMBERS SUMMONS.*

The applicants, who were the parents of a girl who had given birth to a child before she had attained the age of 16, sought an order (i) that a fit and proper person might be appointed to act as guardian ad litem of the child ; and (ii) that they might be authorised to adopt the child under the Adoption of Children Act, 1926. The parents applied ex parte that the family doctor should be appointed guardian ad litem of the infant pursuant to s. 8 (3) of the Act of 1926, and alleged that there were special reasons why a guardian ad litem other than the Official Solicitor should be appointed.

Salt, K.C., and H. E. Francis for the applicants.

ROXBURGH, J. : This application raises an important matter of principle. It has as its ultimate object the adoption of an infant. The object of the interlocutory application now made is to obtain the appointment of a fit and proper person to act as guardian ad litem of the infant. Section 8 (3) of the Act provides that :

“ For the purpose of any application under this Act and subject to any rules under this section, the court shall appoint some person or body to act as guardian ad litem of the infant upon the hearing of the application with the duty of safeguarding the interests of the infant before the court.”

When the Act first came into force it was the practice for applicants to nominate a guardian ad litem whom the court appointed, but this practice soon fell into disuse because in every case the court referred the matter to the Official Solicitor to investigate matters on behalf of the infant and to report to the court as to the fitness of the applicant, and generally as to the adoption being for the benefit of the infant. In those circumstances an independent guardian ad litem became unnecessary, and the Chancery judges gave a general direction that in all cases the Master was to appoint the Official Solicitor as guardian ad litem upon his consent, the applicant undertaking to pay his costs. The judges also directed that, if there should in any particular case appear to be special reasons for the appointment of a person other than the Official Solicitor as guardian ad litem, the matter should be adjourned to the judge. This application has been adjourned to me accordingly.

Counsel for the applicants submits that in this case there are special reasons for the appointment of a person other than the Official Solicitor. Counsel presented the case on broad principle which renders it necessary for me to say what I am about to say. The facts are that the infant is a grandchild of the applicants and the mother is an infant. Her child was conceived when she was just over 15 years of age and the father of the child is unaware of the birth of the child. The applicants are anxious to make the whole world believe that the child is no child of their daughter but of her parents. The mother is young and must be handled in a way to ascertain her views. Matters of principle are raised which are not easy of solution. It is a possible view that the mother concurrently with pregnancy developed maternal instincts. I do not know. It is possible that if she were interviewed outside the family circle she might prefer to keep the child as her own. It may be a case where it would be proper only to make an interim adoption order under the provisions of s. 6 of the Act. I cannot say as to this at this stage, but I cannot accept the submission of counsel for the applicants. It is a matter of public policy. It is not, as suggested, a matter only concerning the family which should be limited to the family and their advisers, and I think the special circumstances alleged by counsel are really circumstances in favour of the appointment of the Official Solicitor. If Parliament had meant to leave these matters to the family they would not have given this important jurisdiction to judges and other official persons. It was the intention of the Act that these applications should be the subject of special judicial investigation. The Official Solicitor is experienced in these matters. The special reasons shown in this case are in favour of his appointment.

In assessing the amount of damages to be awarded in respect of the loss of expectation of life of a child, regard must be had to the depreciation in value of money since the decision in Benham v. Gambling ([1941] 1 All E.R. 7). The cost of embalming the body is properly included in a claim for funeral expenses, but not the price of a monument.

ACTION tried by STREATFEILD, J.

The plaintiff, as administrator of the estate of his child, aged four, claimed damages under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, in respect of an accident as a result of which the child was killed. The factors which, it was held, may be taken into consideration in assessing damages are referred to in the headnote.

G. Heron and E. G. H. Beresford for the plaintiff.

A. J. Flint for the defendant.

STREATFEILD, J.: On Nov. 17, 1946, an accident occurred as a result of which the plaintiff, Harold Charles Hart, lost his little girl of four.

The first question for solution is whether it is proved that the accident was due to the negligent driving of the defendant. [HIS LORDSHIP reviewed the evidence, said that he had come to the conclusion that the accident was caused by want of care on the part of the defendant, and continued:—] The next question is what are the proper damages recoverable by the plaintiff in this action which he brings in his capacity as administrator of the estate of the child.

The first head of damages is that which is usually termed loss of expectation of life. That raises a difficult problem which during the last two years has led to considerable inconsistencies in awards both by judges and by juries. The matter has, however, become stabilised by the decision of the House of Lords in Benham v. Gambling (1). The measure of damages there laid down is, in effect, the loss of prospects of a happy life. I must also bear in mind the age of the deceased child, and the fact that she had yet to pass through the ordinary dangers of childhood, and I do not think that as large an award of damages is applicable to a child of that age. I have also to take into account the chance of the child's happiness of life. A picture has been drawn of the circumstances of this child living in what I am told by the police officer is a slum area. No doubt, the plaintiff has difficulties, now that he has been deserted by his wife, of looking after a child who has to accompany him when he goes out as a hawker. It is the best that he can do in the present circumstances, but, to my mind, it does not indicate a very happy state of affairs which, however, might have improved as time went on.

I am urged by counsel for the plaintiff in whatever sum I award to bear in mind the difference between the value of the £ in 1946, and that in 1941 when Benham v. Gambling (1) was decided. I would not be justified in awarding as much as £200 which was the award of the House of Lords to a child living in rather special circumstances, but I think counsel for the plaintiff is right in saying that some addition must be made in respect of the alteration in the value of the £. I have come to the conclusion that although I should have awarded less than £200 had I been considering like values, the depreciation of the £ justifies me in making an award under this head of £200.

One other matter I have to consider—the funeral expenses which were claimed at the figure of £39 16s. 0d. Part of that account is for the embalming of the body, and it has been suggested that that is an extravagance which should not be included in funeral expenses. I do not take that view. I think that the parents of a child who has been killed are not acting unreasonably if they have the body embalmed, and so I award the full amount of £39 16s. 0d. as claimed under the head of funeral expenses.

By way of an amendment a sum of £225 was added to the plaintiff's claim in respect of the cost of a monument to be erected over the grave of this child. It is not for me to pass judgment on people's views in spending sums on monuments over graves, although I cannot help thinking that a greater duty is owed to the living than to the dead. But I am clear that this sum is irrecoverable as funeral expenses under the Law Reform Act. My attention is drawn to Goldstein v. Salvation Army Assurance Society (2), where, it appears, the plaintiff had taken out a policy of insurance for the express purpose of providing for funeral expenses including the erection of a tombstone, and it was held by ROWLATT and MCCARDIE, JJ., that funeral expenses within the meaning of the Assurance Companies Act, 1909, included the cost of an ordinary stone or tablet on the grave. MCCARDIE, J., stated that the funeral expenses must be reasonable and proper and said ([1917] 2 K.B. 297):

"He [the judge] must remember the station in life, the occupation, and the creed of the dead person, and the general circumstances of the case, and he ought not to allow as a funeral expense anything beyond these reasonable and proper limits."

ROWLATT, J., in his judgment, stated (ibid., 295):

"It is a well-known and inveterate practice acquiesced in by everybody that a tombstone, like mourning, is not allowed as part of the funeral expenses which are deducted in estimating estate duty. But I do not think that such considerations help us much in a case like this. One must look at the object of this statute, which was to enable people to secure by insurance money wherewith to fulfil what is really a sentimental obligation."

I do not think that the construction placed on the words "funeral expenses" in the Assurance Companies Act, 1909, helps me with regard to their construction in the Law Reform Act. I have to be guided by what is reasonable. In my view, in the circumstances of this case it is wholly unreasonable when a child has been killed to expect the negligent party to pay £225 towards the erection of a monument, that having been added by way of an amendment as an afterthought to this claim. I, therefore, disallow that claim completely.

Judgment for plaintiff for £239 16s., with costs.

DANCER v. DANCER.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Ormerod, J.), June 29, 1948.]

Marriage—Banns—Due publication—Absence of fraud—True name of intended spouse—Name acquired by repute—Marriage Act, 1823 (c. 76), ss. 7, 22.

A wife, who was the legitimate daughter of Mr. and Mrs. K. was christened J.K. and registered in that name. When she was 3, her mother began to live with a man, R., and continued to do so for 14 years until he died. The wife was brought up as the child of "Mr. and Mrs. R.," was always known by the surname "R.," and was not told her real name until she was 16. Before her marriage she told her intended husband her real name and it was agreed, on the advice of the vicar, that the banns should be published in the name of R. since to use any other name would mislead the public. On a petition by the husband for the nullity of the marriage it was argued that the marriage was void since the true surname had not been given and the banns had, therefore, not been duly published as required by the Marriage Act, 1823, ss. 7 and 22.

HELD: (i) as the wife had consented to her name being stated as "R." in the banns, not with any fraudulent intention or to conceal any fact, but in order to avoid concealment, there had been due publication of banns within s. 22 of the Act of 1823;

(ii) the name of "R." had by usage become the true surname of the wife within s. 7 of the Act, and, therefore, again, there had been due publication of the banns;

(iii) consequently, the marriage was valid.

PETITION for divorce and cross petition for nullity.

A wife, Jessamine Dancer, petitioned for divorce against her husband, George Alexander Dancer, on the grounds of cruelty and adultery. The husband cross-petitioned for a decree of nullity of the marriage on the ground that there had not been a due publication of the banns. The facts appear in the judgment of ORMEROD, J., who held that there had been a valid marriage.

Simpson Pedler for the wife.

Fairweather for the husband.

Kennedy Kisch for a party cited.

ORMEROD, J. : The wife, Jessamine Dancer, seeks a decree of dissolution of marriage against her husband, George Alexander Dancer, on the grounds of his cruelty and adultery. The husband asks for a decree of nullity and also asks for a decree of dissolution by way of alternative on the ground of his wife's adultery. It has been convenient for the prayer for a decree of nullity to be dealt with before the other matters are considered.

The wife was born in 1904, and was the legitimate daughter of a Mr. and Mrs. Knight. She was christened Jessamine Knight and registered in that name. When she was born her mother had ceased to live with her father and for some two or three years after she was born her mother was in domestic service. When the wife was three years old, the mother began to cohabit with a man named Roberts. She lived with Roberts as his wife until he died on Feb. 21, 1921, during which time she gave birth to five other children, and the wife, Jessamine, was brought up as the child of the mother, Mrs. Knight, and Roberts. She said in her evidence that she was always known by the name Roberts, and it was not until she was 16 that she was told by her mother that her father was Mr. Knight. She then knew for the first time that her native name was not Roberts but Knight, and that she was not the daughter of Mr. Roberts as she had believed. She was married on Dec. 25, 1924, to the husband.

Some little time before the marriage, when the question of publishing the banns arose, there was a conversation between the wife and the husband and the wife's mother as to the name under which the wife should have the banns called. There is some little discrepancy in the evidence about how long the husband had known the real name of his intended wife, but he did know, before the banns were published, that the wife was the daughter of Knight and not of Roberts. According to the husband the wife's mother was very anxious that the banns should be published in the name of Roberts. She said, according to him, that she was drawing a widow's pension as the widow of Roberts, and if the fact became known that she was really Mrs. Knight and not the widow of Roberts, it would mean that awkward inquiries would be made about her pension. In addition, she was anxious that it should not be known in the district that her children by Roberts were not born in wedlock. That is the husband's story. The wife, on the other hand, said that her mother was drawing, not a widow's pension, but a dependant's allowance by reason of the fact that she had lived with Roberts and had been dependent on him. She said that, although her mother was anxious that the name of Roberts should be used for the sake of her children, there was no question of conditions being made or any undue pressure being put upon her. The mother was called, and she said frankly that she asked her daughter to use the name of Roberts, but that the question of the pension certainly did not arise. Then, according to the wife, she went with the husband to the vicar, and she put before the vicar the whole of the facts. She told the vicar that she was the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Knight, and also that her mother had lived with Roberts since she, the wife, was three years of age, up to the time of the death of Roberts. She said that she had always been known as Roberts, and never knew any other name until the age of 16. She said that the vicar told her that she should use the name of Roberts, that to use any other name would be to mislead the public, and that people would not know who was being married if her banns were called in the name of Knight. The husband says that he has no recollection of going down to see the vicar and he does not think he did go, and that, so far as any arrangements about the banns were concerned, they were made by the wife alone. Having heard the evidence of both parties, I am satisfied that I should accept the wife's version of the facts. I accept that there was some discussion with regard to the name the wife should use—not because the wife's mother was afraid of awkward inquiries being made about any pension she was drawing, but merely for the sake of her other children.

The question then arises whether there has been any breach of the provisions of s. 22 of the Marriage Act, 1823, on the ground that the banns have not been duly called. Section 22 is clear in its terms in that it provides that a marriage shall be “null and void to all intents and purposes whatsoever” if the parties shall “knowingly and wilfully intermarry without due publication of banns.” By s. 7 of the Act it is provided that before the banns shall be published the parties shall cause to be delivered to the parson their true Christian names and surnames, and certain other particulars. The contention of counsel for the husband is this. The “true Christian name and surname” can only mean in this case the Christian name and surname which the wife acquired at birth by reason of her parentage and by subsequent baptism and registration, that she knew of her true Christian name and surname as also did her prospective husband, and, if they allowed the banns to be published in any other way, there was no due publication of the banns. Counsel for the husband says that, if that did happen and they allowed the banns to be published in any other way, they did it knowingly and wilfully and that whether or not there was any intention of concealment on the part of the wife and husband at the time they published the banns is immaterial. There has, in fact, been a breach of the statute and the marriage must be void. Counsel for the husband cited a substantial number of authorities, which, he says, purport to bear out that view. I must adopt the argument of SIR BOYD MERRIMAN, P., in Chipchase v. Chipchase (1). That was an appeal to the Divisional Court from a decision of justices. The question arose whether the marriage was null and void because to the knowledge of both parties the wife had given a wrong name when she published the banns. In that case she gave her maiden name, although, in fact, she had been married and she also stated that she was a widow. When that case came on for hearing by the Divisional Court, the learned President sent it back for further inquiry. In his judgment he quotes the words of s. 22 of the Marriage Act, 1823, and says ([1939] P. 397):

“ ‘Provided always, that if any persons . . . shall knowingly and wilfully intermarry without due publication of banns or licence . . . the marriages of such persons shall be null and void to all intents and purposes whatsoever.’ It is required by s. 7 that the true Christian names and surname shall be given to the parson for the purpose of publication of banns. As a matter of history the cases to which our attention has been called, Rex v. Inhabitants of Tibshelf (2), and Rex v. Inhabitants of Wroxton (3), show quite plainly that the words ‘knowingly and wilfully’ were deliberately introduced into s. 22 of the Act of 1823 in order to mitigate the hardship which had arisen under the earlier Act and was exemplified by Rex v. Inhabitants of Tibshelf (2), namely, that it was quite immaterial whether the falsity in the declaration had arisen by accident or design and whether such design were fraudulent or not . . . The same appears even more clearly in the judgment of Sir JENNER FUST in Orme v. Holloway (4), where he says the construction of this Act is that, in order to set aside a marriage on the ground of undue publication of banns, it is necessary for both parties to be cognisant of the fraud ; it is necessary first to prove that there has been a fraud and, secondly, that both parties were cognisant of the fraud and knowingly and wilfully entering into the marriage without due publication of banns."

HENN COLLINS, J., was also a member of the court, and he agreed with the argument put forward by the learned President. Chipchase v. Chipchase (5) came before HENN COLLINS, J., in 1941, when he granted a decree of nullity. The reason for his doing so was that he found as a fact that the wife gave her maiden name, not because she was known by that name and that to give any other name would have been misleading, but because it served to conceal the fact that she was already married. In other words, HENN COLLINS, J., when dealing with the case when it came before him in the form of a petition for nullity, granted the decree of nullity because he found that the reason why the wife gave her maiden name was that she wished to conceal the true facts—that is, she did not give her maiden name for the purpose of avoiding concealment—and that in those circumstances there was an infraction of the statute. In the present case, I am satisfied that the wife, when she went to the vicar and gave the name by which she had been known since the age of three, did it deliberately, not in any sense to conceal her origin or her identity, but to avoid concealment. She adopted the advice of the vicar, which was : "If you give the name of Knight, no one will know anything at all about you. If you give the name of Roberts, which is the name by which you have always been known in this parish and everywhere else, then everyone will know who it is who is being married." On that advice and with the intention of avoiding any form of concealment, she allowed her name to go forward in the banns as Roberts. In those circumstances, if I adopt the argument of the learned President in Chipchase v. Chipchase (1), I am satisfied that this is a case where there has been no undue publication of banns.

Counsel for the husband has cited a number of cases where a marriage has been declared null and void because some name other than the original name of one of the parties has been given, but in each one of them there has been, in a greater or less degree, an element of fraud or concealment in some form or other. In Small v. Small (6), which is probably most in favour of counsel's contention, the only concealment at which one of the parties was aiming was the fact that he was a deserter from the Royal Field Artillery and had enlisted in another name in another regiment. In those circumstances it may well be that he was anxious to be married in his adopted name to avoid arrest. In Tooth v. Barrow (7), which was also cited, it is clear that the prospective wife adopted a name other than the name by which she had always been known for the specific purpose of preventing people in the district knowing that she was the person who was going to be married. Again, in Wormald v. Wormald (8), a false name was deliberately given because the girl who was going to be married wanted to prevent that fact being known. In the present case I am satisfied that there was no intention to deceive or intention to conceal, and that, having regard to the judgment of the learned President in Chipchase v. Chipchase (1), must be an end of the matter.

There is one further question with which I should deal. Section 7 of the Marriage Act, 1823, provides that the true Christian names and surnames should be delivered to the vicar at the time the banns are published. Therefore, the question arises—even supposing that the question of concealment or lack of concealment were not a matter to be considered in the interpretation of s. 22—whether or not the wife did give her true Christian name and surname to the vicar at the time when the banns were published. As to the Christian name, of course, there could be no doubt, because she was baptised and registered in that name, the banns were called and she was married in the name of Jessamine. The real question then, is whether the name of Knight or the name of Roberts is her true surname, and what is the meaning of the word "true." It is clear in this case that she was born in wedlock and that her parents' name was Knight, but it is equally true that from the time she remembers anything at all she was known as Roberts, and up to the age of 16 she did not know that she had any other name. It is abundantly clear that she had never any intention of being known—apart from marriage—by any other name than Roberts, that Roberts was the name by which she was generally known, even at school, the name she would sign on any documents on which her name had to be inscribed. In those circumstances, the question arises whether her true name is the name which came to her at birth or the name which became hers by a usage which was so common and complete that it would not be reasonable to say now that her true name was other than Roberts. My attention was drawn by counsel for the husband to Sullivan v. Sullivan (9) which was decided long before 1823 when the Marriage Act was passed. My attention was particularly drawn to that part of the judgment of SIR WILLIAM SCOTT dealing with the difficulty of knowing what is a true name and whether a name can be acquired by repute. The judgment, first, deals with illegitimate children and whether they have the surname of the mother or acquire other names by repute as time goes on, and then he said ((1818), 2 Hag. Con. 253) :

"However, if they are much tossed about in the world, in a great variety of obscure fortunes, as such persons frequently are, it may be difficult to say for certain what name they have permanently acquired, as was the case in Wakefield v. Mackay (10). In general it may be said, that where there is a name of baptism and a native surname, those are the true names, unless they have been overridden by the use of other names assumed and generally accredited."

There is no doubt in the present case that the name of baptism, and the native surname—which in the absence of other conditions would be the true names—are the names of Jessamine Knight, but I am completely satisfied—to adopt the words of this judgment—that the name of Knight has now been overridden by the use of another name, the name of Roberts, which has been assumed and has been generally accredited.

I am satisfied that, even if the question of concealment did not enter into the interpretation of s. 22, on the interpretation of s. 7 of the Act I should be bound to say that the true name of this wife, in the sense that it was a name which had been assumed for her and by her, and by which she had been generally known throughout the whole of her conscious life, was the name of Roberts, which was the name by which her banns were called prior to her marriage. In those circumstances, it would be impossible to say that there was not due publication of the banns in this case, and, therefore, the plea on the cross-petition must fail.

THE TOWERFIELD. OWNERS OF THE S.S. TOWERFIELD v. WORKINGTON HARBOUR AND DOCK BOARD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Scott, Bucknill and Asquith, L.JJ.), April 6, 7, 8, 9, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, May 25, 27, July 9, 1948.]

Harbour—Pilot—Compulsory pilot—Negligence—Contributory negligence—Ship running aground—Negligence of harbour board—How far negligence of pilot a defence to harbour board—Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847 (c. 27), s. 74—Pilotage Act, 1913 (c. 31), s. 15.

In 1931, the W. Harbour Board notified the maritime public, by means of an inset in the appropriate Admiralty chart and by means of notices to mariners, of the facilities afforded to shipping by their harbour on payment of dues and charges. From 1933 onwards the chart bore under the heading "Dredged Depths," the words "In the approach channel and turning basin within the pecked lines a depth of 4½ ft. at chart datum is maintained by dredging (1933)," which meant, in effect, that the depth of the channel was maintained at the level of the dock sill. On Oct. 19, 1941, s.s. Towerfield, having a draft of 23 ft. forward and 24 ft. aft, arrived off W. Harbour, and took on the compulsory Trinity House pilot. High water was at 11.8 a.m. producing a predicted depth of 30 ft. lin. at the dock sill. The pilot, after boarding the vessel received a message from the harbour-master that the harbour tug was not available to assist in bringing the Towerfield into the dock, but the pilot decided nevertheless to bring her in. At 11.10 a.m. the Towerfield crossed the bar and steamed up the channel at 3 knots, and after going about 400 yards grounded on the north side of the channel. She subsequently broke her back. The shipowners claimed damages from the harbour board in respect of (1) breach of the board's duty imposed by statute and at common law to take reasonable precautions that the approaches to the port were safe or to give warning that no such care had been exercised, and (2) breach of contract or warranty that the condition of the harbour was in accordance with the Admiralty chart. The harbour board counterclaimed for damage to the harbour on the ground that it was due to the negligence of those in charge of the Towerfield, and also under the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847. It was accepted by a majority of the Court of Appeal that the pilot had been told by the harbour-master to keep to the north of the centre line of the channel, and that he had complied with that instruction. The harbour board had given no information either to the shipowners or the pilot as to the state of the channel at the place where the Towerfield went aground (which was within the channel as marked by the line of the northern dredging marks), nor had dredging been carried on continuously in order to keep the port open.

The Pilotage Act, 1913, s. 15, provides: "(1) Notwithstanding anything in any public or local Act, the owner or master of a vessel navigating under circumstances in which pilotage is compulsory shall be answerable for any loss or damage caused by the vessel or by any fault of the navigation of the vessel in the same manner as he would if pilotage were not compulsory."

HELD: (by SCOTT and ASQUITH, L.JJ.): (i) section 15 (1) of the Act of 1913 should be read as strictly limited to actions in tort and should be applied to such actions as the present whether the ship was defendant or plaintiff, but, even if the effect of s. 15 (1) was to make the shipowner responsible for the conduct of the pilot to exactly the same extent as if he were the servant of the shipowner and if the pilot had been negligent (which, on the facts, he had not), the defendants could not avail themselves of their own wrong, namely, the breach of their common law duty to inform users of the channel of its condition, and, therefore, the defence of contributory negligence failed;

(ii) the same considerations disposed of any charge against the ship-owner of a breach by him of his implied promise to navigate in the channel with care and skill;

(iii) possibly the same facts might be expressed as an estoppel of the defendants by their implied representation to the shipowner and pilot alike that they knew of no obstruction to prevent the ship passing quite close to the north side of the channel.

(by BUCKNILL, L.J.): (i) in view of the terms of s. 15 (1) of the Pilotage Act, 1913, the plaintiffs' claim failed, so far as it was based in tort, since the stranding of the ship was partly caused by the contributory negligence of the pilot;

(ii) the defendants failed in their counter-claim since s. 74 of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847, did not apply where damage to the property of a harbour authority was wholly or partly due to the negligence of the authority.

APPEAL from an order of WILLMER, J., dated May 23, 1947.

The owners of the s.s. Towerfield claimed damages against the Workington Harbour Board in respect of (1) a breach of the defendants' duty imposed on them by statute and at common law to take reasonable precautions that the approaches to the port and harbour of Workington were safe, or to give warning that no such care had been exercised, and (2) a breach of contract or warranty by the defendants that the condition of their harbour was in accordance with a statement inserted at their request on the appropriate Admiralty chart from 1933 onwards, as a result of which on Oct. 19, 1941, the Towerfield ran aground on the northern side of the channel to a dock in the defendants' harbour. The defendants counterclaimed in respect of damage to the harbour.

At the time of the occurrence the two leading marks or beacons did not mark the centre of the dredged channel as indicated on the Admiralty chart. They were so placed that at their actual site on land they were 78ft. to the southward of two dredging marks and 169ft. to the northward of two other dredging marks. The line of the north dredging marks when protracted was not in alignment with the line of the leading marks, but was slightly divergent from it, so that at the place of stranding there was 98ft. instead of 78ft. between the two extended lines. On the morning of Oct. 19, the weather was clear with a strong south-westerly breeze, and the tides were spring and making. High water was at 11.8 a.m. with a predicted rise of tide producing a depth of 30ft. in. on the dock sill at high water. The actual depth on the sill was 31ft. 6ins. The Towerfield was a steel screw ship of 4,241 tons gross register, 373ft. long and 52.4ft. beam, and at the time of her stranding was laden. Her draft was 23ft. forward and 24ft. aft.

Pilotage was compulsory for the Towerfield and she was boarded by a Trinity House pilot, Craig. After Craig had reached the Towerfield, he received a message from the harbour-master that the defendants' harbour tug was not available to help to navigate the ship into the dock owing to boiler trouble. The captain of the Towerfield had never entered Workington Harbour before, and said that he relied on the pilot's local knowledge when accepting his decision to bring the ship in. He also pointed out in evidence that there was nothing on the inset of Workington Harbour printed on the Admiralty Chart No. 1346 to indicate that there would be any difficulty in navigating the ship up the channel. Neither Craig nor any agent of the defendants warned the captain of any silting up in the channel which substantially reduced its width. At 11.10 a.m., half an hour after another vessel, the s.s. Ashbury, which had a draft of 22ft. in. had safely negotiated the channel, the Towerfield crossed the bar at the seaward end of the south pier, and steamed up the channel at a speed of about 3 knots. After going about 400yds. she grounded on the north side of the channel about 500 yds. from the entrance to the Prince of Wales Dock. On the ebb tide she broke her back. After she had settled aground, the ship was angled 7 degrees to port of the line of the channel. Her starboard bilge amidships was 42ft. to the northward of the line of the leading marks. This put the ship's port side about 94ft. from the line of the leading marks and 4ft. on the channel side of the line of the north dredging marks at the place of stranding. The plaintiffs contended that the ship was in the fairway of the dredged channel, and that she was entitled to navigate anywhere within the dredged channel in the absence of any warning by the harbour board of any obstruction.

The court put the following questions to the assessors : (1) Was it good seamanship, apart from any knowledge of the pilot of any obstruction on the north bank, or knowledge of the probability of any such bank, for him to navigate the ship abeam of the Bush Perch 4ft. south of the north dredging marks and with her port side 94ft. to the north of the leading marks, giving due weight to the notice as to the dredging given in inset to chart, and, to the predicted rise of tide on a.m. tide of Oct. 19, to the fact that there was a freshet, and that the dredged channel south of the leading marks was limited to a width of about 80ft., and that he had no tug, and wind strong south-westerly breeze ? (Answer) : No. (2) Assuming that the pilot knew of the tendency of a bank both to form and to dissipate on the north edge of the dredged channel near the Bush Perch, under the influence of the freshet, and that he had no positive knowledge whether such bank was there or not on Oct. 19, was it good seamanship to bring the Towerfield up in the position set out in question 1 ? (Answer) : No. (3) Assuming the state of mind of the pilot as set out in question 2, in what position in the channel did good seamanship require him to bring the ship up with reference to the leading marks when abeam of the Bush Perch, bearing in mind the factors set out in question 1? (Answer): To bring her up with the centre line of the ship very slightly north of the leading marks. (4) What additional precautions did good seamanship require from the pilot, having regard to the factors set out in question 1? (Answer): To watch the steering very carefully so as to counteract promptly the effects of the wind on the position of the ship in the channel and the effects of the freshet on her heading. (5) In your view could the Towerfield, on Oct. 19, have entered the port in safety and without difficulty if she had come up on the leading marks? (Answer): No. There would be an element of risk in coming in without a tug with a fresh or strong south-westerly wind particularly as there were no stakes or buoys to mark the edge of the navigable channel, which was very narrow for so large a ship. A ship cannot steer on a completely straight line. (6) In your view was the only safe method for the Towerfield to come up the channel on the morning of Oct. 19, to keep to the line of the leading marks having regard to the factors set out in question 1? (Answer): No method was quite safe, but the best would be to come up with the centre line of the ship very slightly north of the leading marks as stated in answer No. 3. (7) Would it have been good seamanship having regard to the factors set out in questions 1 and 2 for the pilot to bring the ship up the channel 50 to 60ft. south of the Bush Perch? (Answer): No. Except by keeping close to the leading marks there was no reliable method of judging the distance of the Bush Perch.

WILLMER, J., held that the pilot, Craig, was negligent and that his negligence was the sole cause of the stranding. The Court of Appeal, by a majority, held that the shipowners succeeded both on their claim in contract and on their claim in tort, and that the counterclaim failed.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 9. The following judgments were read.

BUCKNILL, L.J. [having considered the facts, the evidence as to the state of the channel, and the answers of the assessors]: I accept the answers of our assessors and agree with the conclusion of WILLMER, J., that Craig was negligent in his pilotage of the Towerfield. In my opinion, the stranding and damage were partly caused by such negligence. The question then arises whether Craig's negligence bars the claim of the shipowners against the defendants in respect of their breach of duty, even if they are able to establish that the defendants partly caused the stranding by breach of duty and negligence on their part. I, therefore, now proceed to consider whether there was such breach of duty and negligence. [HIS LORDSHIP discussed the conclusions of WILLMER, J., and the contentions of counsel and continued:] In my opinion, it was the duty of the defendants to call the attention of those in charge of the Towerfield to certain matters which were within their special knowledge and which gravely increased the risk to the Towerfield when navigating their harbour. These matters are: (1) Their failure to take any soundings in the channel since Sept. 22; (2) the fact that the dredger had done no work on the north side of the channel since Oct. 9; (3) the fact that the channel navigable for the Towerfield on Oct. 19 was only 155ft. wide. The judge has found that the defendants' sounding plans were not exhibited for the pilots to see, although the harbour-master in his statement said that he always informed the pilots as to the results of his soundings and produced his sounding charts to them at his conferences with them, usually in the pilots' cabin. There is no evidence as to when or by whom Craig was told that the Towerfield would be coming to Workington or what her approximate draught would be, or that the Ashbury would be docking on the same tide. Craig lived at Maryport. There is no evidence as to how often he was piloting ships at Workington in the last few weeks before Oct. 19, but we know he was there on Oct. 6, 7 and 17, and he had a look at the channel at low water on those days from the south side. In my opinion, the breach of duty of the defendants in failing to inform those in charge of the Towerfield (and I include Craig among them) of these matters concerning the navigation of the channel on Oct. 19 contributed to the stranding of the Towerfield.

The principles laid down by the Court of Appeal in The Eurymedon (2) which were referred to with approval by LORD SIMON in his speech in the House of Lords in The Boy Andrew v. St. Rognvald (3) ([1947] 2 All E.R. 354), seem to me to support this conclusion. If one applies the propositions stated by GREER, L.J., in that case, it seems to me that the breach of duty of the defendants in this case, of which the judge has rightly found them guilty, continued right up to the moment of stranding. Moreover, I think the breach of duty of the defendants in allowing a large bank to accumulate in the southern part of the dredged channel contributed to the negligent mistake of the pilot in navigating too far to the northward of the leading marks.

So far as the plaintiffs' claim in tort is concerned, the position, therefore, is that the damage to the ship was partly caused by the negligent navigation of the ship by her compulsory pilot, and partly caused by the negligence and breach of duty of the defendants. If Craig is to be considered as a voluntary pilot and as agent of the shipowner while in charge of the navigation of the ship when the shipowner is not only resisting but also when making a claim, then in 1941 the claim of the plaintiffs would fail at common law, on the ground of Craig's contributory negligence, but here a difficult question arises whether Craig was the agent of the shipowner by virtue of the Pilotage Act, 1913, s. 15, in connection with a claim by the shipowner as well as against him, or whether that Act merely imposes a liability on the shipowner for damage caused by the negligent navigation of the ship and leaves him in the same position as he was before the Act was passed so far as claims made by him for breach of duty or contract by a third party are concerned.

The Pilotage Act, 1913, s. 15, provides :

"Notwithstanding anything in any public or local Act, the owner or master of a vessel navigating under circumstances in which pilotage is compulsory shall be answerable for any loss or damage caused by the vessel or by any fault of the navigation of the vessel in the same manner as he would if pilotage were not compulsory."

These words, by imposing on the shipowner a liability for the negligence of a pilot whom he is bound to employ, departed from the principle of the common law, and it may be urged with some force that its application should not be extended beyond the strict interpretation of its terms. The word "answerable" may be said to indicate that the section is dealing with a claim which has to be answered, and that the general tenor of the words indicates a claim by a third party for injury sustained by him through the faulty navigation of the vessel whilst in charge of a compulsory pilot. One of the objects of the section was to get rid of compulsory pilotage as a defence in order to bring the law of England into line with the laws of other nations. The Pilotage Act, 1913, s. 15 (2), enacts that the section shall not take effect until Jan. 1, 1918, or such earlier date as His Majesty may fix by Order in Council certifying that it is necessary to bring the section into operation in order to enable His Majesty to comply with an international convention. The convention therein referred to is the International Convention for the Unification of certain Rules of Law respecting Collisions signed at Brussels on Sept. 23, 1910 (Cmd. 5558). Article 5 of that Convention provided that :

"The liability imposed by the preceding articles attaches in cases where the collision is caused by the fault of a pilot, even when the pilot is carried by compulsion of law."

See DIGBY AND COLE PILOTAGE LAW (1913), appendix II, p. 86. It will be noted that the word used in the Convention is "liable" not "answerable." The use of the word "answerable" in sub-s. (1) of s. 15 is probably explained by reference to sub-s. (3) of the section which is in the following terms: "As from the date of the coming into operation of this section, the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 633, shall cease to have effect." That section declared that an owner should not be answerable to any person whatever for any loss or damage occasioned by the fault or incapacity of a compulsory pilot. In other words, the Pilotage Act, 1913, s. 15 (1), was intended to repeal the law as stated in the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 633.

So far as I know, it has never been argued either in the Admiralty Court or in the Commercial Court during the 30 years that have passed since 1918 that the object of s. 15 was not to get rid of compulsory pilotage altogether as a defence. In other words it has always been assumed that s. 15 (1) put on the shipowner the same responsibility for the acts of a compulsory pilot as he had always had for the acts of a voluntary pilot, namely "a contractual relation of service, to which the maxim of respondet superior directly applies," as LORD ATKINSON said in his speech in The Beechgrove (4) ([1916] 1 A.C. 383). This question before us turns on the meaning of the words of s. 15 (1), and having regard to the fact that those words are apparently taken from the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 633, it is, I think, permissible to see what interpretation has been put upon the words of s. 633. In The Adam W. Spies (5) the owners of a ship made a claim against the owner of the tug towing the ship for damage caused to the ship by the tug's negligence. SIR FRANCIS JEUNE, P., held that the damage was partly caused by the tug's negligence and partly by the negligence of the pilot in charge of the tow, who, the owners of the tow asserted, was a compulsory pilot, and expressed the view that, if the pilot was a compulsory pilot, the owners of the tow could recover all their damage from the tug owner on the ground that the owners of the ship would not be affected by the contributory negligence of the pilot. He said (70 L.J.P. 25):

"I have no doubt . . . that if it can be shown that the contributory negligence alleged was the negligence of the compulsory pilot, then that would be an answer on the part of the owners of the ship, and that they would not be affected by that contributory negligence, but would, notwithstanding it, be able to make good their claim for the negligence of the tug . . . It is true, as has been pointed out by counsel for the plaintiffs, that the wording of s. 633 [of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894] points rather to a defence to an action brought against the ship for damages than to an answer to a defence of contributory negligence, but the words appear to me to be sufficiently broad to cover both cases. If the owner or master of a ship is not answerable to any person whatever for any loss or damage sustained by the fault of the compulsory pilot, then he cannot be answerable whether the question arises as one of contributory negligence or as a direct allegation of negligence against the ship."

Section 633 of the Act of 1894 replaced and re-enacted the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, s. 388. That section is placed under a heading "Saving of owners and masters rights" and is as follows:

"No owner or master of any ship shall be answerable to any person whatever for any loss or damage occasioned by the fault or incapacity of any qualified pilot acting in charge of such ship, within any district where the employment of such pilot is compulsory by law."

In The Hector (6) a collision occurred between the Hector and the Augustus through the joint negligence of both ships. The Hector was in charge of a compulsory pilot. BRETT, M.R., in the course of his judgment said (8 P.D. 225):

"If s. 388 of 17 & 18 Vic. c. 104, alone governed the law, I should hold that the Hector was entitled to succeed as to the whole. That is the logical consequence."

Here again these words seem to indicate that the words "answerable to any person whatever" included claims made by the owner of the ship which was in charge of a compulsory pilot.

The Act of 1854 replaced the Pilotage Act, 1825, s. 55 of which enacted that :

"... no owner or master of any ship or vessel shall be answerable for any loss or damage which shall happen to any person or persons whomsoever from or by reason or means of any neglect, default, incompetency or incapacity of any licensed pilot acting in the charge of any such ship or vessel, under or in pursuance of any of the provisions of this Act, where and so long as such pilot shall be duly qualified to have the charge of such ship or vessel, or where and so long as no duly qualified pilot shall have offered to take charge thereof."

In The Maria (7), a collision between the British vessel Websters and the Prussian vessel Maria, the owners of the Websters sued the Maria, who in her defence alleged that she was under the charge of a duly licensed pilot, taken on board under the provisions of the Newcastle Pilot Act, 1801, s. 6, and that, by virtue of that Act and also of the Pilotage Act, 1825, s. 55, even if the damage had been occasioned by her the owners were not responsible. There was no counter-claim because the Maria also alleged that the collision was due to the negligence of a third ship. DR. LUSHINGTON, in the course of his judgment, said (1 Wm. Rob. 99) :

"Now the leading principle of the legislature in exonerating owners from any damage occasioned by their vessels having pilots on board, is this ; that the masters are compellable to take such pilots on board, and the owners are not responsible for the acts of persons to whom they are thus forced to commit the management of their property, and over whom they have no control. This, I apprehend, is a rule founded on a great principle of justice and equity."

Later on in the same judgment DR. LUSHINGTON said (ibid., 106, 111) :

"... I am of opinion, that independently of the express provisions of these statutes [52 Geo. 3, c. 39, s. 30, and 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, s. 55] the compulsory taking of a pilot does upon general principles relieve the owner from all responsibility for his acts . . . upon general principle, a man is answerable for the acts of his servants, for injuries done by them to others within the scope of their employment ; and why ? Because he selects them, and the selection is voluntary. But if a man is compelled to employ another, the principle upon which liability depends wholly fails . . . The opinion I have thus formed in this case is founded upon the general principles of reason and justice ; that no one should be chargeable with the acts of another who is not an agent of his own election and choice."

The judgment was approved by LORD BUCKMASTER in The Beechgrove (4) ([1916] 1 A.C. 379), where he accepted as accurate the principle that :

"... where the master is bound by Act of Parliament under a penalty to place his ship in the charge of a pilot, and he does so in compliance with the provisions of such Act, the ship is not to be considered as under the management of the owners or their servants."

The Act of 1825 replaced the Pilotage Act, 1812 (52 Geo. 3, c. 39), s. 30 of which enacted that :

"... no owner or master of any ship or vessel shall be answerable for any loss or damage, nor shall any owner or owners of any ship or vessel or consignee of goods, be prevented from recovering any loss or damage upon any contract of insurance of the same, or upon any other contract relating to any ship or vessel, or any cargo on board the same, for or by reason or means of any neglect, default, incompetency or incapacity of any pilot taken on board of any such ship or vessel, under or in pursuance of any of the provisions of this Act."

This Act continued with alterations and amendments an Act of 48 Geo. 3, c. 104, passed in 1808 and to be in force for four years. The Act of 1808 contained no reference to exemption of liability in respect of the acts of a compulsory pilot. In Carruthers v. Sydebotham (8) the plaintiff was the owner of goods on board the Alexander and he insured them with the defendant against loss by stranding, unless caused by the misconduct of the master and mariners. Owing to the negligence of a pilot in charge of the ship the goods were damaged by stranding. The court held that the plaintiff could recover from the assured. It was contended for the defendant that the plaintiff could not recover because the pilot was the servant of the master. Judgment was given for the plaintiff and in the course of it LORD ELLENBOROUGH, C.J., said ((1815), 4 M. & S. 85):

"... if the master cannot navigate without a pilot except under a penalty, is he not under the compulsion of law to take a pilot? And if so, is it just that he should be answerable for the misconduct of a person, whose appointment the provisions of the law have taken out of his hands, placing the ship in the hands and under the conduct of the pilot? The consequence is, that there is no privity between them. In general, if there be a damage arising from a marine peril, unless that damage be induced by the act of the master, or mariners, or owners of the ship, it is a damage within the scope of the policy. Here has been a stranding which has occasioned an average loss, for which the underwriter will be responsible unless it has been occasioned by the party's own act. And how can that be, unless the act of the pilot who is imposed upon the master by law, is to be considered as his act? It appears to me, therefore, that the underwriter is liable; because this does not fall within the description of a damage that has been caused by the act of the assured themselves, but by the act of the pilot, between whom and the assured there was no privity."

DR. LUSHINGTON in The Maria (7) commented on the similarity of the two sections in the Acts of 1812 and 1825 and did not refer to the fact that that part of the section in the Act of 1812 which dealt with claims for breach of contract had been omitted. This leads me to think that these words as to recovery of damage caused by a compulsory pilot were omitted in s. 55 of the Act of 1825, because they were regarded as unnecessary, in that the word "answerable" was intended to cover all claims both by and against persons in which the conduct of the compulsory pilot was a contributory cause of the damage.

The Maritime Conventions Act, 1911, s. 1 (i), enacts that, where by the fault of two or more vessels damage or loss is caused to one or more of those vessels, to their cargoes or freight or to any property on board, the liability to make good the damage or loss shall be in proportion to the degree in which each vessel was in fault. Where damage is caused to ship A by the fault of ships A and B and the fault of A is that of her compulsory pilot (as happened in The Hector (6)), it seems that this section intends the liability to make good the damage to A to fall on the owners of A and the owners of B in proportion to the degree in which each vessel was at fault. To hold that the owner of A could recover the whole of his damage from the owner of B because A was in charge of a compulsory pilot seems to be inconsistent with the sub-section. It is true that para. (c) of the proviso to the section states that nothing in the section shall be construed as imposing any liability from which he is exempted by any provision of law. Such an exemption from liability, no doubt, would arise in the case of compulsory pilotage before the Pilotage Act, 1913, s. 15, came into force. After the Pilotage Act, 1913, was passed, it seems to me contrary to the object of the Maritime Conventions Act, 1911, if the proviso to s. 1 is construed so as to entitle the shipowner to exemption from the burden of paying for part of the damage to his ship when his ship was partly to blame through the negligence of her compulsory pilot.

The interpretation of s. 15 of the Pilotage Act, 1913, was considered in Thom v. Owners of S.S. Smerdis (9), in which the First Division of the Inner House held that the compulsory pilot of the defendant's ship was the fellow servant of the chief engineer of that ship and that the defendant was, therefore, not liable for the death of the chief engineer through the negligence of the compulsory pilot. The case does not touch directly on the point now under consideration, namely, whether "answerable" includes a claim made by the shipowner against a third party for damage to which his compulsory pilot's negligence has contributed, but the Inner House did lay down the broad proposition that s. 15 made the compulsory pilot the servant of the shipowner. LORD PRESIDENT CLYDE summed up the effect of the section at the conclusion of his judgment in the following words (1925 Sc.L.T. 242):

"... the liability artificially made to rest on the owners must be taken with all the legal qualifications attaching to it, and the defence of collaborateur is one of them."

One of the "legal qualifications" is surely the responsibility for the contributory negligence of the pilot when it has partly caused the damage sued for.

In my opinion, therefore, the plaintiffs' claim fails, so far as it is based in tort against the defendants, on the ground that the stranding of the ship was partly caused by the negligence of the pilot, who must be regarded as a voluntary pilot for the purpose of the plaintiffs' claim. The fact that the defendants were also guilty of negligence contributing to the stranding will not avail the plaintiffs so far as this part of their claim is concerned, for under the rule of the common law in 1941 contributory negligence by the plaintiffs completely barred the claim.

[HIS LORDSHIP then considered the plaintiffs' claim for breach of contract or warranty, held that that claim failed, and continued:—] I must now consider the defendants' counterclaim. The defendants argued in support of their counterclaim that, even if they committed a breach of duty which contributed to the damage sustained by them, nevertheless they were entitled to recover it from the owners of the Towerfield by virtue of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847, s. 74 (which was incorporated in their Acts), if the owners of the Towerfield were also negligent, and their negligence contributed to the defendants' damage. The material words of s. 74 for the purposes of this case are:

"The owner of every vessel . . . shall be answerable to the undertakers for any damage done by such vessel . . . or by any person employed about the same, to the harbour, dock, or pier, . . . and the master or person having the charge of such vessel . . . through whose wilful act or negligence any such damage is done shall also be liable to make good the same . . . provided always, that nothing herein contained shall extend to impose any liability for any such damage upon the owner of any vessel, where such vessel shall at the time when such damage is caused be in charge of a duly licensed pilot whom such owner or master is bound by law to employ and put his vessel in charge of."

In The Mostyn (10) the defendants' ship damaged the plaintiffs' property and the plaintiffs then claimed under the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847, s. 74, from the defendants in respect of this damage. The House of Lords, reversing the Court of Appeal, held that the damage was not caused by any negligence on the part of the defendants, but that the plaintiffs could recover their damage from them. The question whether the section applied to damage partly or wholly due to the negligence of the plaintiffs did not, therefore, arise, but two passages in the judgments bear on the position of the defendants if they were negligent. In the House of Lords, LORD HALDANE, after pointing out that the general words of the section did not cover a case where the event causing damage occurred by the Act of God or the Sovereign's enemies, added ([1928] A.C. 64): "It would have been equally difficult to hold that there was liability if the damage had been caused by the action of the undertakers themselves." The other passage is in the judgment of SARGANT, L.J., in the Court of Appeal, and is as follows ([1927] P. 47):

"I may perhaps add that the case which was recently decided by ROCHE, J., as to contributory negligence and as to the owners or undertakers of a dock not being able to succeed where there was contributory negligence on their part, was in my opinion correctly decided. That case recognises that in another respect a limitation may have to be imposed upon the absolute liability apparently provided by the statute."

The case referred to is Det Forenede Dampskibs Selskab v. Barry Ry. Co. (11), in which while the plaintiffs' ship was being moved in the defendants' dock by the defendants' tug she collided with and did damage to the property of the defendants. The defendants claimed compensation from the plaintiffs in respect of that damage under the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847, s. 74, which was incorporated in their statutory powers. ROCHE, J., found that the damage was caused, not by the neglect of anybody on board the ship or employed by the plaintiffs, but by the neglect of persons employed by the defendants. ROCHE, J., decided that in those circumstances the defendants' claim failed for the following reasons. He said ([1919] Ll.L.R. 659):

"I am satisfied that in these circumstances this section does not apply so as to enable the employers of the negligent person to recover from the shipowners, and I am satisfied that that is so, not merely by the reading of the section, but by the application of the section, and that nobody can take advantage or avail themselves of the wrong for which they are themselves responsible. If the company themselves gave rise to the cause of the damage done through the ship, they are assisting, as in the present case, and, in my judgment, they cannot . . . recover damages caused by neglect on their own side."

Counsel for the defendants argued that the process of reasoning applied by ROCHE, J., in the Barry Ry. case (11) did not apply where the shipowner is partly to blame, and the dock company is also partly to blame, because in such a case it is not necessary for the dock company to assert its own wrong in order to recover for the damage partly due to the negligence of the shipowner. He argued that the true principle underlying the decision in the Barry Ry. case (11) was that the Barry Railway's claim should be dismissed to avoid circuitry of action. Any sum recovered by them against the shipowner would be added to the shipowner's claim against the railway company in respect of their negligence. This, however, would not be so if the shipowner was also negligent because by the rule of the common law before 1945 his claim would be defeated by his own contributory negligence. I think the answer to this attractive argument is that s. 74 of the Act of 1847 does not apply to damage done to the harbour authority's property if it is wholly or partly caused by their negligence. It seems to me that the principle laid down by ROCHE, J., in a case where the damage is solely due to the negligence of the harbour authority, should also apply where the defendant's negligence has partly caused the damage. To allow the harbour authority to recover their damage in such circumstances would infringe the rule to which ROCHE, J., referred that nobody can take advantage of the wrong for which they are themselves solely or partly responsible. That was the rule of the common law before Parliament modified it by applying the Admiralty rule as to division of loss, and I think it should be the rule in a case where a claim is made under s. 74 of the Act of 1847.

For these reasons, in my opinion, the claim of the plaintiffs fails, the counterclaim of the defendants also fails, and the judgment of the trial judge should be varied accordingly.

SCOTT, L.J. : This is the judgment of ASQUITH, L.J., and myself. Knowing that BUCKNILL, L.J., was going to make a full statement of all the main facts of the case, we have not attempted to cover the same ground as he covered, and, for that reason, we asked him to deliver the first judgment. In so far as we differ materially in any respect—and we do on some—we endeavour hereafter to make clear how and why we do so. It is with diffidence, however, that we dissent either from him or from WILLMER, J.

This is an exceptionally difficult case. With our brother BUCKNILL's statement of the facts we are in general agreement, and do not attempt any detailed re-statement of the facts of our own. We note the answers of our assessors on the questions of seamanship which we put to them, but do not regard them as concluding the further question of negligence. No doubt, the difference between bad and good seamanship usually disposes of the issue of blame or no blame, but that consequence is not automatic. Decision on all questions of mere fact rests with the court, and in this appeal the issue of negligent navigation is exceptionally dependant on the particular facts as found by us. It is for the court to find negligence and not for its assessors, whose function is limited to giving expert evidence. In our questions to them we were careful not to invite, or, indeed, to leave, any opening for any expression of opinion by our assessors in the court's exclusive field, although we suspect that, had they been asked, they would have said that the pilot's choice of course up channel was an error of judgment and not negligence. In the result, after anxious consideration, we have come to the conclusion that the harbour board are precluded from alleging that the grounding of the ship was caused by what appeared to our assessors to be bad seamanship and to the learned judge to be negligence on the part of the pilot, by the board's own failure to convey to the pilot essential and crucial information which it was their duty to convey to him in relation to the maintenance by themselves of the navigable channel, for, by so failing, they misled him into taking the course up the channel which he did take. Indeed, the legal position may be stated in an even more direct and positive form. Negligence consists in taking action which the actor ought, in all the relevant circumstances of the case, to have foreseen was likely to cause harm. In the present case we are satisfied that had the board given the pilot certain information, of which it was fully aware, it would beyond all doubt have caused him to give the north bank just that slightly wider berth which would have prevented the stranding.

[HIS LORDSHIP dealt with the special circumstances considered in reviewing WILLMER, J.'s attribution of blame to the pilot, and continued :—] We are of the opinion, for reasons which follow, that his conduct cannot be relied on by the harbour board as contributory negligence, having regard to the form which their own negligence took, for we entirely agree with the learned judge's conclusion that the harbour board was gravely negligent in regard to their common law and statutory duty (a) to dredge continuously in order to keep the port open, (b) to inform themselves about its state, and (c) to warn shipowners, and, above all, their pilots, thereof. If, contrary to our view, the pilot was negligent, we also profoundly agree with BUCKNILL, L.J., that the learned judge's conclusion that the pilot's negligence was the sole cause of the stranding is wrong. The defendants' negligence was a continuing negligence, which was operating so as to cause the accident up to the very moment it happened.

Before further considering the views both of WILLMER, J., and of BUCKNILL, L.J., in the realm of tort, it will be convenient to consider an essentially different aspect of the legal problems raised by the litigation, which arises from the fact that the two parties were, in our opinion, in a contractual relationship, by which they had committed themselves to various promises and conditions. The consequential bearing of the relationship on their mutual relations, not only in contract but also under the law of tort, must be considered, in order to ascertain their final liabilities to each other. We turn, therefore, at once to that question of contract. Where two litigants are asserting cross claims against each other for the tort of negligence, legal duties and liabilities are both likely to have been materially affected if there also existed at the relevant time a contractual relationship between them relating to the matters out of which the cross claims arose. That platitude has direct application to the present appeal. In 1931, the defendant harbour board caused the maritime public to be notified of the facilities afforded to shipping by their harbour, on payment of dues and charges. The inference is irresistible, that they did so by way of invitation to those interested to bring or send ships to their harbour, and so increase the board's revenue. The notification was achieved by the most effective means, namely, by getting it put on the appropriate Admiralty chart and into the "West Coast Pilot," the book containing the usual information to mariners, and kept up to date in the customary way by "Notices to Mariners," from time to time, of navigational changes. The dues and charges were not mentioned, no doubt because they were on the usual scale and would be taken for granted. The intermediary for the purpose, who in fact acted as the board's advertising agent, was the Hydrographic Department of the Admiralty in London, and the arrangement with it was made by correspondence, which was before this court and the court below. The opening request, in October, 1930, was for the issue of a separate large scale chart of the port, but effect to it was given by a large scale inset on the ordinary chart. We think it first appeared as an inset plan in the 1931 edition, on a natural scale of 1/10000, under the heading "Workington. From plan supplied by the Dock and Harbour, 1931, with additions from the Ordnance Survey." The channel was not then completely dredged, but it was soon after in fact dredged to 20ft. below ordnance datum, or 2.2ft. below the sill of the dock, and from 1933 onwards the inset on the West Coast chart carried on the left of the plan, under the heading "Dredged depths," the following words: "In the approach channel and turning basin within the pecked lines a depth of 4½ft. at chart datum is maintained by dredging. (1933)"—that is, to sill level. Chart datum then was, and continued at all material times to be, 4½ft. above the dock sill. That printed notice of the Port, in our opinion, was a standing invitation to use the dock, and, therefore, constituted an offer to all, whom it might concern, of the navigational facilities of the channel and turning basin, as described in the inset plan, and permanently maintained by dredging to the stated depth. It was an offer of a contract, to be accepted by any shipowner by conduct, namely, by his act of starting to send his ship through the dredged channel into the Workington Dock, whereupon the contract would be formed and all the reciprocal terms of the contract would become operative. Its fundamental feature was the continuing express warranty of a "maintained" depth of 4½ft. below datum. In our view, the fact that there was an express written or printed warranty eliminates any such ambiguity of language in the terms of the harbour authority's fundamental promise, as was the subject of controversy and decision in The Moorcock (12). There, just because there was nothing said by way of description about the safety of the berth, when the shipowner agreed to send his ship to the defendants' wharf, the court had to supply the deficiency by implying the unexpressed, but necessarily intended, term. In the offer made by the defendant board there is no room for any such basic implication, since the depth is expressly defined by its own offer as a minimum depth maintained over the whole area of the approaches to the dock: indeed, the words: "See note on dredged depths" are actually printed on that area as shown on the inset plan, the words running in a line parallel to the direction of the channel and into the turning basin. That express undertaking in the printed offer, therefore, absolves the court from the necessity of implying a basic warranty, as was necessary in The Moorcock (12). But, although the basic warranty is express, there are, nevertheless, in our opinion, still certain unexpressed terms—simple and reciprocal—which must be implied, on The Moorcock (12) principle, in order to give to the mutual undertakings of the parties that business efficacy which must at the least have been intended by them. That principle imports a duty on the court, as a matter of law, to read into the express language of the contract just that minimum of additional provision which the intended business efficacy requires, but no more than that minimum. The dominant consideration is the obvious absurdity of the harbour board attempting to warrant in advance that nothing would ever happen in the future to prevent the board from carrying out its unqualified promise of a continuously maintained minimum depth throughout the described channel and turning basin. Some interpretation of the printed terms of the board's offer must be found which will make sense of it. In our opinion, there is no difficulty in discerning what the written offer must have implied and construing it accordingly. Three mutual undertakings are obviously implicit. We begin with their content only and postpone their legal relationship. The first is a proviso, in favour of the board, broadly to this effect: "If at the moment when the contractual relationship is established by the shipowner's acceptance by conduct of the board's offer (namely, either by sending his ship there or by his notifying to the board or its agent the intended entry of his ship into the port) there shall then be some obstruction in the channel or turning basin which either completely prevents reception of the notified ship or makes its entry to the port more difficult, by reason of some obstruction in the advertised area of maintained depth, the board shall be relieved from their absolute warranty on giving to the owner, or his master, timely notice, as the case may be, of the fact of such prevention or of the cause of such obstruction." The second implied promise is that such notification by the board shall in the case of a restriction include all reasonably requisite information so as to enable the ship nevertheless to enter safely. The third is a promise by the owner that the ship shall be navigated inwards with all reasonable care and skill. With that further content of reciprocal terms, implied on The Moorcock (12) principle, but subject to their legal relationship to each other which we shall consider next, the contract, in our view, gives full, but no more than full, efficacy to the business bargain, which must at least have been intended. The reasons for the implication are obvious. It was impossible for the board, at any moment of time when advertising on the chart their continuing offer, to have really intended to undertake absolutely that nothing would happen thereafter which would block the channel or turning basin, or put the dock gates out of action, or interfere with dredging operations, and so make their promise impossible of performance. Indeed, even at the time of the offeree's acceptance the difficulty in the way of performance might, unknown to the board, have already happened. The possibility of such happenings would, of course, always continue to be present, year in and year out. One legal solution of this difficulty might be to reject altogether the contractual interpretation of the board's advertisement; but that solution seems to us contrary to first principles of law upon the formation of contract: e.g., Carlill v. Carbolic Smoke Ball Co. (13), and we reject it. The right solution, we think, follows necessarily from The Moorcock (12) principle, that some provision to meet that difficulty must be inferred to have been present to the mind of the harbour board when issuing the notice of its continuing offer, and equally to the mind of any shipowner or shipmaster on behalf of his owner when silently accepting the offer by conduct. Some extent of implication is, therefore, inevitable; but we conceive The Moorcock (12) principle to call for the smallest departure from the written word compatible with its giving to the bargain that business efficacy which must at the least have been intended by both parties in order to achieve the object of the contract, i.e., as being truly necessary for its business efficacy. Those premises lead us to a two-fold conclusion. The first part of our conclusion is that what is called for is not a modification in the board's contractual promise itself, but a partially resolute condition on the board's continuing to be bound to perform it, such as we have already stated. The performance by the board of their implied promise of due warning, effected by their supplying reasonably sufficient information to the owner and his master, is, in our view, just as much a contractual duty undertaken by them as was the provision of a safe berth under the promise of the wharfinger, defined by this court in The Moorcock (12). The second part of our conclusion is this. The express and absolute promise of minimum depth having been volunteered by the board for publication on the chart, it would, in our opinion, be contrary to good faith that they should be released from the absolute warranty which the advertisement imports, except conditionally on full performance of the lesser promise of due warning. The importance of that interpretation of the board's promise—(all the terms of which, in our opinion, are either expressly or impliedly contained in the board's written offer)—is that it put on the board the whole onus of proving complete compliance with the lesser obligation of the resolute term as a condition precedent to their exemption from the absolute obligation of the printed warranty. For the purpose of implementing that implied condition of due warning, the board impliedly promised (a) to take scrupulous care to keep their own knowledge of the state of the channel and turning basin up to date; (b) that, whenever there was an obstruction there, which by due diligence they could ascertain, they would inform the shipowner or his master of its locality, nature and size; (c) that, if at any time prevented by any cause from taking soundings or other necessary steps to ascertain those particulars, they would give plain warning of the failure and of their own resultant doubts; and, finally, (d) that they would keep the compulsory pilots, stationed by Trinity House at the ports on that coast, informed both of obstructions of which the board knew and of the relevant gaps in that knowledge and of any failure by them to keep that knowledge up to date. In our view, all these four duties (a), (b), (c) and (d), owed contractually to the shipowner, were owed by the board at common law equally to the pilots, as members of the maritime public using the approaches to the dock; but performance of the duty to keep the pilots informed could not in any way relieve the board of their separate duty, both in tort and by contract, to inform the shipowner—for the pilot was not the shipowner's agent for the purpose of receiving information from the board about obstructions, notice of which the board was thus, at any rate in contract, bound to bring personally to the mind of the shipowner, and probably also of his master. The board might properly send a message by the pilot, but if that pilot failed to deliver it they would not have discharged their secondary duty, namely, of keeping the shipowner informed. Nor were they entitled to rely on the pilot having acquired for himself the knowledge, which it was the board's own duty—contractual and at common law—to acquire and hand on to the owner by way of warning. Even if the Pilotage Act, 1913, s. 15, on its proper construction means (what it does not say) that the compulsory pilot is to be deemed for all purposes (including contract) the servant of the shipowner (which, in our opinion, it does not) he would not be such servant until after taking charge of the vessel for the pilotage run into port.

Before discussing further the proper interpretation of s. 15, it will be convenient to consider the plaintiffs' legal position in regard to the claims by them and the counter-claim against them in negligence. For that purpose we will assume provisionally that in regard to both cross claims in tort and mutual pleas of contributory negligence, as argued by counsel for the board, the section does, on its true interpretation, mean that the compulsory pilot is to be deemed to be the servant of the shipowner. On that footing we should, in the legal realm of tort, but for one vitally important aspect, to which we will recur in a moment, agree with the contention that in this litigation, begun in 1942, relating to events in 1941, and governed by the common law rule of no recovery then obtaining in relation to contributory negligence, neither the plaintiffs nor the defendants could, if each were negligent and by that negligence contributed to the accident, recover against the other. The important aspect of the present case (to which we referred just now) is the neglect by the board to give to Pilot Craig the vital information in their possession, to which we have already made reference. That information was, in part, of a negative, and, in part, of a positive, character, relating to the state of the bank of silt on the north side of the channel near the Bush Perch, where the board for some months before October, 1941, had been conducting intermittent dredging operations. The board lay under a heavy and continuing duty to shipowners and to the pilots twice in the lunar month, namely, at every springs, when alone inspection of the bottom was practicable, to inspect and ascertain by proper examination and soundings the real condition of the channel and turning basin in relation to its advertised depth; but, in spite of this urgent duty, on the very last springs before the Towerfield came in, namely, on Oct. 6 and 7, the board's officers actually omitted to make any inspection on the north side. As for months past they had known about the encroaching bank there, and had been engaged regularly in trying to dredge it away, this omission was inexcusable. The gravamen of that omission was that they never informed either the plaintiffs or the pilot of their total ignorance at the crucial time before the Towerfield was due of the state of affairs on the north side of the channel caused by that omission. The impending advent of the Towerfield made their own complete want of up-to-date knowledge itself a most important piece of information of which to warn at least the pilot. That was the negative breach of duty. But there was a positive breach also. On Oct. 17 the harbour-master, Thompson, had, on that spot by looking down from above, actually seen the bank there lying only two feet under the water. We quote from his statement:

"Oct. 17, 1941. My last observation of the channel prior to the stranding of the Towerfield was on Friday, Oct. 17. Low water was about 4 p.m., when I went down on to the hard on the north side and in spite of the depth of water at that time I was able to see the bank on the north side. I should here observe that the soil on the north side is of a sandy nature and is therefore easily seen even if there is a depth of water on the bank. At that time there was a depth on the sill of 8ft. 6ins. or 9ft. 10ins. The bank on the north side was covered by what I estimate to be about 2ft. of water; there was certainly not less than 2ft. and there may have been a little more. The rise of tide on Oct. 17 brought the depth on the sill up to 28ft. 6ins. Therefore, there was a depth on the bank on the north side in way of the north dredging marks of at least 22ft. The bank, of course, reduced towards the channel. I could see that the bank on the north side had materially reduced in height as well as breadth, but I cannot now form an estimate as to what this was. I should estimate that by reason of the bank on the south side and the bank on the north side the channel width had been reduced by Oct. 17 to about 155ft. in way of the place where the Towerfield stranded."

That evidence is crucial, for it shows conclusively the knowledge of the harbour-master only two days before the Towerfield was due to enter. A depth of water of 22ft. on Oct. 17 meant (apart from wind effect, which could not be foreseen the day before) only 23ft. 7ins. on the mid-day high water of Oct. 19—and the Towerfield's draft was 24ft. aft.

We simply cannot imagine why the board did not make a point of telling Craig (1) that no soundings had been taken on Oct. 6/7, and (2) what the harbour-master himself had positively ascertained on the 17th. It is true that on the 17th Craig had had a look, but only across the whole channel from the south pier—and, from there, he obviously could not see what Thompson, when looking downwards from his position on the north foreshore, saw "under water." In our view, Pilot Craig's mistake in thinking it proper to set a course as near as "50 or 60ft. from the Bush Perch" (and "safe at 40ft.") was thus directly induced by the defendants' own breach of their duty, owed in tort to him as a very special member of the navigating public (as well as to the plaintiffs) to keep him informed about the north bank, for we think he was entitled to infer, and we believe he did infer, from the board's silence, an assurance that they knew of nothing in that locality likely to interfere with the navigation of the Towerfield without a tug. This impression on his mind might well be strengthened when he got—if he did get it—from Pilot Stevenson the message from the harbour-master to bring the Towerfield up the channel on the north side of the leading marks. We cannot accept the learned judge's finding that that message was not sent him, but, even without it, the board's withholding of the two vital pieces of evidence, which we have mentioned, was a dereliction of duty by the board, both at common law and in contract, which deprives them of any defence to the plaintiffs' claim, whether in tort or contract. We will assume against the plaintiffs for this purpose that the effect of the Pilotage Act, 1913, s. 15, is to make the shipowner responsible for the conduct of the pilot to exactly the same degree and extent for all purposes as he is for the conduct of the officers of the ship employed and paid by him. In tort perhaps the simplest way of stating the position is that the only negligence alleged against the ship is that of the pilot. He is said to have steered a course negligently near to the north bank of the channel in the neighbourhood of the Bush Perch. But negligence is want of due care in the light of all the circumstances: and one most material circumstance was the harbour board's silence on the two vital points of relevant information which we have mentioned. Because of that silence he thought he could safely go as near as only 40ft. from the Bush Perch, and, with that in mind, decided to keep a distance from it of 50 or 60ft. Had he been given those two vital pieces of information it is obvious that he would have added a further margin of clearance—and very little was needed for the ship never to have touched at all—as is proved by her listing, in spite of her flat bottom, over to starboard as much as she did. We have no doubt that another 20ft., and probably only 10ft., of additional clearance would have sufficed to avoid her touching the bank, and at the worst to prevent her being held by it. It is for that reason not open to the board to charge the pilot with negligence for failing to avoid a hidden danger, of the presence of which they could, and should, have warned him. That, to our minds, disposes of the defence of contributory negligence.

Another legal way of formulating an answer to the defence of contributory negligence would be afforded by the maxim that the defendants cannot avail themselves of their own wrong, namely, their failure to perform their common law duty owed both to the shipowner and to the pilot, as users of the channel fairway, to inform them of the facts in question.

In contract the same considerations dispose of any charge of breach by the shipowner of his implied promise to navigate with care and skill. Possibly also the same facts may be expressed as an estoppel of the defendants by their implied representation to the shipowner and pilot alike that they knew of no obstruction to prevent the ship passing quite close to the north side of the channel. It is no excuse to the board to say that the pilot might have found out for himself. We see no ground for imposing on pilots the duty of watchdog to smell out the harbour board's own failure in its duties of maintenance. Their duty to inform the pilots was independent of any practice by the pilots to make investigations for themselves.

For the above-mentioned reasons, we are of opinion that the common law defence of contributory negligence based on the negligence of the pilot cannot, on the exceptional facts of the present case, operate as an answer to the plaintiffs' claim even in tort. But, even if in spite of the very exceptional facts of this case, we are wrong in that legal conclusion about the position in tort, we are satisfied that those facts afford no answer to the plaintiffs' claim in contract. The nearest approach to such a defence as an answer to a claim for damages for breach of contract would be the contention that the damages did not flow from the breach, but solely from the plaintiffs' own act, and the reasons we have mentioned for rejecting the defendants' plea of contributory negligence seems to us equally a sufficient answer to that contention. In addition, that contention in the present case could, in any event, only be established by proof that the compulsory pilot was the shipowners' servant even for purposes of an action in contract. He is not that at common law—and that issue therefore resolves itself into a pure question of law, arising on the interpretation of the Pilotage Act, 1913, s. 15, as to whether, even in an action of contract, the compulsory pilot is to be treated as the servant of the shipowner. On that the first step is to examine its language closely, as it stood in 1913 :

"(1) Notwithstanding anything in any public or local Act, the owner or master of a vessel navigating under circumstances in which pilotage is compulsory shall be answerable for any loss or damage caused by the vessel or by any fault of the navigation of the vessel in the same manner as he would if pilotage were not compulsory. (2) This section shall not take effect until Jan. 1, 1918, or such earlier date as His Majesty may fix by Order in Council, certifying that it is necessary to bring the section into operation in order to enable His Majesty to comply with an international convention. (3) As from the date of the coming into operation of this section, the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 633, shall cease to have effect."

Before considering what bearing the section has on an action in contract, we will discuss its bearing on an action in tort. The section requires very careful interpretation. If we give all the words of sub-s. (1) their natural meaning, the word "answerable" plainly pre-supposes an antecedent question or demand by some other person and calls for an answer. In its statutory context one can eliminate the idea of a mere "question" and concentrate on "demand." The demand contemplated by the statute prima facie will have been made by a claimant, actual or intended. In that context, therefore, the word must contemplate the answer of a person compellable by law to make answer to such a demand. The problem of construction for the court is to decide in what circumstances that person is to be compelled to make such answer. Prima facie, the person called on to answer will, therefore, be someone in the position of defendant to a legal claim. If it is contended that the word "answerable" is to be stretched beyond that natural meaning so as to give it a less natural meaning, e.g., that the owner or master of the vessel shall be answerable for the pilot's navigation for all purposes, whether of asserting or resisting a claim, there must be sufficient reason for construing the statute so as to give it a meaning to some extent non-natural. We agree with BUCKNILL, L.J., that there is some degree of ambiguity in the sub-section, and that conclusion at once brings in the ordinary rule of construing ambiguous words in a statute, namely, to have regard to the scope and object of the statute and to the nature of the mischief to which it was directed. In the case of s. 15 of the Pilotage Act, 1913, no indication of that kind can be found in any other provision of that Act; but s. 15 (2) does give a plain clue; for it in effect records that the section was introduced for the special purpose of complying with an international convention. That convention was the Collisions Convention, brought into law by the Maritime Conventions Act, 1911, and it was primarily art. 5 of that convention which called for the alteration of the law as then defined by the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 633. The Convention was published by His Majesty's Government as a White Paper (Cmd. 5558 (1911)). It was made law in the United Kingdom by the Maritime Conventions Act, 1911. Article 5 provides :

"The liability imposed by the preceding articles attaches in cases where the collision is caused by the fault of a pilot, even when the pilot is carried by compulsion of law."

The object of that Convention, signed at a diplomatic conference convened by the Belgian government at Brussels in order to consider a draft convention previously framed by the Comité Maritime International, was to unify certain rules of the municipal laws of all nations relating to collisions between ships, or to damage caused (without collision) by one ship to another ship and her cargo. It was concerned only with what English common law calls "torts" and English Admiralty law calls "fault," and what continental law, based on the Code Napoléon, calls by the French word "faute." That Convention had nothing whatsoever to do with contract. One of us happens to have personal knowledge of its object, as with the late LORD STERNDALE he had, as a member of the Comité Maritime International, taken part in its antecedent conferences, at which the Convention had been drafted, and he was subsequently one of the delegates of His Majesty's Government who at the diplomatic conference at Brussels, with His Majesty's Ambassador in Belgium, LORD STERNDALE and Mr. HUGH GODLEY, as delegates of His Majesty's Government, negotiated and signed the revised Convention. When, in the same year, the Maritime Conventions Bill to implement the Collisions Convention and the Salvage Convention was before Parliament, a general Pilotage Bill was also already projected, and the enactment of a provision to give effect to art. 5 of the Collisions Convention was, to the knowledge at the time of one of us, left over for inclusion in that bill. That is the explanation of s. 15 (2) of the Pilotage Act, 1913, as passed. But no such Order in Council was made and sub-ss. (2) and (3) were eventually repealed by the Statute Law Revision Act, 1927. We recognise that the language of s. 15 plainly goes beyond art. 5 of the Collisions Convention and that, to the extent that that extension is unambiguous, effect must be given to its greater scope; but on ordinary principles of interpretation any residual ambiguity in language should be construed with due regard to the object of the statute. We note particularly, for instance, that the scope of the section is not limited to collisions between ships, or even to damage caused by one ship to another without collision, the only other eventuality contemplated by the Convention. But two limitations on any extension of its meaning beyond the scope of art. 5 should, we think, be observed and applied. The first is that its scope should be regarded as limited, as was the Convention, to actions in tort, or, conversely, that the Convention contained no justification for extending the section to actions of contract. The second is another presumption from both the Convention and the Maritime Conventions Act, 1911. It is less strong than the first, because it disregards altogether the limiting force of the consideration, that the word "answerable" prima facie means answerable as defendant to a claim, but the purpose of giving effect to art. 5 of the Convention, in the sense undoubtedly intended by the Convention, outweighs that consideration. The main difference between English and Continental law was that in our Court of Admiralty where both ships were to blame the damages suffered by each were added together and then arbitrarily divided in half and liability apportioned accordingly. The continental principle was the proportional rule and the main object of the Convention was to make that rule universal. The Maritime Conventions Act, 1911, carried that object into law in the United Kingdom. As between litigant ships we think that characteristic of the Act of 1911 justifies an interpretation of the Pilotage Act, 1913, s. 15, which will extend the conception of the word "answerable" to the plaintiff ship as well as the defendant ship. But, even if that is so, we feel great difficulty in attributing to the plaintiff shipowner suing a harbour authority (which is not concerned in this action as owner of a ship) any greater freedom from the statutory attribution of the compulsory pilot's fault than he would enjoy if the defendant were the owner of a delinquent ship.

For these reasons we come to the conclusion, on the history of the section, that it would apply in the present litigation, in regard to the cross claims in tort, if the plea of contributory negligence were established. The historical investigation made by BUCKNILL, L.J., supports that conclusion, but we see no justification for extending s. 15 to the case of a shipowner suing, as in the present action, in contract. The section should be read as strictly limited to actions in tort where negligence of the compulsory pilot is alleged, whether the ship be defendant or plaintiff.

[HIS LORDSHIP discussed the evidence on the claim in contract, and concluded:] Even on the issue in tort we dissent from our brother BUCKNILL's conclusion that the plea of contributory negligence succeeds. In so far as the erroneous navigation by the pilot was caused by the harbour board's own failure of duty, whether at common law or by reason of their contract with the shipowner, to give him essential information, the board are precluded from relying on his error as constituting negligence either on his own part or on the part of the shipowner, even though s. 15 of the Pilotage Act, 1913, requires the court to regard the relationship between the two as that of master and servant.

The conclusions to which we come are that the plaintiffs succeed on their claim in contract and also on their claim in tort, and that the defendants fail on their counterclaim as well as on their plea of contributory negligence.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Bucknill, Cohen and Denning, L.JJ.), October 14, 15, 1948.]

Divorce—Evidence—Privilege—Negotiations before probation officer—Admissibility of evidence of probation officer.

On the hearing of a petition by a husband for divorce on the ground of his wife's desertion, the parties gave evidence of what transpired at an interview which had taken place between them in the presence of the probation officer of a magistrates' court with a view to effecting a reconciliation. There being a conflict of evidence between the parties regarding this matter, the judge admitted the evidence of the probation officer who appeared on subpoena.

HELD: the evidence was rightly admitted.

Per COHEN and DENNING, L.JJ.: the privilege with regard to the negotiations between the parties, if any, was the privilege of the parties, and they, having given evidence on the point, could not assert the privilege. If objection had been taken by the wife to the husband giving evidence on this issue, the objection would have been valid.

APPEAL by a wife from an order of Mr. COMMISSIONER GRAZEBROOK, K.C., dated Mar. 1, 1948, granting a decree nisi to the husband on the ground of his wife's desertion. The Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal. The case is reported only on the point relating to the admissibility of the evidence of the probation officer.

I. F. Reuben for the wife.

Gorst for the husband.

BUCKNILL, L.J., after stating the facts, accepted the husband's evidence, and upheld the commissioner's refusal to permit the husband to be cross-examined about his own behaviour, on the grounds that it was a vexatious question and not relevant. He was, therefore, of the opinion that the appeal should be dismissed.

COHEN, L.J. : I agree. The case turned largely on what transpired at an interview between the parties in March, 1943, arranged by the probation officer. The wife and the husband gave conflicting evidence on this point. The commissioner accepted the husband's evidence, mainly because he thought that it was corroborated by the probation officer. The latter was very properly a reluctant witness. He refused to give a statement to either party and would only appear on subpoena. The commissioner at first was reluctant to admit his evidence, but in the end decided that he must do so in view of the conflict of evidence between husband and wife.

In my opinion, the commissioner had no alternative. The privilege, if any, was the privilege of the parties, and they, having given evidence on the point, could not assert the privilege. The result is none the less unfortunate as the success of attempts at reconciliation might be prejudiced if it became known that the probation officer could be called to give evidence about them, and I desire to make it clear that, as at present advised, I think that, if objection had been taken by the wife to the husband's giving evidence on this issue, the objection would have been valid. Such a conclusion seems to me to be in accordance with the principle that discussions and correspondence in negotiations if "without prejudice" are privileged unless the parties waive the privilege.

I would refer in this connection to some observations of LUSH, J., in La Roche v. Armstrong (1), where the learned judge says ([1922] 1 K.B. 489) with regard to the question whether certain matters should be admitted in evidence :

"There is no authority upon the point, but my reason is that to rule otherwise would in many cases make negotiations for the settlement of litigation almost impossible. Unless parties to such negotiations can feel safe in making an offer and stating the facts upon which it is based the door to negotiations may be closed. It is for the benefit of litigants and others, that statements should be freely made in order to settle litigation."

In that case the court had to do with solicitors' correspondence and the litigation was actually pending, but it seems to me that the principle applies to negotiations to avoid threatened litigation, and a fortiori to negotiations between parties themselves. No one will be prejudiced by such a rule as I have suggested, for if reconciliation takes place there is an end of the matter, and if the attempts at reconciliation fail the aggrieved party can always ask the alleged deserting party to return.

DENNING, L.J. : I agree and desire particularly to associate myself with the observations which COHEN, L.J., has just made. It seems to me that negotiations which take place in the presence of the probation officer with a view to reconciliation are made on the understanding, by all concerned that they are to be without prejudice to the rights of the parties. The rule as to "without prejudice" communications applies with especial force to negotiations for reconciliation. It applies whenever the dispute has got to such dimensions that litigation is imminent. In all cases where the estrangement has reached the point where the parties consult a probation officer, litigation is imminent. It is clear that there is a dispute which may end either in the magistrates' court or the divorce court. The probation officer has no privilege of his own from disclosure any more than a priest, or a medical man, or a banker, and on that account it has been sometimes supposed that the court will compel a probation officer to give evidence of what took place in the course of a negotiation. That is a mistake. The law favours reconciliation, and the court will not take on itself a course which would be so prejudicial to its success. If a probation officer should be compelled to give evidence as to what was said in the course of negotiations, it would mean that, when he attempted reconciliation, he would not be told the truth, or, at all events, not the whole truth. The parties would have at the back of their minds the thought that whatever they said might be given in evidence against them or for them, and would colour their statements accordingly. There is no chance of reconciliation unless the parties are able to talk with frankness to the probation officer and with complete confidence that what they say will not be disclosed. If they are genuinely seeking his assistance they must be taken to negotiate on that understanding even though nothing is expressly said. In this case, however, neither party claimed the privilege and must, therefore, be taken to have waived it. Speaking for myself, that is the only ground on which I thought it right to look at the evidence of the probation officer in this case.

Appeal dismissed. The husband did not ask for costs.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Greene, M.R., Somervell and Evershed, L.JJ.), October 12, 13, 1948.]

Estate Duty—Company—Valuation of shares according to value of company's assets—Liability of company—Anticipated income tax claim on current profits—Finance Act, 1940 (c. 29), ss. 50 (1), 55 (2).

The Finance Act, 1940, s. 55, provides: "(1) Where for the purposes of estate duty there pass, on the death of a person dying after the commencement of this Act, shares in or debentures of a company to which this section applies, then . . . the principal value of the shares or debentures, in lieu of being estimated in accordance with the provisions of s. 7 (5) of the Finance Act, 1894, shall be estimated by reference to the net value of the assets of the company in accordance with the provisions of the next succeeding subsection. (2) For the purposes of such ascertainment as aforesaid:—(a) the net value of the assets of the company shall be taken to be the principal value thereof estimated in accordance with the said sub-s. (5), less the like allowance for liabilities of the company as is provided by s. 50 (1) of this Act in relation to the assets of a company passing on a death by virtue of s. 46 of this Act . . ." Section 50 (1) of the Act of 1940 provides: "In determining the value of the estate for the purpose of estate duty the provisions of s. 7 (1) of the Finance Act, 1894, as to making allowance for debts and incumbrances shall not have effect as respects any debt or incumbrance to which assets of the company passing on the death by virtue of s. 46 of this Act were liable, but the commissioners shall make an allowance from the principal value of those assets for all liabilities of the company (computed, as regards liabilities which have not matured at the date of the death, by reference to the value thereof at that date, and, as regards contingent liabilities, by reference to such estimation as appears to the commissioners to be reasonable) . . ."

On June 24, 1942, D. died possessed of shares in three companies to which s. 55 applied. His executors, in computing under that section the value of his shareholdings for the purposes of estate duty, sought to set off against the companies' profits for the part of the current year which had elapsed at the date of D.'s death, the prospective income tax liability in respect of those profits which would be borne by the companies in the ensuing year.

HELD: the word "liabilities" in s. 50 (1) referred to liabilities existing in law at the relevant date, and did not include the anticipated income tax liability which did not exist until the following financial year. For this, therefore, an allowance under the sub-section could not be made.

[FOR THE FINANCE ACT, 1940 (c. 29), ss. 50 and 55, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Vol. 33, pp. 117, 122.]

APPEAL by executors from an order of ROXBURGH, J., dated Oct. 30, 1947, on an adjourned summons to determine whether, in computing, for the purposes of estate duty, the value of the deceased's shares in a company within the Finance Act, 1940, s. 55, the executors were entitled to set off as a liability against current profits the income tax liability in respect of those profits exigible under the Income Tax Act, 1918, sched. D, in the ensuing year. ROXBURGH, J., held them not to be so entitled, and the Court of Appeal now affirmed his decision. The facts appear in the judgment of LORD GREENE, M.R.

Millard Tucker, K.C., and J. W. P. Clements for the executors.

Pennyquick, K.C., and J. H. Stamp for the Attorney-General.

LORD GREENE, M.R.: The question raised relates to the proper method of valuing for the purpose of estate duty shares in three companies held by the deceased, being companies which fall within the special class of company for which the Finance Act, 1940, s. 55, makes provision. I need not go into an examination of what it is that brings these companies under that provision. There is no dispute as to that, but, in point of machinery, when a testator dies possessed of shares in such a company for the purpose of estate duty a special method of valuation is laid down by the section. Putting it shortly, the principal value of the shares is to be taken as being a proportion of the principal value of the entirety of the shares, and the principal value of the entirety of the shares is to be ascertained by reference to the value of the assets of the company. That is the sort of artificial scheme with which we are very familiar in Finance Acts. It is a scheme by which an existing state of law is, so to speak, pulled to pieces, and as a result something is deemed to be a person's property that, in law, it is not.

The deceased died on June 24, 1942. He died part of the way through the financial years, which were all different, of these three companies. From the date, it is obvious that he died in the course of the financial year for revenue purposes. The method of valuation of shares in such a case is to be found in the Finance Act, 1940, s. 55 (2). It is to be remembered, as I said a moment ago, that the valuation is to be made by reference to the value of the assets of the company. Sub-section (2) provides:

"(a) the net value of the assets of the company shall be taken to be the principal value thereof estimated in accordance with the said sub-s. (5) [i.e., sub-s. (5) of s. 7 of the Finance Act, 1894] less the like allowance for liabilities of the company as is provided by s. 50 (1) of this Act in relation to the assets of a company passing on a death by virtue of s. 46 of this Act,"

The dispute here is as to what liabilities may, for the purposes of this valuation, be deducted from the gross value of the assets of the three companies.

It appears to be the practice, in applying these valuation provisions, to begin with a valuation of the assets less liabilities as shown by the last account of the company in respect of the financial year ending last before the deceased's death, but the relevant date being the deceased's death, which took place part of the way through the next financial year of the company, something must be done to bring the valuation up to date. The practice appears to be to take, first, a proper proportion of the profits of that year referable to the broken period before the deceased's death and to treat that as an addition to the assets and deduct any liabilities that in the interval during that broken period have been incurred. In the present case each of these companies made profits in the year in which the deceased died. According to the system that I have mentioned, a proportionate part of these profits would fall to be added to the value of the companies' assets as shown by the previous balance sheets.

What is said is this. The profits earned in the year during which the deceased died will form the basis of the assessments for income tax in respect of the next year. Therefore, the profits which are earned during that year in which the deceased died carry, so to speak, in gremio, a liability for tax in respect of the financial year which will only begin after the death of the deceased. ROXBURGH, J., has held that that argument does not succeed. In my view, the point comes down to a very short point of construction. It is to be observed, generally, that, if a trader is liable to tax under sched. D of the Income Tax Act, 1918, in respect, let me say, of year 3, he will be assessed in respect of that year on the basis of the profits that he made in year 2. In year 2, while he was making those profits, no doubt, if he was a prudent person, he would say to himself: "It is morally certain that when year 3 comes along these profits that I have made will form the basis of my income tax assessment for year 3. I will, therefore, not spend all these profits. I am going to set aside a reserve against that liability if and when, as a business man naturally assumes it will, it arrives." The advantage of such prudent behaviour is clear because in the next year he may not make a penny of profit, and, if he has spent all his profits of the previous year, he will find himself liable to be assessed on those profits, and he will have no profits out of which he can pay tax. Therefore, from the business point of view, I entirely accept the proposition that a provision of that kind would be a prudent, and, indeed, a customary, thing for a trading company to make. Turning back to the valuation section, which is incorporated into s. 55, namely, s. 50 (1), I find this:

"In determining the value of the estate for the purpose of estate duty the provisions of s. 7 (1) of the Finance Act, 1894, as to making allowance for debts and incumbrances shall not have effect as respects any debt or incumbrance to which assets of the company passing on the death by virtue of s. 46 of this Act were liable . . ."

I need say no more about that part of the subsection save that s. 7 (1) of the Finance Act, 1894, was drafted with reference to the valuation, not of a particular piece of property, but of the estate of the deceased as a whole. Those valuation provisions and directions for deducting debts and incumbrances would not have worked in the case of the very artificial idea underlying these sections by which things which were not the deceased's assets are to be deemed to be his assets. Accordingly, in substitution for the provision for deducting debts and incumbrances in s. 7 (1) of the Act of 1894, this provision is inserted in s. 50 (1) of the Act of 1940:

" . . . but the commissioners shall make an allowance from the principal value of those assets for all liabilities of the company (computed, as regards liabilities which have not matured at the date of the death, by reference to the value thereof at that date, and, as regards contingent liabilities, by reference to such estimation as appears to the commissioners to be reasonable) other than—(a) liabilities in respect of shares in or debentures of the company; and (b) liabilities incurred otherwise than for the purposes of the business of the company wholly and exclusively."

That is dealing with a different class of company from that with which we are concerned, but the important thing is that that valuation provision is to be used in connection with the class of company with which we are concerned, subject to the variation, enacted by s. 55 (2) (a), that there may be deducted liabilities mentioned in para. (b), that is to say: "liabilities incurred otherwise than for the purposes of the business of the company wholly and exclusively." If it had not been for that modification, an income tax liability, I apprehend, would not have been deductible, but the effect of altering s. 50 in that respect so as to allow for deduction of liabilities mentioned under head (b), is to permit a deduction in respect of income tax liability.

Coming back to the body of sub-s. (1) of s. 50, the commissioners are directed to make an allowance "from the principal value" of the assets (that would be the assets of the company) for all liabilities of the company. It is to be observed that, this process of arriving at the net value being a variant of what I may call the basic process provided for by s. 7 (1) of the Act of 1894, one would rather expect—I do not attribute any practical force to this argument, but it is right to point it out—that this new provision for arriving at the net value would not introduce a class of deduction going beyond the sort of thing which was deductible under s. 7 (1)—which were debts and incumbrances. It is true that the language used here is different. It does not say "debts and incumbrances"; it says "all liabilities of the company." We are all familiar with the fact that, in speaking of the liabilities of a company which keeps accounts, the word "liabilities" may be used in two senses. From one point of view, in reference to a particular company, anything that appears on the left hand side of its balance sheet is a liability. In the accountancy sense, it is a liability whether it be a provision for an actual legal liability or whether it be a provision which the directors, as business men, think is prudent to make for something that may or may not happen in the future. From the accountancy point of view, once these things are properly entered on the left hand side of the balance sheet, they are liabilities. Counsel for the executors repudiates the suggestion that he wished to construe the word "liabilities" in so extended a sense, but he rejects the suggestion that the word "liabilities" is to be construed in the limited and narrow sense of legal liabilities existing in point of law, whether under a contract, or under a statute, or in some other way. He says that in the present case you have a sort of half-way house. When the testator died the company had made, and was making, profits in respect of the Exchequer financial year then current which would form the basis of its assessment to income tax for the following financial year. He then says: "Notwithstanding the fact that the testator died long before the commencement of that Exchequer financial year, and, therefore, long before the beginning of the period in respect of which the assessment would take place on the basis of those profits, nevertheless those profits"—if I may return to the phrase I used earlier—"directly they were made carried within themselves, so to speak, in gremio, a liability to tax which in every business sense would materialise into a legal liability as soon as the Budget resolutions in the following year were passed." From the business point of view, I have no quarrel with that statement of the situation. It may well be that a business man who did not make proper provision for tax payable in the next year would be very unwise, but we have to construe the word "liabilities" in this context.

Before I state in a sentence my opinion on that point, I must just add a reference to the words in brackets, which I have quoted, as to computing the liabilities of the company. Those words deal with two sub-classes of liabilities. Neither of those sub-classes can go beyond the head class of liabilities. In other words, in order to fall within one or other of those two sub-classes, a thing must be a liability. Those two sub-classes are as follows: first, the liabilities "which have not matured at the date of the death." That has a very simple meaning. The other class is as regards "contingent liabilities," which are to be valued by reference to an estimate. In that context what I have to ask myself is this. What is the meaning of "liabilities," and, in particular, what is its meaning in the phrase "contingent liabilities"? It is to that simple point that this controversy comes down. It appears to me that, in the absence of some context justifying a limitation of those words or some qualification being imposed on them, all we can do is to construe them in their natural and ordinary meaning. It is not for us to extract what we might like to think in certain cases would be a fairer method of valuation. We have to ascertain, from the construction of the words used by Parliament in stating its will, the method of valuation prescribed, in accordance with the natural and ordinary meaning of the words in their context, and to apply them, even though in this case, or in another case, we may think that some different method of valuation would have led to a fairer result. It may or may not be so. Anyone who is familiar with income tax or revenue law knows well that general provisions in an individual case may work rather harshly, but in another case they may work for the benefit of the income tax payer. All we have to do is to apply them.

Counsel for the executors says: "Income tax is a very special thing. It cannot be classed with the sort of apprehended future event which may or may not happen. It is as certain as anything can be." A glance at the Income Tax Acts makes it clear that income tax will be imposed. Therefore, he says, as soon as the profits are earned which are to form the basis of next year's assessment you can say with absolute certainty: "Those profits will form the basis of next year's assessment, and any prudent business man will not regard them as spendable save after making proper provisions for that liability which is going to arise in the future." That is an attractive argument, because to speak of income tax next year as if the question whether it was or was not going to be imposed were a thing at large would be stupid, but, taking the construction of these words, I find it impossible to give them a meaning extending beyond what is always ascertainable without any doubt whatsoever, namely, an existing legal liability—a liability actually existing in law at the relevant date. The words cannot be stretched so as to cover something which in a business sense is morally certain and for which every business man ought to make provision, but which in law does not become a liability until a subsequent date. That appears to me to be the short answer to this appeal, which, in my opinion, should be dismissed with costs.

NOTE.

CLIFF v. CLIFF.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Morton of Henryton, Bucknill and Asquith, L.JJ.), September 28, 1948].

Child—Custody—Declaration that divorced parent not fit to have custody—No jurisdiction to make in chambers—Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886 (c. 27), s. 7.

APPEAL from an order of HODSON, J., in chambers.

By s. 7 of the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886: "In any case where a decree . . . nisi . . . for divorce, shall be pronounced, the court pronouncing such decree may thereby declare the parent by reason of whose misconduct such decree is made to be a person unfit to have the custody of the children . . . of the marriage . . ."

The marriage of the parties took place in 1931. There were three children, the eldest being a son aged 16 and the youngest being aged 13. On Dec. 4, 1947, on the wife's petition, HODSON, J., granted a decree nisi dissolving the marriage. On Jan. 12, 1948, the wife's solicitor issued a summons before HODSON, J., in chambers asking that a declaration be made, pursuant to s. 7 of the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, that the husband was a person unfit to have the custody of the children of the marriage. HIS LORDSHIP made the order asked for. On appeal by the husband to the Court of Appeal the following two points were taken by counsel: (i) The judge had no jurisdiction to make the order in chambers, it being contended that an order under the Act could only be made by a court, and that a judge in chambers was not a court within the meaning of s. 7; and (ii) on the facts the order should not have been made.

Beyfus, K.C., and Roland Adams for the husband.

Arthian Davies, K.C., and Victor Williams for the wife.

(Counsel referred to Baker v. Oakes (1877) (2 Q.B.D. 171; 46 L.J.Q.B. 246; 35 L.T. 832) and Re Davidson, Ex. p. Davidson ([1899] 2 Q.B. 103; 68 L.J.Q.B. 836; 81 L.T. 182)).

THE COURT held that a judge sitting in chambers had no power to make a declaration under s. 7, the application for which must be made and determined in open court. In those circumstances the second point did not arise.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors: Gregory, Rowcliffe & Co. (for the husband); Beaumont & Son (for the wife).

R. v. O'NEILL.

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Humphreys and Byrne, JJ.), October 18, 1948.]

Criminal Law—Sentence—Borstal detention—Second sentence to Borstal detention while undergoing or liable to undergo another such sentence—Date of commencement not to be fixed.

On July 25, 1946, the prisoner was sentenced to Borstal detention for a period not exceeding 3 years. On Sept. 4, 1947, he was released on a licence expiring in July, 1949. Shortly after his release the prisoner was brought before quarter sessions charged with housebreaking, to which he pleaded guilty, and was again sentenced to Borstal detention not exceeding 3 years, the sentence to begin at the expiration of that which he was then liable to serve.

HELD: it was not desirable, or, indeed, possible, to give any directions in the case of a sentence of Borstal detention as to when the sentence should begin if the prisoner were already undergoing, or liable to undergo, a sentence of Borstal detention, and, therefore, the sentence in the form adopted in the present case was not appropriate.

[AS TO SENTENCE OF DETENTION IN BORSTAL INSTITUTION, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 9, pp. 243, 244, para. 344; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 14, p. 481, Nos. 5245, 5246, and Supplement.]

CASE REFERRED BY HOME SECRETARY under the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907, s. 19 (b).

The prisoner, while still on licence from a term of Borstal detention, was sentenced to a further term of detention by the Cheshire Quarter Sessions, who directed that the sentence was to run from the date of completion of the previous sentence. The court advised the Home Secretary that this form of sentence was inappropriate.

No counsel appeared.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This matter has been referred to the court by the Secretary of State under the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907, s. 19 (b), which provides that the Secretary of State may, if he thinks fit on considering any petition:

"if he desires the assistance of the Court of Criminal Appeal on any point arising in the case with a view to the determination of the petition, refer that point to the Court of Criminal Appeal for their opinion thereon, and the court shall consider the point so referred and furnish the Secretary of State with their opinion thereon accordingly."

Under the Criminal Appeal Rules, 1908, the opinion of the court may be furnished to the Secretary of State either by giving judgment in open court and sending him a copy of the judgment or privately. As this case raises a point of importance to quarter sessions, we think that it would be desirable to give our opinion in public.

The prisoner pleaded Guilty at the Summer Cheshire Quarter Sessions to housebreaking, and he asked for 32 other cases to be taken into account. On July 25, 1946, he had been before a court of quarter sessions and had been sentenced to Borstal detention for a period not exceeding 3 years. On Sept. 4, 1947, he was released by the commissioners on a licence which expires in July, 1949. On his release he went into the army, but was discharged after one month for reasons which are immaterial for us to consider, and then he started on this career of crime. Cheshire Quarter Sessions ordered a sentence of Borstal detention not exceeding 3 years, and the chairman said: "Taking into account the high number of other offences involved . . . you will be sent to a Borstal institution for three further years. That means to say that the sentence will run from to-day and you will have to serve your sentence." The sentence was drawn up so that it was to commence at the expiration of the sentence imposed on him on July 25, 1946, so, presumably, the court meant that the prisoner was to serve the remaining term of his first sentence and then begin a further term of detention.

It has to be remembered that under the Prevention of Crime Act, 1908, which regulates Borstal detention and gives the power to impose a sentence of Borstal detention, it is left entirely to the Commissioners of Prisons to decide when the prisoner may be discharged. That is why the sentence is always framed as a sentence of detention not exceeding 3 years in a Borstal institution. As is well-known, it is seldom that prisoners are not released considerably before the expiration of 3 years from the date of the sentence when, in the judgment of the commissioners, their conduct shows that there is a reasonable chance of their going straight. If they commit another offence, they can then, as, no doubt, has happened in this case, be re-taken and will have to serve the unexpired portion of their sentence or such part of it as the commissioners in their discretion think fit. If, therefore, a court orders that a sentence of Borstal detention be passed on an offender who is already on licence, and orders that sentence to take effect at the expiration of the earlier sentence, no one can say for what period it will or it will not take effect because the expiration of the earlier sentence is entirely in the hands of the commissioners. They may release the present prisoner after serving a further three months. Then, if the new sentence is to take effect, they can release him again on that immediately.

We think that the right advice to give to the Home Secretary is that a sentence in this form is not appropriate, and that, therefore, the sentence should be regarded as though the words "at the expiration of the sentence imposed upon him on July 25, 1946," were eliminated. I hope it will be noticed by quarter sessions that it is not desirable, or, indeed, possible, to give any directions in the case of a sentence of Borstal detention as to when the sentence should begin if the prisoner is already undergoing or liable to undergo a sentence of Borstal detention.

R. v. CLAYTON-WRIGHT.

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Jones and Byrne, JJ.),
October 15, 1948.]

Criminal Law—Indictment—Joinder of counts—Charges in respect of different transactions—Nexus of defrauding insurers present throughout—Indictments Act, 1915 (c. 90), sched. I, r. 3.

The appellant was convicted on an indictment containing four counts. The first charged him with arson in that he unlawfully set fire to a vessel. The second count charged him with arson of the vessel with intent to prejudice the insurers. The third count charged him with attempting to obtain money by false pretences from the insurers in respect of the policy of insurance on the vessel, and the fourth count charged him with obtaining money by false pretences by pretending that a mink coat had been stolen from his motor car and that he was entitled to payment under a policy of insurance in respect of the alleged loss.

HELD: the charges in the first three counts were in substance that the appellant had dealt with the vessel with the intention of defrauding underwriters and the fourth charge was a similar charge in respect of the fur coat, and, therefore, the nexus of insurance was present throughout counts 2, 3 and 4, which was sufficient to uphold the indictment since the charges formed "part of a series of offences of the same or a similar character" within r. 3 of the rules in sched. I to the Indictments Act, 1915.

APPEAL against conviction at Hampshire Assizes on an indictment containing four counts, two of them being for felony and one for misdemeanour in connection with one transaction and the fourth count being for misdemeanour arising out of a different transaction. The court held that the indictment was good. The facts appear in the judgment.

Roberts, K.C., and Cyril Williams for the Crown.

The judgment of the court was delivered by

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: The appellant was convicted before HUMPHREYS, J., at Hampshire Assizes on an indictment containing four counts. The first count charged him with arson contrary to s. 42 of the Malicious Damage Act, 1861, in that on Mar. 2, 1948, at Southampton, he unlawfully and maliciously set fire to a vessel, namely, the Barcarolle. The second count charged him with arson with intent, contrary to s. 43, the particulars being that on the same day and at the same place he unlawfully and maliciously set fire to the vessel with intent thereby to prejudice the members of the Institute of London Underwriters who had underwritten a policy of insurance on the vessel. Both of those are felonies. In the third count he was charged with misdemeanour—attempting to obtain money by false pretences, the particulars being that on the same day and at the same place with intent to defraud he attempted to obtain from the members of the Institute of London Underwriters who had underwritten a policy of insurance on this vessel payment for the total loss of the vessel by falsely pretending it had become a total loss by reason of an accidental fire on board and that he was then entitled to payment under the policy. There was a fourth count, also for misdemeanour, charging him with obtaining money by false pretences in that on a day in June, 1947, with intent to defraud he obtained the sum of £400 from the Royal Insurance Co., Ltd., by falsely pretending that a mink coat had been stolen from his motor car and that he was then entitled to payment of the sum under a policy of insurance.

Three points have been taken on his behalf. The first is that this indictment was so defective that no judgment could be based on it in that there was a misjoinder of the fourth count which, it is submitted, ought not to have been included in the indictment, and, therefore, the indictment was bad. The second point is that there ought to have been a separate trial at least with regard to the fourth count, and the third point is misdirection. The appellant was convicted on counts 1, 2 and 3. On the fourth count he was acquitted, but it is said that his trial was prejudiced by the inclusion of that count in the indictment. The first question we have to decide is whether the fourth count was rightly joined in the indictment. Before the Indictments Act, 1915, if a grand jury preferred an indictment containing a charge of felony and a charge of misdemeanour, that indictment was bad. The main object of the Indictments Act, 1915, was to simplify the whole system of criminal procedure so far as criminal pleadings were concerned and it is clear that the legislature intended that technical objections which did not go to the substance or merits of the case should as far as possible be swept away. Accordingly, by s. 4 of the Act it was provided :

“Subject to the provisions of the rules under this Act, charges for more than one felony or for more than one misdemeanour, and charges for both felonies and misdemeanours, may be joined in the same indictment, but where a felony is tried together with any misdemeanour, the jury shall be sworn and the person accused shall have the same right of challenging jurors as if all the offences charged in the indictment were felonies.”

By r. 3 of the rules which appear in sched. I to the Act :

“Charges for any offences, whether felonies or misdemeanours, may be joined in the same indictment if those charges are founded on the same facts, or form or are a part of a series of offences of the same or a similar character.”

By s. 5 of the Act it was provided :

“(1) Where, before trial, or at any stage of a trial, it appears to the court that the indictment is defective, the court shall make such order for the amendment of the indictment as the court thinks necessary to meet the circumstances of the case, unless, having regard to the merits of the case, the required amendments cannot be made without injustice, and may make such order as to the payment of any costs incurred owing to the necessity for amendment as the court thinks fit.”

By the Administration of Justice (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1933, provision is made for quashing one count in the indictment and allowing the rest of the indictment to stand. I do not say that, if an indictment which is preferred is defective in that it does not comply with the provisions of the Indictments Act, 1915, s. 4, and the rules made thereunder and is left unamended until after verdict, that indictment can be supported. If the indictment is defective and remains defective until judgment, no verdict can be based on it. In the present case no application was made to amend and counsel for the Crown stood on the indictment and submitted it was a good indictment. Therefore, we have to consider whether this was an indictment in which count 4 was properly included. It makes no difference for this purpose that the appellant was acquitted on count 4. If it was a bad indictment, it was bad ab initio. It is clear that count 2 can be joined with count 1. They were both felonies and they both

A relate to the same set of circumstances. Count 3, which was for misdemeanour, can also be joined with count 2, and, it follows, with count 1 also, although those are felonies, because all three counts relate to exactly the same set of facts. Count 4 relates to a charge of obtaining by false pretences a sum of money from underwriters on another policy of insurance than that which is dealt with in the second and third counts. It is said that because that deals with a mink coat which was insured under a different policy from the policy on the ship, it was a bad joinder and that it cannot come within the words in r. 3 "if those charges are founded on the same facts, or form or are a part of a series of offences of the same or a similar character."

B One test which the learned judge applied was to consider whether or not the evidence with regard to the mink coat could be given in evidence on the other charges. He came to the conclusion that it could, and, in the opinion of the court, he came to a right conclusion. When evidence was given by the prosecution that there had been a discussion between the appellant and other persons with regard to the desirability or possibility of firing the ship to get money out of the underwriters, it was stated that the appellant referred to this incident of the fur coat as showing how easy it was to get money out of underwriters. That was one ground, but the main ground on which the court holds C that there was no misjoinder is the following. The charge contained in the first three counts, although the first count simply charges the arson and not the attempting to get money, in substance was that the appellant fired the yacht with the idea of swindling underwriters. The charge with regard to the mink coat was a similar charge of swindling underwriters, and, therefore, one gets D what I may call the nexus of insurance, the nexus of fraudulent acts to the prejudice of the underwriters going through counts 2, 3 and 4, and, in the opinion of the court, that is sufficient to uphold this indictment because it comes within the words of r. 3, that the charges "are a part of a series of offences of the same or a similar character." They were similar in the sense that both charges were charges of swindling underwriters.

E [HIS LORDSHIP, dealing with the submission that there ought to have been a separate trial on count 4, said that in R. v. Grondkowski and Malinowski (1) the court said ([1946] 1 All E.R. 562): "The real test, after all, which must be applied by a Court of Criminal Appeal on a matter which is essentially one of discretion is, has the exercise of the discretion resulted in a miscarriage of justice." It was clear that the joinder in the present case could not have re- F sulted in a miscarriage of justice. There was no misdirection, there had been a perfectly fair trial, a full and proper summing-up in which the defence was adequately placed before the jury, and the jury had come to a correct verdict.] The appeal would be dismissed.

R. v. BEDFORD.

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Humphreys and Byrne, JJ.),
October 13, 1948.]

Criminal Law—Appeal—Special treatment of appellant—Time counting as part of sentence—Application for leave to appeal—Refusal by judge in chambers—Appeal to full court—Dismissal of appeal—Criminal Justice Act, 1948 (c. 58), s. 38 (2).

The applicant applied for leave to appeal on July 17, 1948, and his application was dismissed by SLADE, J., in chambers on Aug. 17, 1948. On Oct. 13, 1948, his application came before the full Court of Criminal Appeal which refused it.

HELD : that the applicant was not entitled to have treated as part of his sentence any part of the time he was in custody between Aug. 17 and Oct. 13.

[AS TO COMPUTATION OF TERM OF SENTENCE IF APPEAL DISMISSED, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 9, p. 281, para. 411; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 14, pp. 507, 508, Nos. 5617-5629.]

APPLICATION for leave to appeal. The facts appear in the headnote and the judgment.

No counsel appeared.

LORD GODDARD, C.J. : Section 38 (2) of the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, provides that six weeks or less of the time during which an appellant to this court is specially treated shall be disregarded in computing the term of his sentence. This means that where a prisoner gives notice of appeal or makes application for leave to appeal the time spent in prison does not count as part of his sentence if the application or appeal is heard and dismissed within six weeks. If the hearing does not take place till after six weeks have expired from the date of the notice, and if the appeal or application is dismissed, any time that the prisoner has spent in prison over six weeks will be counted as part of his sentence. It may, however, be that his application for leave to appeal has come before a single judge of the court and been dismissed and the prisoner has desired that the case should be further considered by the full court. In such a case the time that must elapse between the date of the dismissal of the application by the single judge and the dismissal of the application by this court will not count as part of the sentence for the fact that the application has already been dealt with and refused by the judge will ordinarily be considered a good reason for the court exercising the discretion which s. 38 (2) (b) gives it. In this particular case the applicant applied for leave to appeal on July 17, 1948. He would then be specially treated in prison as an appellant. His application was considered by SLADE, J., on Aug. 17, 1948, less than six weeks from the date of the notice. He would, therefore, not be entitled to have any part of the time that he was waiting treated as part of his sentence. He was not content with the refusal of SLADE, J., and applied for leave to appeal to this court which has refused his application. Consequently, no part of the time from Aug. 17 to Oct. 13 can be allowed as he ought to have been content with the learned judge's refusal on Aug. 17.

ROBERTSON v. MINISTER OF PENSIONS.

Re 56, DENTON ROAD, ISON (Denning, J.), October 5, 11, 1948.]
ENHAM, MIDDLESEX. [1952]

3.R. 799. lity—Injury suffered in December, 1939—Claim admitted by War Office—Minister of Pensions not consulted—Assurance given by War Office binding on Minister of Pensions.

By the Pensions (Navy, Army, Air Force, Nursing and Auxiliary Services) Transfer of Powers Order, 1939 (made under the Pensions (Navy, Army, Air Force and Mercantile Marine) Act, 1939, s. 1), the entire administration of disablement claims in respect of military service after Sept. 2, 1939, was transferred to the Minister of Pensions. In December, 1939, the claimant was injured in an accident while on military service, and in July, 1940, he was examined by a medical board, found unfit for general service, and graded in Category B. In March, 1941, he wrote to the War Office, requesting that the question of attributability in regard to the disability should be settled. On Apr. 8, 1941, without consulting the Minister of Pensions, the War Office replied that the claimant's disability had been accepted as attributable to military service. On the faith of that assurance the claimant took no steps to obtain independent medical opinion or to secure possession of the X-ray plates relating to his accident, and these were now no longer available. The question was whether the assurance contained in the letter from the War Office was binding on the Minister of Pensions :—

HELD : (i) the letter from the War Office was on the face of it an authoritative decision intended to be binding and to be acted on, and the fact that the claimant had, as a result of that letter, forborne from getting a medical opinion was sufficient to have made the letter binding if it had been written by a private person.

(ii) since the letter from the War Office was clear and explicit, the doctrine of executive necessity could not be implied therein, so as to entitle the Crown to revoke the decision without cause.

Reilly v. R. ([1934] A.C. 176; 150 L.T. 384), applied.

Rederiaktiebolaget Amphitrite v. R. ([1921] 3 K.B. 500; 126 L.T. 63), distinguished.

(iii) as the War Office was an agent for the Crown, the Crown was bound by the letter and, therefore, other government departments, being also agents of the Crown, were also bound, and, accordingly, the letter was binding on the Minister of Pensions, whose function was to administer the Royal Warrant issued by the Crown so as to honour all assurances given by or on behalf of the Crown.

APPEAL by the claimant from a decision of a pensions appeal tribunal that his disability was not attributable to military service.

In April, 1941, the War Office, without consulting the Minister of Pensions, informed the claimant that his disability had been accepted as attributable to military service. DENNING, J., now held that the assurance given by the War Office was binding on the Minister of Pensions. The facts appear in the judgment.

Crispin for the claimant.

H. L. Parker for the Minister.

Cur. adv. vult.

Oct. 11. DENNING, J., read the following judgment. In April, 1941, the War Office wrote to Colonel Robertson telling him that his disability had been accepted as attributable to military service. The question raised by this Case Stated is whether that assurance is binding on the Minister of Pensions.

Colonel Robertson served throughout the 1914-18 war. He served in the Territorials for all the years between the wars, and he served for six years in the 1939-45 war. He now suffers from a disability which is the result of an injury, but the question is: Which injury? He had two injuries. The first was in a train accident in 1927, not connected with military service. It seemed to be only a slight injury. He had a stiff neck and some neuritis, but this cleared up by 1928. Thereafter he played Rugby football and led an energetic life with no further trouble. The second accident was in December, 1939, while on military service. He fell and injured himself, receiving a severe blow on the chin. This was very painful and left some stiffness which persisted, and in May, 1940, he was taken into Millbank Hospital and X-rayed. A medical board was held in July, 1940, and he was found unfit for general service and put in Category B permanently.

Those facts give rise to three possible interpretations: (i) The disability may have been due to the first injury which took a long time to manifest itself. It would then not be due to war service. (ii) The first injury may have cleared up, or, at any rate, left only a condition which might never have given any trouble but for the second accident. The disability would then be due to the second injury which was attributable to war service. (iii) The first accident may have given rise to an injurious process which would, sooner or later, have given rise to the disability in greater or less degree, but was accelerated or intensified by the second accident. The disability would then be due to the first injury, though aggravated by the second. In that case, so long as aggravation remained, the disability would be due to war service. It is plain that for the determination of those nice questions a sight of the X-rays would be most important.

On Mar. 11 and 14, 1941, Colonel Robertson wrote to the Director of Personal Services at the War Office giving a full statement regarding his case and making this request:

"On July 3, 1940, I was examined at Millbank by a medical board, which reported me permanently unfit for general service and placed me in Category B. I understand that no report was made on the question of attributability and I should be glad if this matter can now be reconsidered."

On Apr. 8, 1941, the Director of Personal Services replied:

"Dear Colonel, You wrote me on Mar. 11 regarding the injury you sustained in December, 1939, and I now write to let you know that your case has been duly considered and your disability has been accepted as attributable to military service. I am pleased the question has been settled in such a satisfactory manner."

Colonel Robertson says that, on the faith of that assurance, he did not take any steps (as he otherwise would have done) to get an independent medical opinion in 1941 ; that at that time the X-ray plates were still available, whereas they have now been lost or destroyed ; and that his position is, accordingly, prejudiced. Colonel Robertson did not, of course, know what steps the War Office took when they considered his case, but at the hearing before me the War Office file was produced, and, by consent, I looked at it. It shows that the Director of Personal Services wrote to the divisional commander and obtained evidence as to the injury in December, 1939, and its consequences, and that he sent all the material, including the proceedings at the medical board, to the headquarters of the Army Medical Department. They reported :

“ From the evidence available we consider that the officer's condition was attributable to the accident in December, 1939.”

There was ample material for that decision. The doctors at the medical board had agreed that, although the discs were probably damaged in the first accident, the second was the precipitating cause of the symptoms from which he suffered. The papers were then sent to the Army Finance Department who replied : “ We agree—attributable.” Then they were returned to the Director of Personal Services who wrote to Colonel Robertson the letter of Apr. 8, 1941. It is clear, therefore, that the letter was written after careful consideration by all the departments concerned at the War Office and with their full authority, but the Minister of Pensions had not been consulted, nor anyone in his department. Nevertheless, if the letter was to have any effect at all, it would have to be binding on the Minister of Pensions, because the Pensions (Navy, Army Air Force, Nursing and Auxiliary Services) Transfer of Powers Order, 1939 (S.R. & O., 1939, No. 1194), made under the Pensions (Navy, Army, Air Force and Mercantile Marine) Act, 1939, s. 1, had transferred to him the entire administration of disablement claims in respect of service after Sept. 2, 1939, and the Royal Warrants carry this into effect. The War Office still retained jurisdiction over claims in respect of service before September, 1939, and that is a jurisdiction which they still retain under art. 653 of the Pay Warrant, 1940. This claim of Colonel Robertson was, however, clearly a claim in respect of his injury of December, 1939, and so came within the Royal Warrants in respect of war service.

The important thing to notice is that the letter of Apr. 8, 1941, is framed in the very words of the Royal Warrant of June, 1940 (Cmd. 6205), which was then in force. Article 5 of that warrant lays down the condition under which “ a disability ” shall or shall not be “ accepted as attributable to military service.” That warrant dealt with all claims in respect of war injuries, i.e., pensions, retired disability pay, allowances and medical expenses. The assurance was given to Colonel Robertson in these explicit words :

“ . . . your disability has been accepted as attributable to military service.”

That was, on the face of it, an authoritative decision intended to be binding and intended to be acted on. Even if Colonel Robertson had studied the Royal Warrant in every detail, there would have been nothing to lead him to suppose that the decision was not authoritative. He might well presume that the Army Medical Board was recognised by the Minister of Pensions for the purpose of certifying under arts. 2 (4) and 5 of the Royal Warrant, and that their certificate of attributability was sufficient for the purpose of the warrant.

What then is the result in law ? If this was a question between subjects, a person who gave such an assurance as that contained in the War Office letter would be held bound by it unless he could show that it was made under the influence of a mistake or induced by a misrepresentation or the like, none of which appears here. There are many cases in the books which establish that an unequivocal acceptance of liability will be enforced, if it is intended to be binding, intended to be acted on, and is, in fact, acted on. I may instance the cases under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, the latest of which is Birch v. Pease & Partners, Ltd. (1). These cases are often not cases of estoppel in the strict sense, because estoppel strictly only applies to representations of facts, not of law. Here all the primary facts were known to both parties and the only question was : What was the proper conclusion to be drawn from them ? Furthermore, the cases are often not cases of simple contracts because, unlike a compromise, there is no consideration given at the time. Thus, we have here no promise, express or implied, by Colonel Robertson to forbear from getting a medical opinion. Yet, if his disability had not been accepted as attributable to military service, he would have got one. He did, therefore, on the faith of the War Office letter forbear to get such an opinion. That is sufficient to make the letter binding. The case falls within the principle that if a man gives a promise or assurance which he intends to be binding on him and to be acted on by the person to whom it was given, then, once it is acted on he is bound by it : see Central London Property Trust, Ltd. v. High Trees House, Ltd. (2) and Bob Guinness, Ltd. v. Salomonsen (3).

The next question is whether the assurance is binding on the Crown. The Crown cannot escape by saying that estoppels do not bind the Crown, for that doctrine has long been exploded. Nor can the Crown escape by praying in aid the doctrine of executive necessity, i.e., the doctrine that the Crown cannot bind itself so as to fetter its future executive action. That doctrine was propounded by ROWLATT, J., in Rederiaktiebolaget Amphitrite v. R. (4), but it was unnecessary for the decision, because the statement there was not a promise which was intended to be binding but only an expression of intention. ROWLATT, J., seems to be influenced by the cases on the right of the Crown to dismiss its servants at pleasure, but those cases must now all be read in the light of the judgment of LORD ATKIN ([1934] A.C. 179) in Reilly v. R. (5). That judgment shows that, in regard to contracts of service, the Crown is bound by its express promises as much as any subject. The cases where it has been held entitled to dismiss at pleasure are based on an implied term which cannot, of course, exist where there is an express term dealing with the matter. In my opinion, the defence of executive necessity is of limited scope. It only avails the Crown where there is an implied term to that effect, or that is the true meaning of the contract. It has certainly no application to this case. The War Office letter is clear and explicit and I see no room for implying a term that the Crown is to be at liberty to revoke the decision at its pleasure and without cause.

I come, therefore, to the most difficult question in the case. Is the Minister of Pensions bound by the War Office letter ? I think he is. Colonel Robertson thought, no doubt, that, as he was serving in the Army, his claim to attributability would be dealt with by or through the War Office. So he wrote to the War Office. The War Office did not refer him to the Minister of Pensions. They assumed authority over the matter and assured him that his disability had been accepted as attributable to military service. He was entitled to assume that they had consulted any other departments that might be concerned, such as the Minister of Pensions, before they gave him the assurance. He was entitled to assume that the board of medical officers who examined him were recognised by the Minister of Pensions for the purpose of giving certificates as to attributability. Can it be seriously suggested that, having got that assurance, he was not entitled to rely on it ? In my opinion, if a government department in its dealings with a subject takes it on itself to assume authority on a matter with which he is concerned, he is entitled to rely on it having the authority which it assumes. He does not know, and cannot be expected to know, the limits of its authority. The department itself is clearly bound, and as it is but an agent for the Crown, it binds the Crown also, and as the Crown is bound, so are the other departments, for they also are but agents of the Crown. The War Office letter, therefore, binds the Crown, and through the Crown it binds the Minister of Pensions. The function of the Minister of Pensions is to administer the Royal Warrant issued by the Crown and he must so administer it as to honour all assurances given by or on behalf of the Crown.]

In my opinion, therefore, the finding of the tribunal that the disability was not attributable to war service must be set aside. The War Office letter is binding on the Minister of Pensions and he is bound to accept the disability as "attributable to military service" for the purposes of the Royal Warrant of 1940, i.e., as "due to war service" for the purposes of art. 3 of the Royal Warrant of 1946 (Cmd. 6799). The Minister is, therefore, bound to concede that, of the three interpretations I mentioned at the beginning, either (ii) or (iii) applies, and, if there is a reasonable doubt as to which of these, the benefit must be given to Colonel Robertson. Of these two, interpretation (ii) was the interpretation intended by the War Office and is plainly the right interpretation. This appeal is, therefore, allowed. An award must issue that Colonel Robertson's disability is due to the injury of December, 1939, which was attributable to war service.

Appeal allowed.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Wallington, J.), May 13, 14, 1948.]

Variation of Settlement—Insurance policy—Sum payable on death of husband—Policy expressed to be effected under Married Women's Property Act, 1882, for benefit of wife absolutely—Payment of periodical premiums—Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (c. 75), s. 11—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (c. 49), s. 192.

The husband and wife were married in 1935, and in 1944 the husband took out a policy of insurance, whereby, subject to the payment of premiums, the sum of £5,000 was payable on his death. It was stated in the policy that the insurance was effected under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, s. 11, "for the benefit and separate use of the assured's wife" W.A.G. "absolutely." In December, 1947, the husband obtained a decree absolute of divorce from the wife, and in March, 1948, he applied to vary the policy as being a post-nuptial settlement within the meaning of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 192. It was contended by the wife that the policy did not effect a settlement, but that there was a complete gift to her of the rights thereunder:—

HELD: the wife acquired an immediate vested interest in the policy, but there was not a complete gift to her of the rights thereunder; the husband's object in taking out the policy was to make provision, by means of periodical payments, for the wife in the character of a wife; the transaction amounted to a post-nuptial settlement within the meaning of s. 192 of the Act of 1925; and, therefore, the court had jurisdiction to vary the policy.

APPLICATION on the registrar's report as to the variation of a settlement.

The husband petitioner, who had obtained a decree absolute of divorce, sought to vary a policy of insurance as being a post-nuptial settlement within the meaning of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 192. The policy, which was taken out by the husband after the marriage, was expressed to be effected under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, "for the benefit and separate use of the assured's wife" (the wife respondent) "absolutely." WALLINGTON, J., held that the transaction amounted to a settlement within the meaning of s. 192 of the Act of 1925, and, therefore, the court had jurisdiction to vary the policy. The facts appear in the judgment.

Maurice Berkeley and J. L. S. Hale for the husband.

J. A. Brightman for the wife.

WALLINGTON, J. : The parties were married on Sept. 20, 1935, and there are three children of the marriage living, Robert aged about 11, Christine aged about 8, and Clive aged about 3. The parties lived together for some time, and on Apr. 16, 1947, the husband signed a petition that was filed on Apr. 18, 1947, in which he asked for the dissolution of his marriage with his wife on the ground of her adultery with the co-respondent, Edgar Stirling, from Mar. 29, 1947, onwards. On Oct. 15, 1947, that suit was heard and a decree nisi was pronounced, that decree being made absolute on Dec. 1, 1947. On Feb. 9, 1944, some 3 years or more before the proceedings began, and, therefore, at a time when the husband would have had no suspicion that anything was likely to cause shipwreck to the marriage, he took out a policy of insurance with the Commercial Union Assurance Co., Ltd., taking advantage of the provisions in s. 11 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882. By the policy, subject, of course, to the payment of premiums, the sum of £5,000 was payable to the payees under the policy. The schedule to the policy identified the payees as the person or persons under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, to receive the policy moneys, and the event assured against was the death of the life assured. A space is reserved on this type of policy for special conditions to be set out. In this case there is one special condition, the effect of which is as follows :

“ This insurance is effected under the provisions of the Married Women’s Property Act, 1882, for the benefit and separate use of the assured’s wife Winifred Agnes Gunner formerly Watkinson absolutely.”

A That policy was effected some eight and a half years after the marriage had been solemnised.

The decree having been made absolute, the husband, on Mar. 18, 1948, gave notice and set down for hearing before the registrar an application to vary the policy, described in the notice of application as “ a post-nuptial settlement made on Feb. 9, 1944, effected under the Married Women’s Property Act, 1882, by extinguishing all the interests of the respondent in the said policy absolutely.”

B That came before the learned registrar on May 5, 1948, and he signed a report in which he said that, with the approval of both parties, he was referring the matter to the judge for the determination of the question : Can the policy be regarded as a settlement at all ? That now comes before me for determination.

C First, I do not think it necessary to set out in any detail the various contentions and the bases on which those contentions rest on both sides. It is enough to say that counsel for the husband pressed for the variation of this policy as a settlement within the provisions of s. 192 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, which, to all intents and purposes, for the purpose of this case at least, is in effect the same as the previous legislative provision dealing with this type of matter, viz., s. 5 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859, so that the authorities presented to me that came into existence before the existing

D provision are applicable to matters arising under the present section.

The Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 192, provides :

E “ The court may after pronouncing a decree for divorce or for nullity of marriage inquire into the existence of ante-nuptial or post-nuptial settlements made on the parties whose marriage is the subject of the decree, and may make such orders with reference to the application of the whole or any part of the property settled either for the benefit of the children of the marriage or of the parties to the marriage, as the court thinks fit, and the court may exercise the powers conferred by this sub-section notwithstanding that there are no children of the marriage.”

F It is obvious that jurisdiction under the section depends on whether the transaction or document relied on as a settlement is, in fact and in law, a settlement within the meaning of that word in the section.

G Counsel for the husband has cited a number of authorities, and has submitted that the form of the transaction is immaterial, but, if the transaction, whatever be its form, is one made under the provisions of the Married Women’s Property Act, 1882,—as this plainly is—provision is made for the wife as the husband’s spouse, and is made for her in her character as his wife, and, if the legal effect of the transaction is subsisting at the material date—which is the date on which the decree was made absolute in this suit—there is a settlement within the meaning of s. 192 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925. He concedes that in this case, as in all similar cases, by reason of the provisions of s. 11 of the Act of 1882 at the moment when the policy is effected there is created

H a trust in favour of the wife, a trust under which the husband is trustee and the wife cestui que trust, the husband as trustee being subject to all the duties and obligations of a trustee, and the wife, immediately on the policy being effected, becoming entitled to a vested interest in the policy. He further submits that the trust is one which continues, and in this case has continued, down to and beyond the crucial date, that none of the policy moneys has been received by anybody, the event on which they can be received by anybody not having arrived, and, therefore, the document and the accompanying facts constitute a settlement which is within s. 192. Counsel for the wife, on the other hand, has contended that there can be no settlement if there is an out and out gift, that in this case the legal effect of the policy is to make over to the wife a complete gift of the rights under the policy, and that, with the payment of each premium by the husband, the husband automatically loses any right in the premium that is paid. He added that the wife becomes under the provisions of the policy the donee of the policy and of the advantages of each separate premium when it is paid. That is the fundamental basis on which counsel for the wife rests his case.

It is not necessary for me to discuss the various authorities in detail. It is agreed that the cases cited by counsel for the husband are the only cases that are of any real assistance on this point. The circumstances of each of these cases have been closely investigated and learned counsel on both sides have pointed out their distinguishing features. Counsel for the husband, on the one hand, has indicated with clarity and accuracy the features in the decided cases which, he submits, support the view that this is a case of a settlement within the section under which this jurisdiction arises. Counsel for the wife has also shown clearly that the cases in which variations have been made in different types of transaction which have been held to be variable settlements depend, for example, on the existence of a burden or obligation on the person making the settlement, in this case the husband. Counsel for the husband says that that is not conclusive, his submission being that one has to look at the real purpose of the transaction. If the real purpose of the present transaction is to be effected, the husband must go on paying the premiums because, unless he does so, neither he nor anyone else can ever get the benefit of the policy moneys which will cease to be payable.

In my view, this policy was taken out by the husband when he had no reason to suppose that there would be any likelihood of the marriage being broken up. He effected it in order that, by periodical payments, he might be able at the expiration of the period mentioned in the policy to make a provision to the extent of £5,000 for his wife because she was his wife and because for that reason he desired to provide for her. The event on the happening of which the sum is to be paid is the death of the assured, i.e., the husband. That would obviously be a time at which, in his view, the wife, left as a widow, would be in need of the provision. It is not stretching one's imagination too far to say that it may well have been that in 1944, when this marriage was eight and a half years old and the husband was about 35 years of age, he would be unable, unless he made some arrangement of this kind, to make such a provision as he felt his wife would be in need of at his death. It cannot be supposed, in my view, that he would have dreamt of making such provision if she had not been his wife and if he had not felt himself under an obligation to do his best for her because she was his wife. It follows, therefore, that this provision was made for her in her character of a wife, and it is plain that, unless the husband went on paying the premiums, although under no contractual obligation to pay them, it would be impossible for him to achieve the purpose that he must have had in mind when he effected the policy. Again, it must be remembered that if, in the circumstances that have happened, he continues to pay the premiums, he will be continuing to make provision for a woman who is no longer his wife and has ceased to be his wife, because she has elected, or has not resisted the temptation, to indulge in a matrimonial offence which has brought the marriage to an end.

The authorities which have been relied on are, first, Cousins v. Sun Life Assurance Society (1) in the Court of Appeal, Worsley v. Worsley and Wignall (2), Dormer (otherwise Ward) v. Ward (3), Bosworthick v. Bosworthick (4), Stedall v. Stedall (5), Prinsep v. Prinsep (6), Melwill v. Melwill and Woodward (7) and Smith v. Smith (8). Those are the authorities on which counsel for the husband relied in support of his case that this transaction created a settlement within the meaning of s. 192. There are three other cases that he cited, in order to make the list of authorities complete, on which he does not rely but on which counsel for the wife does. They are Chalmers v. Chalmers (9), Hubbard v. Hubbard (10) and Brown v. Brown (11). I need refer only to one or two of those cases to illustrate the kind of view that has been expressed when this question has come before the court.

A In Cousins v. Sun Life Assurance Society (1), LORD HANWORTH, M.R., said ([1933] Ch. 132) :

B “Our attention has been called to a great number of cases, but the point seems really to be plain enough, and there is certainly one previous decision which supports the view come to by this court. It will be observed that the policy is declared to be for the benefit of a named wife. Two sections in successive Married Women’s Property Acts have dealt with the case of an insurance policy taken out by a husband or a wife for the benefit of the other.”

After dealing at some length with s. 10 of the Act of 1870, LORD HANWORTH, M.R., said (ibid., 134) with regard to the provisions of the Married Women’s Property Act, 1882 :

C “. . . I have looked in vain for any statement introducing a contingency to negative the creation of a vested interest in favour of this named wife. It is suggested that the section provides in certain events for the policy moneys reverting to and becoming part of the estate of the insured person. But when is this to happen ? ”

D HIS LORDSHIP then dealt with that in full, and ultimately he came to the conclusion that is set out in the headnote :

“ . . . the wife took an immediate vested interest in the policy which passed on her death in the husband’s lifetime to her personal representatives as part of her estate.”

E In that case the husband, who had issued the policy, had claimed against the assurance company and the executors of his wife, who had died on Oct. 3, 1931, that he was the sole beneficiary. That case establishes plainly in a case such as the present that the wife does acquire an immediate vested interest. About that there is no question, but the further question is whether that fact prevents the transaction—I use that neutral expression—being a “settlement” within s. 192 of the Act of 1925.

F In Bosworthick v. Bosworthick (4) the question was whether a bond executed by a wife securing to a husband an immediate annuity of £300 for his life was a settlement within the meaning of this section. The headnote indicates that the court came to the conclusion that :

G “. . . a liberal interpretation according to their obvious purpose must be given to s. 5 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859, and s. 192 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, and that although the bond did not involve the settlement of property, or a charge on property, for successive interests, it nevertheless amounted to a post-nuptial settlement within the meaning of those sections, and that the court had power, consequent upon the dissolution of the marriage, to deal with the bond and discharge it.”

H That case is enlightening on two matters, one that a transaction may be a “settlement” within the meaning of s. 192 of the Act of 1925 although it falls far short of the requirements which Chancery judges and practitioners in the Chancery Courts would demand before agreeing that it constituted a settlement. It follows, therefore, that I need not find anything like a strict settlement in order to invoke the jurisdiction of this section. A second thing that emerges from Bosworthick v. Bosworthick (4) is that, having dealt fully with a number of cases, including Dormer v. Ward (3) in the Court of Appeal, LORD HANWORTH, M.R., stated ([1927] P. 70) that GORELL BARNES, J., who dealt with Dormer v. Ward (3) in the court below :

"... appears to have taken the view that the covenant merely created a debt, and that he ought not to make an order dealing with it. But on appeal, in spite of the argument urged in support of the decision in the court below, the Court of Appeal held that it had jurisdiction to deal with the covenant apart from the settlement, and if we were to hold that there was no jurisdiction in the present case, I think that we should be running counter to the decision of this court in Dormer v. Ward (3), which we cannot do. On consideration of the authorities, the ground of my decision is that the section is to be construed liberally and widely, and I do not intend to narrow the meaning of the word 'settlement.'"

ROMER, J., who was then sitting in the Court of Appeal, delivered a short judgment in the course of which he said (ibid., 72) :

"We have had numerous authorities cited to us going as far back as 1861, and amongst them an authority which is binding on this court, and in my judgment those authorities establish that where a husband has made provision for his wife, or a wife for her husband, in the nature of periodical payments, that amounts to a settlement within the meaning of the sections. That may appear to be a very liberal construction of the sections, but I think that it is no more liberal a construction than should be given to them having regard to the obvious purposes for which they were enacted by the legislature."

In Prinsep v. Prinsep (6) HILL, J., said ([1929] P. 232) :

"The main point in issue is whether the settlement of Aug. 25, 1920, is a 'post-nuptial settlement on the parties' within the meaning of s. 192 of the Judicature Act, 1925."

The document he was there referring to was a deed whereby the mother of the husband brought into a settlement trust funds amounting to a large sum of money, and by a deed of separation entered into by the husband and the wife on Feb. 23, 1926, the wife was to receive an allowance from the husband of £2,000 a year for life, of which any moneys received by her under the settlement of 1920 should be treated as part payment and satisfaction. The court treated the matter of the allowances by the husband under the separation deed as a settlement within the meaning of this section. The learned judge went on to say :

"Is it upon the husband in the character of husband or in the wife in the character of wife, or upon both in the character of husband and wife? If it is, it is a settlement on the parties within the meaning of the section. The particular form of it does not matter. It may be a settlement in the strictest sense of the term, it may be a covenant to pay by one spouse to the other, or by a third person to a spouse. What does matter is that it should provide for the financial benefit of one or other or both of the spouses as spouses and with reference to their married state. Is the settlement of Aug. 25, 1920, of that character? It was made at a time when there was a husband, Mr. Prinsep, and there was a wife, Mrs. Prinsep, and there was also a child of the marriage. In terms, it has in contemplation Mr. Prinsep, whom it designates 'principal beneficiary,' but it also has in contemplation his then wife, Mrs. Prinsep, and any future wife and his child and any future children. The trustees are, however, given a very wide discretion. Clause 3 deals with income. During the lifetime of Mr. Prinsep it is to be applied for the benefit of all or any one of the following, Mr. Prinsep, his issue by any marriage and any wife of his, as the trustees in their absolute discretion think fit; and if no wife or issue is living then they have the like discretion as between Mr. Prinsep and the persons who would be entitled if he were dead."

HILL, J., then dealt with the precise question in detail, but those are the passages to which I desire to refer as indicating the basis on which he considered the question whether the deeds and documents with which he was dealing constituted a settlement or not.

Melville v. Melville (7) is important on the same question, as LORD HANWORTH, M.R., said ([1930] P. 171) :

“The interpretation which is to be given to the section has been laid down in a number of cases as a wide interpretation. In Worsley v. Worsley (2) LORD PENZANCE says : ‘The court would have a great difficulty in saying that any deed which is a settlement of property, made after marriage, and on the parties to the marriage, is not a post-nuptial settlement. It would not be justified in narrowing the reasonable scope of the words used in the section. The substance of the matter is, that the legislature by this section has armed the court with authority to make special arrangements in the case of a woman being found guilty of adultery, in reference to property settled upon her in her character as a wife.’ The same interpretation of the section was adopted by GORELL BARNES, J., as he then was, in Blood v. Blood (12), where he says : ‘Those words are extremely wide, and I am anxious that they should not, by any construction the court may put upon them, be narrowed in any way.’ In Churchward v. Churchward (13), SIR SAMUEL EVANS, P., says : ‘I adopt in the fullest sense, both in the letter and the spirit, the words of GORELL BARNES, J., in Blood v. Blood (12).’ He then quotes the passage to which I have just referred, and adds : ‘To narrow them would be undesirable for this reason : the various circumstances which come before the court, and for which this section is brought into operation, are so diverse that it is to my mind extremely important that, so far as possible, the court should have power to deal with all the cases that come before it, and, in dealing with them, to meet the justice of the case.’”

Later in his judgment LORD HANWORTH, M.R., said ([1930] P. 173) :

“I think the court ought always to bear in mind the words which have been used by GORELL BARNES, J., and approved by SIR SAMUEL EVANS, P., that the section is intended to be a wide one and embraces a large number of settlements which might not appear to be settlements in the strict terms of a conveyancer, because the section is intended to operate in a number of cases not easy to catalogue under any definition. But we have it stated in Bosworthick v. Bosworthick (4) that there may be a settlement, although it does not involve the settlement of property, or a charge of property for successive interests. In that case there was an annuity secured by a bond, and it was held to be a settlement within the terms of the section.”

In Smith v. Smith (8) there was a house owned jointly by a husband and a wife as joint tenants and the details of the case are set out. I need not refer to them. In that case DENNING, J., came to the conclusion, and, if I may say so with respect, the right conclusion, that the transaction was within the provisions of the section because there was, in fact, a settlement of the property for the reasons which are set out in the judgment.

These are, I think, the essential features of the authorities to which I have referred and I ought now to mention Chalmers v. Chalmers (9), Hubbard v. Hubbard (10) and Brown v. Brown (11) which were relied on by counsel for the wife as showing that the case before me is not affected by those on which counsel for the husband particularly relies. In Chalmers v. Chalmers (9), there was an absolute assignment of property subject to mortgages. SIR FRANCIS JEUNE, P., in his judgment used this phrase (68 L.T. 29) :

“A settlement means the settlement of property subsisting between husband and wife, and the Act gives power to alter or vary it when, and only when, the relation of husband and wife has ceased to subsist. The power to dispose of it absolutely does not seem to be the test."

That was a case in which the court held there was no settlement variable under the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859, s. 5, because there was a complete and completed assignment by the wife to the husband and the property had entirely passed. Hubbard v. Hubbard (10) was somewhat, though not exactly, similar. There the husband had assigned to a trustee a leasehold house and some furniture, on trust to assign the same at once to the wife absolutely, and the trustee assigned the same accordingly. The wife having obtained a decree of nullity, the Court of Appeal held that the assignment was not a settlement within the provisions of s. 5 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859. Brown v. Brown (11) was a case in which a wife had purchased an annuity and the society granting the annuity had covenanted to pay it to the husband or his assigns. The wife had parted with her money and there was no possibility of anything coming back to her on the terms of the transaction, and the court held that that could not be a settlement within the meaning of this section.

In my opinion, the transaction here was a settlement within the meaning of this section, and one, therefore, that the court has jurisdiction to vary. I want to make it quite clear that I do not intend to decide that in every case in which a policy is issued by a husband or a wife in favour of the other under the provisions of or regulated by the terms of s. 11 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, there is a settlement that can be varied. That is not now before me, and there may be many variations in the terms of a policy which can take advantage of the express trust to which it becomes subject when it is issued in pursuance of the provisions of that section. There may be an infinite variety of circumstances in and about the issue of the policy. There may be other accompanying documents, or there may be evidence of oral declarations and of suggestions made and accepted and of facts which show that, whatever the terms of the policy may be when construed strictly, the intention of the parties is to create, in effect, a settlement variable under this section, or there may be evidence which would alter the character of the transaction in such a way as to make it differ fundamentally from the transaction in the present case. I want to make it plain, therefore, that my decision rests on the facts and documents in this case only.

That disposes of the main point before me which is the question submitted by the learned registrar: Can the policy be regarded as a settlement? I think it can, and I have so held.

BOWN v. BOWN AND WESTON.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Wallington, J.), May 13, 1948.]

Variation of Settlement—Insurance policy—Sum payable on death of husband—Wife specified as beneficiary—Wife's rights dependent on her surviving husband—Policy obtained on payment of single premium—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (c. 49), s. 192.

On payment of a single premium, a husband obtained from an insurance company a policy whereby a certain sum was payable on his death. The wife was specified in the policy as the beneficiary, being described therein as the "wife." On obtaining a decree absolute of divorce from the wife, the husband applied to the court to vary the policy, as being a settlement within the meaning of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 192:—

HELD : the effect of the policy was that the wife would be the beneficiary during her lifetime, but her rights were contingent on her surviving the husband, and, if she did not survive him, the policy moneys would be payable to the personal representatives of the husband ; no trust, therefore, was created ; but, although there was no trust, the result of the transaction was to create a settlement within the meaning of s. 192 of the Act of 1925.

Case referred to :

(1) Gunner v. Gunner and Stirling, [1948] 2 All E.R. 771.

ADJOURNED APPLICATION on the registrar's report as to the variation of a settlement.

The husband petitioner, who had obtained a decree absolute of divorce, sought to vary a policy of insurance as being a post-nuptial settlement within the meaning of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 192. WALLINGTON, J., held that, in view of the form of the policy, the result of the transaction was to create a settlement within the meaning of the section. The facts appear in the judgment.

Victor Williams for the husband.

D. Potter for the wife.

WALLINGTON, J. : In this case the same point is raised as was raised in Gunner v. Gunner and Stirling (1) where I held that the policy under consideration was a settlement within the meaning of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 192.

There are distinguishing features between that and the present case. The most important distinction is that in Gunner v. Gunner and Stirling (1) the policy was expressly issued under the provisions of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, s. 11, with the result that all the provisions of that section applied to it and the assured became a trustee, with certain rights as to the appointment of new trustees and so on, for the wife, the main beneficiary under the policy, who became the cestui que trust. There was created a trust which existed down to and over the time when the decree absolute was made, a trust created in such form as to give to the wife, the main beneficiary, an immediate vested interest in the rights under the policy. As the wife had an immediate vested interest, those rights, if they ever matured, would come into the hands of her legal personal representative if she had previously died. That is not the position here because the wife has no such rights in the policy as had the wife in Gunner v. Gunner and Stirling (1). This is a policy whereby, on the payment of a single premium by the husband to the County Life Assurance Co., that company issued a policy whereby they undertook to pay the sum of £2,082 on the death of the assured. The effect of that policy is plainly that, as the wife of the assured is specified as the beneficiary, she would be the beneficiary during her lifetime and the policy moneys would be paid to her if she survived the assured, but, if she did not survive him, the policy moneys would be payable to the legal personal representatives of the assured and the legal personal representatives of the beneficiary would have no right to it. I have no doubt that the wife attained under the policy an immediate vested interest in whatever rights were conferred on her by the policy, but those rights were and are contingent on her surviving the assured, an event the date of which it is impossible to ascertain and one, therefore, which must be awaited. It may be that the wife will eventually receive the sum assured ; it may be that she will never receive any of it.

This policy was procured by the husband for the benefit of his wife in the limited sense indicated in it, and I entertain no doubt that it was so procured by him because he desired to make such provision for his wife as he could. Without repeating any of the considerations that led to the conclusion at which I arrived in Gunner v. Gunner and Stirling (1), viz., that the policy in that case was a settlement within s. 192 of the Act of 1925, I am satisfied that the circumstances in the present case were similar to those in that case. The motive of the husband was the same in both cases. The conclusions that I draw from the circumstances in the present case and from the form of the policy are the same as controlled my judgment in Gunner v. Gunner and Stirling (1), except that this case does not depend on the existence of a trust because the policy was not issued under s. 11 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882. The absence of a trust, however, in my opinion, makes no difference to the result of the transaction which is to create a settlement that comes within the provisions of s. 192 of the Act of 1925. The learned registrar has arrived at that conclusion and has reported accordingly and I confirm his report.

Report confirmed.

WILSON v. KINGSTON-UPON-THAMES CORPORATION.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Morris, J.), October 14, 15 and 18, 1948.]

Highway—Non-repair—Liability of local authority—Non-feasance—Road temporarily repaired by highway authority—Subsequently becoming out of repair.

Part of an asphalt roadway had twice been repaired by the highway authority, on the second occasion as a temporary repair by putting tar-macadam into a hole. The road again became in need of repair, and a cyclist riding over the hole was thrown over the handlebars and severely injured.

HELD: the lack of repair of the highway arose from non-feasance and not from misfeasance in repairing the road negligently, and, therefore, the highway authority were not liable.

ACTION for damages for personal injuries arising from negligence.

The plaintiff was thrown from his bicycle owing to the defective condition of the surface of a road. He claimed damages from the highway authority on the ground that they had recently carried out temporary repairs to that part of the highway so negligently that it had again become out of repair by the time of the accident. The court held that the cause of the accident was the lack of repair of the road, due to non-feasance and not to negligence by the highway authority, and was, therefore, not actionable. The facts appear in the judgment.

H. G. Garland for the plaintiff.

Sir Shirley Worthington-Evans for the defendants.

MORRIS, J. : On June 12, 1946, the plaintiff, Mr. Frederick Harold Louis Wilson, was riding his bicycle along Alfred Road, Kingston-upon-Thames, when, owing to the existence of a hole or depression in the surface of the roadway, he was projected over the handlebars of his bicycle and sustained injuries. The defendants are the mayor, aldermen and burgesses of the Royal Borough of Kingston-upon-Thames, and they are sued as the highway authority for the royal borough and as being the highway authority responsible for the road along which the plaintiff was cycling. [His LORDSHIP referred to the evidence on the state of the road and proceeded :] The testimony of all these witnesses is to the effect that there was in existence on the surface of the roadway an area approximately 12ins. or 15ins. in diameter in the nature of a saucer-like depression or hole, the depth of which at the centre would be about 3ins.

The matter is put on behalf of the plaintiff in the statement of claim as follows :

“ During the year before June 12, 1946, the defendants as such highway authority carried out repairs on the said Alfred Road but the said repairs were carried out so negligently that a large hole formed in the said road near to the junction of the same with Glenthorne Road. The plaintiff can give no better particulars of the said repairs until after discovery.”

Later, particulars were given setting out the dimensions of the hole. The scene of this accident was near to the junction of Alfred Road and Glenthorne Road. The surface of Alfred Road is an asphalt surface. When repairs to the roadway became necessary they were undertaken, not by the defendants, but by a company called Highways Construction Co., subject to this, that certain repairs not of a complete nature but performed by applying cold asphalt were effected from time to time by the defendants themselves. Occasionally it happened that a patch was put on an asphalt road composed of tar-macadam, but if that was done, it was done simply as an emergency and temporary measure, and no record of any such repairs would be kept. [His LORDSHIP reviewed the evidence as to actual repairs done to the road and continued :] The evidence suggested that, if tar-macadam had been put into a hole of this kind, it might, by the action of traffic passing over it be entirely displaced, for there would be no expectation that by putting tar-macadam filling into a hole or depression in an asphalt road any permanent repair would be achieved. I accept, therefore, that at some date earlier than the end of July, 1945, some repairs were made at this point, and it may well be that the workmen employed by the defendants, seeing a depression in the roadway, thought that it would be better to put some filling in the hole than to leave it as it was. The evidence, however, satisfies me that at the time immediately before this accident, there was a hole or depression in the roadway which was in need of repair. A plan which was put in by the defendants sets out the areas and dates of repairs or re-instatements effected either by the defendants or by Highways Construction Co. Areas 1 and 2 were re-instated by the Highways Construction Co. in October, 1946, at the same time as area No. 5 was re-instated. In April, 1948, a gully was taken up and more permanent work was done so as to avoid the recurrence of flooding for the future. When that gully was taken up, all the asphalt near to it was taken up, and at that time some tar-macadam was put by the employees of the defendants into the hole when the asphalt was removed. That was not a departure from ordinary practice, which was that repairs to asphalt were effected either by the corporation by the use of cold asphalt, or, if the repairs were to be more permanent, by the Highways Construction Co.

On that view of the facts it was stipulated by counsel for the plaintiff that the position here was that the plaintiff was injured as a result of misfeasance on the part of the defendants. He did not challenge the rule of law that a highway authority is not responsible for an accident which results from non-repair of a highway. It is clear, stating the matter generally, that no action is maintainable by an individual who is injured in consequence of the non-repair of a highway, but counsel for the plaintiff argued that, if he satisfied the court that some repair was done at the point where the accident later happened, and those repairs could have been achieved so that they would last and be effective at the time of the accident, he could say that the accident resulted from an act of misfeasance on the part of the defendants. He referred to some words used by LORD PARKER in Great Central Railway Co. v. Hewlett (1). LORD PARKER said ([1916] 2 A.C. 519):

"My Lords, it is undoubtedly a well-settled principle of law that when statutory powers are conferred they must be exercised with reasonable care, so that if those who exercise them could by reasonable precaution have prevented an injury which has been occasioned, and was likely to be occasioned, by their exercise, damage for negligence may be recovered."

Counsel for the plaintiff submitted that, if he has shown that some repairs were done at that point, but that those repairs were done badly, the defendants should be liable, for, he says, if the repairs were done properly the accident would not have happened. Counsel further relied on McClelland v. Manchester Corporation (2). That authority has, however, to be read in the light of the observations made by the Court of Appeal in Sheppard v. Glossop Corporation (3).

In my judgment, the submission of counsel for the plaintiff is not a valid one. The position was simply that certain repairs were at one time effected, but that after the date of such repairs the roadway had again become in a state of non-repair, and during the weeks before the date when the plaintiff had his accident the position was that this roadway was again in need of repair. This is an ordinary situation that may often happen of an accident occurring because a roadway is out of repair. The words of LORD PARKER, particularly relied on by counsel for the plaintiff, were:

"... so that if those who exercise them could by reasonable precaution have prevented an injury which has been occasioned, and was likely to be occasioned, by their exercise, damages for negligence may be recovered."

The injury to the plaintiff was not caused by the exercise on the part of the defendants of their duty to repair. It was not because they effected some temporary repair at some date before July, 1945, that this accident happened. The accident happened because the roadway was out of repair. Were I to accede to the submission made on behalf of the plaintiff, I would be not merely straining but also going in the face of the established law on this matter.

Judgment for the defendants with costs.

LLANDUDNO URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL v. GREAT ORME RAILWAY, LTD.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Jenkins, J.), October 13, 1948.]

Tramway—Purchase by local authority—Purchase price—"Total capital of company actually invested in undertaking at time of purchase"—Sale by purchasers from original company—Tramways Act, 1870 (c. 78), s. 44—Great Orme Tramways Act, 1898 (c. xxvii), s. 57 (1).

By the Great Orme Tramways Act, 1898, a tramway company was incorporated to make and maintain a tramway. The expression "company" in the Act was defined by s. 3 as meaning the company incorporated by the Act. By s. 5 of the Act: "The capital of the company shall be £25,000 in 5,000 shares of £5 each." By s. 14: "All moneys raised by the company under this Act whether by shares or borrowing shall be applied only to the purposes of this Act to which capital is properly applicable." Section 57 (1) gave the local authority power, exercisable at stated periods, to require the company to sell to them their undertaking "upon terms of paying a price equal to 28 years' purchase of an aggregate dividend or return calculated at the rate of $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on the total capital of the company actually invested in their undertaking at the time of purchase and properly expended on capital account." The Tramways Act, 1870, s. 44, which was incorporated in the Act of 1898, empowered the promoters of a tramway undertaking to sell their undertaking, after a certain period and with the necessary consent, and provided that after a sale "all the rights, powers . . . and liabilities of such promoters in respect to the undertaking sold shall be transferred to, vested in, and may be exercised by . . . the person, persons, corporation, company, or local authority to whom the same has been sold, in like manner as if such tramway was constructed by such person, persons, corporation, company, or local authority under the powers conferred on them by special Act, and in reference to the same they shall be deemed to be the promoters." In 1933, the tramway company went into liquidation, and in 1935 the tramway undertaking was sold to a railway company for £5,600. The Great Orme Tramways Act, 1936, recognised the railway company as the statutory undertaker in place of the tramway company. The paid-up share capital of the railway company was £6,000 in £1 shares. In October, 1947, the local authority, wishing to exercise the power of purchase conferred by s. 57 (1) of the Act of 1898, served a notice on the railway company requiring the company to sell the undertaking to them, and the court was asked to determine the proper method of ascertaining the purchase price, having regard to the formula in s. 57 (1) :—

E
HELD : (i) the effect of a sale under the power conferred by the Tramways Act, 1870, s. 44, was to substitute the purchaser of the undertaking for the original statutory undertaker for all purposes, and, therefore, the words "total capital of the company actually invested in their undertaking at the time of the purchase," in s. 57 (1) of the Act of 1898, referred to the capital of the railway company.

F
(ii) on the true construction of the Act of 1898, "the capital of the company," for the purposes of s. 57 (1) was not confined to share capital, but included capital, whether derived from loans or any other source, which was actually invested in the undertaking at the time of the purchase.

G
(iii) the effect of the words, "at the time of purchase," in s. 57 (1) was that the capital referred to was not capital which had from time to time been invested in the undertaking down to the time of purchase, but capital in the state of being actually invested at the time of purchase, and, therefore, the price payable by the local authority was 28 years' purchase at $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. of the total sums expended by the railway company in the acquisition of the capital assets of the tramway company and any other capital assets belonging to the railway company in respect of the undertaking, or as part of the undertaking, at the date of purchase, less any sum written off in respect of depreciation.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine questions relating to the method of ascertaining, under the Great Orme Tramways Act, 1898, s. 57 (1), the purchase price payable by the local authority on acquiring the tramway undertaking from a railway company which had purchased it on the liquidation of the original statutory company. The facts appear in the headnote and the judgment.

FitzGerald, K.C., and Maurice Berkeley for the local authority. .
Gray, K.C., and Wilfrid Hunt for the railway company.

JENKINS, J. : This summons concerns the acquisition by the Llandudno Urban District Council, to which I will refer as "the council," of a tramway undertaking now carried on by the Great Orme Railway, Ltd. The questions which I have to decide relate to the method of ascertaining the price payable by the council on the acquisition of the undertaking under a power reserved in the special Act.

The tramway in question is a statutory undertaking which was originally carried on by the Great Orme Tramway Co., to which I will refer as the tramway company. The tramway company was a statutory company incorporated by a private Act entitled the Great Orme Tramways Act, 1898. The preamble to that Act recited inter alia :

"Whereas the making and maintaining of a tramway and tramroad from Llandudno to or near the summit of the Great Ormeshead in the county of Carnarvon would be of local and public advantage : And whereas the persons in that behalf in this Act named with others are willing at their own expense to construct such tramway and tramroad if authorised by Parliament so to do and are desirous of being incorporated into a company with adequate powers for the purpose and it is expedient that they be incorporated and empowered accordingly as by this Act provided . . ."

Sections 1 and 2 of the Act provide :

"1. This Act may be cited as the Great Orme Tramways Act, 1898.
 2. The Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and pt. I (relating to cancellation and surrender of shares) of the Companies Clauses Act, 1863, as amended by subsequent Acts the Lands Clauses Acts, s. 3 (interpretation of terms) and pts. II and III of the Tramways Act, 1870 (except s. 43 of the said Act) and the provisions of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, with respect to mines lying under and near to the railway are so far as they are applicable to and except where expressly varied by this Act incorporated with and form part of this Act."

Section 3 contains certain definitions :

"In this Act the several words and expressions to which meanings are assigned by the Acts wholly or partially incorporated herewith have (unless the context otherwise requires) the same respective meanings And in this Act the expression 'company' means the company incorporated by this Act . . ."

I go to s. 5 :

"The capital of the company shall be £25,000 in 5,000 shares of £5 each."

Section 14 says :

"All moneys raised by the company under this Act whether by shares or borrowing shall be applied only to the purposes of this Act to which capital is properly applicable."

Section 57 contains the power of acquisition which gives rise to the present question. It provides :

"For the protection of the Llandudno Urban District Council (hereinafter called 'the council') the following provisions shall have effect (that is to say) :—(1) The council may if by resolution passed at a special meeting they so decide within 6 months after the expiration of a period of 28 years from the passing of this Act and within 6 months after the expiration of every subsequent period of 7 years or within 3 months after any order made by the Board of Trade under s. 41 or s. 42 of the Tramways Act, 1870, by notice in writing require the company to sell and thereupon the company shall sell to them their undertaking upon terms of paying a price equal to 28 years' purchase of an aggregate dividend or return calculated at the rate of $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on the total capital of the company actually invested in their undertaking at the time of purchase and properly expended on capital account. When any such sale has been made all the rights powers and authorities of the company in respect to the undertaking sold or where any order has been made by the Board of Trade under either of the said sections all the rights powers and authorities of the company previous to the making of such order in respect to the undertaking sold shall be transferred to vested in and may be exercised by the council in like manner as nearly as may be as if the tramways were constructed by the council under the powers of this Act and in reference to the same they shall be deemed to be the company."

The Act of 1898 contains many other provisions relative to the capitalisation and working of the tramway, but for the present purpose I think those are the only provisions to which I need refer.

Under that Act the tramway company duly executed the authorised works and carried on the tramway undertaking with a reasonable degree of success down to 1932. In or about that year an accident occurred to one of the tramway company's vehicles which resulted in heavy claims being made against the company and also in a certain diminution of public confidence in the safety of the tramway cars. The consequence was that the tramway company became insolvent and was put into compulsory liquidation. In that liquidation the liquidator sold the undertaking of the tramway company to a syndicate of individuals who re-sold to a new company called the Great Orme Railway, Ltd., which is the defendant to this summons, at a price of £5,600. That transaction was authorised by the provisions of the Tramways Act, 1870, s. 44, which is one of the provisions incorporated in the Act of 1898. That section is in these terms :

"Where any tramway in any district has been opened for traffic for a period of 6 months the promoters may, with the consent of the Board of Trade, sell their undertaking to any person, persons, corporation, or company, or to the local authority of such district; and when any such sale has been made all the rights, powers, authorities, obligations, and liabilities of such promoters in respect to the undertaking sold shall be transferred to, vested in, and may be exercised by, and shall attach to the person, persons, corporation, company, or local authority to whom the same has been sold, in like manner as if such tramway was constructed by such person, persons, corporation, company, or local authority under the powers conferred upon them by special Act, and in reference to the same they shall be deemed to be the promoters."

The effect of the sale by the liquidator, having regard to the terms of s. 44 of the Act of 1870—the sale having been effected with the requisite consent of the Ministry of Transport which had succeeded to the powers of the Board of Trade in the matter—was, if I may use the expression, to put the Great Orme Railway, Ltd., in the shoes of the tramway company for all purposes as if the Great Orme Railway, Ltd., had been the promoters who had constructed and who operated the railway under the Act of 1898. That position was recognised by a further private Act called the Great Orme Tramways Act, 1936, the purpose of which was to authorise the Great Orme Railway, Ltd., to which I will refer as the railway company, to make certain modified or increased charges. I do not think there is any provision of the Act of 1936 to which I need refer in detail, but it clearly recognises the position that the railway company was now the statutory undertaker in respect of the tramway undertaking which was begun by the tramway company under the Act of 1898.

That being the position in 1947 the council was minded to exercise the power of acquisition conferred on it by s. 57 (1) of the Act of 1898. It proceeded to exercise that power by a notice dated Oct. 18, 1947, given to the railway company which, in the circumstances I have stated, was the only body to which such a notice could be given. It is not disputed that the notice in question was a valid exercise by the council of the power of purchase conferred on it, and it is not disputed that the railway company is bound to carry out the sale accordingly, but questions do arise as regards the terms of sale, and, in particular, the proper method of ascertaining the purchase price, having regard to the formula dealing with that subject contained in s. 57 (1) of the Act of 1898, viz., that the council may :

“ . . . by notice in writing require the company to sell and thereupon the company shall sell to them their undertaking upon terms of paying a price equal to 28 years' purchase of an aggregate dividend or return calculated at the rate of $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on the total capital of the company actually invested in their undertaking at the time of purchase and properly expended on capital account.”

What, in the events which have happened, is the effect of that formula ? Two questions arise : First, is the total capital of the company actually invested in the company at the time of purchase and properly expended on capital account capital of the company which is now carrying on the undertaking, namely, the railway company, or is it capital of the original statutory company, namely, the tramway company. In my judgment, it is reasonably plain that in the events which have happened the company referred to can only be the railway company. As I read s. 44 of the Tramways Act, 1870, the effect of a sale under the power thereby conferred is to substitute the purchaser of the undertaking for the original statutory undertaker for all purposes. I think the old tramway company has faded out of the picture altogether and the only company now relevant is the railway company.

The relevant company thus being, in my judgment, the railway company, the second question is : What is the total capital of that company actually invested in their undertaking at the time of purchase and properly expended on capital account ? The two views are, on the one hand, that “ capital ” here means, and is confined to, paid-up share capital, the paid-up share capital of the railway company, as I understand it, being £6,000 in £1 shares, and, on the other hand, that no such limitation should be placed on the expression “ capital ” in the context afforded by s. 57 (1) of the Act of 1898. According to this view, the capital here in question is capital whencesoever derived, provided it is actually invested in the undertaking at the time of the purchase and properly expended on capital account. In support of the first view, the limited view of the expression “ capital,” I have been referred to s. 5 of the Act of 1898, which provides that the capital of the company shall be £25,000 in 5,000 shares of £5 each, and to certain references to capital in the incorporated provisions of some of the Acts mentioned in s. 2 of the Act of 1898. I am invited to hold that by definition, in effect, “ capital ” in s. 57 (1) must mean the share capital. On the other hand, I have been referred to s. 14 of the Act of 1898 which seems to recognise loan capital as being, for some purposes, at all events, capital of the company.

In my judgment, s. 57 (1) affords a sufficient context to make it reasonably plain that the capital of the company there referred to is not confined to share capital. The object of the section, quite obviously, is to provide a conventional, but reasonably fair, index of the capital value of the undertaking which the council is acquiring. For that purpose the amount of paid-up share capital of the company need not necessarily have any relevance at all. The company might well have financed itself by means of debentures or loans, and, with money so raised, have acquired capital assets of great value. I see no justification whatever for excluding capital assets thus acquired from the calculation. It is to be remembered that the phrase which I have to construe is not merely "the capital of the company," or "the total capital of the company," but :

" . . . the total capital of the company actually invested in their undertaking at the time of purchase and properly expended on capital account."

- A I think that that phrase itself indicates that something not necessarily confined to paid-up share capital is meant. There is, further, this consideration. Incorporating, as it does, s. 44 of the Tramways Act, 1870, the Act of 1898 must clearly be assumed to contemplate the possibility that the power of purchase conferred on the council might be exercised, not against the original statutory undertaker but, as, indeed, has happened, against some person or body acquiring the undertaking under s. 44. Section 44 clearly contemplates that the purchaser need not necessarily be a company. Still less need it be a company limited by shares. So that, if one considers "the capital of the company" in s. 57 (1) as meaning paid-up share capital, one must find that the sub-section has provided a formula which, in certain circumstances contemplated by the incorporating of s. 44 of the Act of 1870, might be wholly inapplicable, namely,
- C in the event of the acquisition of the undertaking by some person or body other than a company limited by shares. That is a conclusion from which one should shrink and is an added reason for holding that the capital of the company, for the purposes of s. 57 (1), is not confined to paid-up share capital. So far, therefore, the result appears to me to be that the price must be ascertained by taking 28 years' purchase at $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on the total capital of the railway company, whether paid-up share capital or capital provided in any other way,
- D actually invested in the undertaking at the time of the purchase.

- It remains to consider what is the effect of the words "at the time of purchase." The capital in question is not, it is to be observed, the capital which has from time to time been invested in the undertaking down to the time of purchase. It must be capital invested, and, furthermore, in the state of being
- E actually invested, at the time of the purchase. At one stage of his argument counsel for the railway company seemed to invite me to hold that what had to be done was to arrive at the total of capital at any time invested either by the tramway company or by its successor, the railway company. If that method was followed without qualification, very remarkable results might ensue. For instance, there would be the possibility, which I suggested in the
- F course of the argument, of some calamity destroying the tramway lines, on which, say, £10,000 had been expended, followed by a further expenditure of £10,000 to put up a new line in substitution for the line destroyed. It can hardly be that in such circumstances the council would have to pay a price calculated on the footing that the capital invested in the lines amounted to £20,000. Counsel for the railway company eventually agreed with me, I think, that some
- G provision must be made for depreciation. I think that must be right, i.e., at all events, amounts written off in the accounts as capital lost must not be written back for the purpose of arriving at the capital expended. So, in the result, the formula, as I understand it, means that the council must pay the given number of years' purchase at the stipulated percentage on a capital sum representing in substance the amount of capital assets of the railway company
- H comprised in the tramway undertaking at the date of the purchase taken at a sum representing cost less amounts written off. I appreciate that that formula leaves open a possibility of controversy in the event of there being assets which, it might be alleged by the council, were assets in respect of which some writing off ought to have taken place which has not taken place, but, if the books of the company have been properly kept, it is not a point which ought to give rise to any great difficulty.

That, I think, answers, in effect, the main question on which a decision is sought, although, perhaps, not in a form exactly according with the terms of the question in the summons. Substantially, I think it does come to a declaration in the terms of question 3 (b) of the summons, i.e., the total amount of all sums expended by the railway company prior to the relevant date in respect of capital assets belonging to the railway company as part of the undertaking at the date of purchase, less any amount written off in respect of depreciation.

Does that answer the question? It is rather a difficult question to answer clearly.

Gray, K.C.: It is a little difficult to make this clear. I understand your Lordship is intending to include, although they are the assets of the railway company, any assets of the tramway company which will exist as assets in the hands of the railway company?

JENKINS, J.: Yes. The only company which has any assets now, the only company in the picture at all, must be the existing railway company. The only undertaking the purchase of which is in question is the statutory undertaking acquired by the railway company from the tramway company. The assets to be paid for are the assets comprised in that undertaking, and the price to be paid is the amount of the capital actually invested in those assets at the date of the purchase.

Fitzgerald, K.C.: Invested by the railway company?

JENKINS, J.: In a state of being invested.

Gray, K.C.: I think, with respect, is it not what my learned friend is saying, invested by the railway company? I was going to submit that the accurate way of expressing it would be this, "the total amount of sums expended by either company."

JENKINS, J.: No. The only company which can be said now to have got any capital invested in anything for this purpose is the railway company. It has invested whatever it has paid to acquire the capital assets which it now owns in respect of this statutory undertaking, i.e., the £5,600 which it paid to the liquidator of the tramway company plus any other items of expenditure which have been applied in the acquisition of capital assets, whether the amounts were borrowed or represented money subscribed by them.

Gray, K.C.: I thought your Lordship was treating the railway company as having succeeded to the rights of the tramway company, and, therefore, as the person who had spent anything by either company so far as it still represented capital assets.

JENKINS, J.: No, that is wrong. The company is the railway company for this purpose. You have to see what capital the railway company has invested in capital assets.

Gray, K.C.: May I make sure of that by referring to the affidavit of the chairman of directors of the railway company. Assuming that we prove that the items are capital, it will be really the sums spent in acquiring the shares of the tramway company plus the sum of £1,370 17s. 7d. (as set out in sched. IV to the affidavit) which was stated in the affidavit as being a further sum actually invested in the undertaking.

Fitzgerald, K.C.: It is £5,600 plus such part of the £1,370 17s. 7d. as can be either agreed or determined to be properly spent on capital account.

JENKINS, J.: Yes. It is wrong to say the acquisition of the shares of the company. It was the undertaking which was bought. That is a very different thing. If they had bought the shares, the old company would be still there. We had better try to settle a form of declaration that everyone can agree to. It will be a declaration that the price payable by the council is 28 years' purchase at $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. of the total sums expended by the defendant company in the acquisition of the capital assets of the tramway company and any other capital assets belonging to the defendant company in respect of the said undertaking, or as part of the said undertaking, at the date of purchase, less any sum written off in respect of depreciation.

Declaration accordingly. Liberty to apply for an inquiry as to what items were properly charged. Each party to pay its own costs.

ANSELL v. MINISTER OF PENSIONS.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Denning, J.), October 4, 1948.]

Pension—Aggravation of pre-war disability—Power of tribunal finding aggravation to determine duration thereof.

The appellant contracted bronchitis while serving in the army before the war. In 1939 he re-enlisted and was passed fit for service. His duties involved guard duties in the performance of which he was exposed to the weather, and in January, 1940, he became ill with influenza and the specialist reported that he was suffering from chronic bronchitis. He continued to serve for a further two years during which time he was constantly on the sick list. In May, 1942, he was discharged, and seven months later a medical board found that his working capacity was reduced owing to shortness of breath. In 1944 his claim for a pension was rejected by a pensions appeal tribunal, and in 1947 it was rejected by a special review tribunal who found that the appellant had been in the army for "a period of service amounting to nearly three years, during which he was subject to no conditions which could be supposed to have exercised any influence on his bronchitis." His LORDSHIP held that the finding of the special review tribunal could not be reconciled with the evidence, and that the only reasonable conclusion was that at the date of the appellant's discharge his complaint had been aggravated by war service.

HELD : a tribunal which awards aggravation can itself decide how long the aggravation has continued and if and when it has passed away, provided that the parties have notice that that matter is to be considered.

APPEAL from a decision of a special review tribunal rejecting a claim to a pension put forward on the ground of aggravation of a pre-war complaint by war service. The appeal was allowed. The facts appear in the headnote.

The appellant appeared in person.

H. L. Parker for the Minister.

DENNING, J.: This case was heard by a pensions appeal tribunal on Apr. 27, 1944, and by a special review tribunal on Nov. 14, 1947. On each occasion the appellant's claim was rejected. Under the procedure laid down in Revely's case (3) I have given leave to appeal from the original decision of Apr. 27, 1944, but have treated the reasons of the special review tribunal as the Case Stated. This is, in effect, therefore, an appeal from the special review tribunal, the first of its kind. [HIS LORDSHIP stated the facts and his finding thereon and continued:] The important question arises whether a tribunal which awards aggravation can itself say for how long the aggravation continued, and if and when it has passed away. I think it can. Some people seem to have thought that it could not do so because of the decision in Shipp's case (1). If so, they are under a misapprehension as to the effect of that case. In Shipp's case (1) a claim was made immediately on discharge and I held that the Minister and the tribunal ought to have confined their award to aggravation at the date of discharge and ought not to have gone on to hold that the aggravation had passed away at a later date. The reason for that decision was that Mr. Shipp had no notice that the point (as to the cessation of aggravation) was to be considered and had no opportunity of dealing with it. The decision turned on that special consideration. In cases where the applicant knows that the point is to be considered, the Minister and the tribunal are entitled to consider the duration of the aggravation, not only in the case of a belated claim (as in Knight's case (2)), but also in the case of an immediate claim. A claim which is made immediately on discharge takes some time to reach a pensions appeal tribunal, and the claimant usually claims not only that the disease was aggravated at the date of discharge, but also that it remains aggravated at the date of hearing. When the Minister rejects the claim, he says that the disease was not aggravated either at the date of discharge or at the date of the hearing. The evidence before the tribunal consists not only of the man's medical history during his service but also after it, such as the findings of medical boards, the opinions of medical attendants, the examination by the medical member, and so forth, all of which bring the position right down to the date of hearing. In those circumstances it is obviously undesirable that the tribunal should confine itself to the moment of discharge and leave the question of duration to another tribunal. In my judgment, in the absence of special circumstances, it is right and proper that the tribunal should consider not only the question whether aggravation remained at the date of discharge, but also the question whether it remained aggravated at the date of hearing, and, if it had passed away, at what date it passed away. There is no legal objection to that course so long as both parties have notice of the case they have to meet. The claim is a continuing claim and the rejection is a continuing rejection, and in the ordinary way, as I said in Pretty's case (1) ([1946] 1 All E.R. 419), "not only existing disablement and aggravation can be dealt with by the Minister, and on appeal by the Tribunal, but also past disablement and past aggravation." Shipp's case (1) is distinguishable because in the special circumstances of that case the claim was not a continuing claim, but was confined to the moment of discharge.

In all cases, therefore, of aggravation which come before the tribunals, whether they be cases where aggravation is considered for the first time, or cases in which a tribunal is considering whether aggravation still remains, I am of opinion that it is open to the tribunals to find that any aggravation passed away at an earlier date, that is, at any time since discharge. In the present case I shall allow the appeal and direct that an award be made of aggravation as at the date of discharge, but I shall remit the case to a tribunal to determine whether the aggravation still remains, or, if it has already passed away, at what date it did so.

Solicitor: Treasury Solicitor (for the respondent).

ROBINSON v. BAILEY.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Greene, M.R., Somervell and Evershed, L.JJ.), October 13, 14, 1948.]

Right of Way—Excessive user—Grant of right of way to part of residential estate—User for business purposes.

The plaintiff acquired a piece of land of some 15 acres which he began to develop as a residential estate. He sold a plot of about $\frac{1}{4}$ acre to the defendant, at the date of the sale certain roadways having been laid out on the estate in a rudimentary fashion. The defendant's plot faced one of these roadways which was called Oak Way and led into a public highway, being 20ft. wide at one end and 30ft. wide at the other. By the conveyance the defendant covenanted that one house only would be erected on the plot and the conveyance also included a grant of a "right of way over Oak Way and the right to connect with the sewers and services laid under the said road." The plaintiff also covenanted with the defendant that he "will duly make up and complete and maintain the road called Oak Way and the footpaths thereof . . . and will duly pay all charges in respect thereof until the said road shall have been taken over as a public road by the local authority . . ." The defendant, who was a builder, began himself to build a dwelling-house on his plot, but was unable to complete it owing to the limits of his licence. He, therefore, used the land and the partially built house for storing building materials, and from time to time lorries used Oak Way to deliver or collect such materials. The plaintiff sought to restrain this user of Oak Way as excessive, on the ground that an increased burden in respect of maintenance was thereby thrown on him and such user was not permissible under the grant of the right of way.

HELD: the question of the scope of a right of way expressed in a grant or reservation was prima facie one of construction of the words used, but if those words were susceptible of being cut down by some implication from surrounding circumstances—if, to construe them properly, it were necessary to look at the surrounding circumstances—they would be cut down; there was nothing in the circumstances in the present case limiting the words by which the grant was effected; the user complained of was covered by those words; and it was, therefore, rightful.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from an order of HARMAN, J., dated Feb. 25, 1948, refusing damages for trespass and an injunction to restrain the defendant's user of a right of way, which the plaintiff, the servient owner, alleged to be excessive. The Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of LORD GREENE, M.R.

Paget, K.C., and P. H. R. Bristow for the plaintiff.

Pascoe Hayward, K.C., and D. A. Ziegler for the defendant.

LORD GREENE, M.R.: Both parties are builders. The plaintiff, Mr. Robinson, acquired a piece of land at Ashstead, in Surrey. It was registered, and in the transfer under which he acquired it he entered into certain covenants with his vendors, restrictive of the user of the land. Those relevant were as follows :

"No building shall be erected on the said land except private detached dwelling-houses of not less than [a certain cost]. No trade manufacture or business shall be carried on upon the said land or any part thereof and nothing shall be done or permitted on the said land which shall be or become a nuisance or injury to the company or the owners or occupiers of any of the adjoining land."

The plaintiff proceeded to develop this piece of land, which comprises some 15 acres, as a residential estate. Whether or not the dealing with this land was such as to bring into existence a building scheme with the resulting rights of purchasers of plots inter se under such a scheme, I do not know, but I am prepared to assume in the plaintiff's favour that any purchasers of other plots on this land would have been entitled to enforce, had they so chosen, against another purchaser, the original restrictive covenants in the conveyance to the plaintiff. I am assuming that, but, of course, anyone acquainted with the law relating to building schemes knows that there is many a slip 'twixt the cup and the lip when one tries to establish such mutual obligations between purchasers of plots.

The defendant purchased a plot, and, at the date when he purchased, certain roadways on the estate had been laid out in the more or less rudimentary way with which one is familiar in the development of such estates. Apparently, certain plots had been sold and houses had been erected on them. The defendant purchased a plot facing on one of the sites of roadways known as Oak Waye. According to the plan with reference to which that transfer was made, the whole of Oak Waye on both sides was at that stage open land with no buildings erected thereon. The defendant purchased the plot, and the registered transfer to him, dated July 7, 1945, conveyed the plot together with a certain right of way which is the subject of the present controversy.

At the moment I will pass that over and will come down to the covenants as to user and so forth that the plaintiff chose to impose on the defendant. They were : "That one house only shall be erected on the said land . . . in accordance with plans approved by the transferor." There followed a covenant as to building line and a covenant as to maintenance of a hedge, and then there came this :

"When the purchaser decides to erect a house on the said land he shall give the vendor the first opportunity of tendering for the erection thereof."

For a reason which, no doubt, appeared good to him, the plaintiff did not exact from the defendant a covenant in any way commensurate with the covenant which he himself had entered into with his own vendors. There is no restrictive covenant confining any house built to private residential purposes. All that the covenants come to appears to me to be that, if a building were erected, it was to be a house. It is not confined to a private dwelling-house. So long as it is a house, that would be in compliance with the covenant. There is no covenant to erect a house, nothing to prevent the purchaser leaving the land completely vacant. There is no restrictive covenant as to the use of the land and, therefore, assuming that a building erected on it could only be used as a house, so long as no house was built there, the soil and the surface could be used for any purpose whatsoever, including the carrying on of a trade or business. I should add that this plot is about a quarter of an acre in size. This estate was subject to the Leatherhead and Ashstead Building Scheme under the Town and Country Planning Act, 1932, and under that Act certain restrictions on the erection of buildings on the land were imposed. Those building restrictions had the effect, unless waived, of preventing any houses being built other than residential houses, but it is important to remember that the local authority concerned in preparing this scheme had, in appropriate circumstances, the right to waive those restrictions or to modify or obtain the modification of the scheme.

I will now refer to the right of way comprised in the assurance. It was in the following language :

A "With right of way over Oak Waye and the right to connect with the sewers and services laid under the said road."

Oak Waye is shown on the map as a road of 20ft. breadth at one end and 30ft. breadth at the other. It leads into a public highway, or what appears to be a public highway. The assurance further contains this covenant :

B "The transferor hereby covenants with the transferee that he the transferor will duly make up and complete and maintain the road called Oak Waye and the foot paths thereof and the sewerage paving and lighting thereof and will duly pay all charges in respect thereof until the said road shall have been taken over as a public road by the local authority and will keep indemnified the transferee from and against all such charges and all actions claims and payments in respect thereof."

C In so far, therefore, as the nature of the road is to be collected from this document coupled with the plans, it is to be a road paved, sewered and lit and such a road as eventually will be taken over as a public road by the local authority. Merely taking the language of that document, there is no restriction whatsoever imposed on the nature of the right of way being conferred. There is nothing there which in any way limits what on the face of it is a perfectly unrestricted right of way, and, if the matter had stood there, I should have thought that there was no question that the user now complained of was permissible and was contemplated at that time. As EVERSHED, L.J., pointed out during the argument, it was competent for the vendor to restrict the right of way which he was granting, if he had wished, and there are well-known formulae for doing that. He did not do so. He chose what, in language, at any rate, is unrestricted.

E Counsel for the plaintiff invokes the principle which he finds stated in the judgment of FARWELL, J., in Todrick v. Western National Omnibus Co. (1). The principle on which he relies I can take from the headnote.

F "... in judging whether there is an excessive user of the right regard must be had to 'the circumstances of the case, the situation of the parties and the situation of the land'."

G Before I come to examine that principle and the case on which it was founded, I ought to say a word or two more on a subject I have not yet dealt with, and that is the nature of the user which is complained of. The learned judge did not find that the user complained of went anything like as far as the plaintiff asserted that it did, but for the purpose of dealing with the point I am not concerned with whether the plaintiff's allegations are to be supported or not on the evidence because we have not gone into that aspect of the matter. The defendant himself began to erect a house on this plot, but certain parts were never completed as the building was not covered by the licence which the defendant had obtained. It is said against him that he used the plot for the purposes of his business as a builder in that he stored builder's materials in the garden and the unfinished part of the house, and in connection with that business that he had encouraged or permitted or invited heavy lorries containing builder's materials to go up Oak Waye and deposit their contents at the house or to go up empty and take materials away. It is not said that the user of this road for a lorry was illegitimate. The right of way given, it is agreed, includes the right to bring a lorry up the road to the plot in question. It is said, however, that there has been an excessive user of that right because the quantity of lorry traffic that one would expect in the case of user as a private house is limited, and something far in excess of that has been brought up the road, this user of the road by lorries being an extended and repeated user as distinct from the limited and occasional class of user that would be expected in the case of a private dwelling-house. It is, therefore, quantity and purpose that are complained of, and not the actual nature of the vehicle. Counsel for the plaintiff says that the effect of that business user has been to impose on the vendor, the plaintiff, under his covenant an excessive burden in the maintenance of the road.

As I have said, this plot is under no restriction as to user, vis-a-vis the plaintiff, save possibly to the extent that, if a building is erected on the plot, it must be used as a house and nothing but a house. In so far as, under building scheme law or under the town planning scheme, there were at the date of the transfer restrictions on the user of the land which would bind the purchaser at the instance of third parties or, in the case of a town planning scheme, at the instance of the local authority, these were all restrictions that could be got rid of next week. I use the language of HAMILTON, L.J., in White v. Grand Hotel, Eastbourne, Ltd. (2) in relation to the facts then before the court. He said ([1913] 1 Ch. 117) :

"The house in the present case was used as a private dwelling-house in 1883, but with the consent of a third person it might be, as in fact it was, turned into a house which could be used for the purpose of trade."

I will assume that at the date of the transfer in the present case any house erected on this site could only be used as a private dwelling-house in the sense that any other user could be restrained either by the purchasers of other plots, or by the original vendor to the plaintiff, or by the local authority. The position, as HAMILTON, L.J., said, was that with the consent of a third party—that is to say, those parties—those restrictions could all be avoided. Counsel for the plaintiff says that at the date of this transfer it must have been in the contemplation of the parties that this plot could never be used for any other purpose than the building of a residential house. As between the parties there is nothing so to confine the user, and I cannot see how it can be said that as between the parties a limitation on user could not be lifted when the only effective restrictions were under the control, not of the plaintiff, the vendor, but of third parties, with whose consent they might be waived. That the parties must have contemplated that for ever this plot of land would be subject to these restrictions seems to me to be an assumption which we cannot possibly make. In my view, in those circumstances it is impossible to treat the sort of surrounding circumstances which counsel for the plaintiff relies on, that is to say, the contemplated user that he says must have been in the minds of the parties, as effective to limit the wide words which the vendor has chosen to use in making this grant of the right of way.

That appears to me to be sufficient to dispose of this case, but there are certain authorities to which counsel for the plaintiff referred and to which I desire to make reference. The first was the case I have already mentioned, Todrick v. Western National Omnibus Co. (1), in which a right of way was reserved in the following terms, stating what is essential for this purpose :

"Excepting and reserving in fee simple unto the vendor his heirs and assigns . . . from time to time of all or any part of the vendor's said adjoining property . . . and all persons going to or from any part of the last mentioned property a perpetual right of way . . . for all purposes with or without vehicles and animals from and to the public highway . . . over across and along the private road or way coloured yellow on the said plan . . . and the right to construct an extension of such road . . ."

The defendants had become the persons entitled to exercise that right of way, which was a peculiar one. The roadway was very narrow and it was held up by a retaining wall to prevent it slipping down the valley. The defendants were attempting to use this road for their motor omnibuses which they were garaging on the land, and the argument put forward was : " Here is a reservation of a right of way in unlimited language, and, therefore, we can use this right of way for any type of vehicle and any purpose for which the most extensive right of way can be used ". In relation to that proposition FARWELL, J., stated the principle which I have already read from the headnote. While not in any

A way dissenting from that statement as a general proposition, I would like to give this word of caution, that it is a principle which must not be allowed to carry the court blindly. Obviously the question of the scope of the right of way expressed in a grant or reservation is prima facie a question of construction of the words used. If those words are susceptible of being cut down

B by some implication from surrounding circumstances, it being, to construe them properly, necessary to look at the surrounding circumstances, of course they would be cut down. Todrick's case (1) is a very good example of the sort of application of the rule which FARWELL, J., was enunciating. Finding, as he did, a right of way reserved over a hereditament which was in such a physical condition that it was not capable of carrying such heavy traffic as omnibuses,

C he said he was unable to construe the grant in such a way that the grantee would be entitled to take over the road vehicles which were wider or heavier than the road could be asked to bear. There were two factors. The breadth of the omnibus, which would only allow $1\frac{1}{2}$ ins. margin at either side as it went through a certain arch, and the strength of the retaining wall and the effect on it of the passage of motor omnibuses and heavy vehicles over the part

D of the road held up by it made it clear that that kind of thing never could have been contemplated. The learned judge, I think, really came to his conclusion on this ground. He looked at the subject-matter of the reservation, namely, the piece of ground over which the easement was to exist, and, finding it in the condition which I have mentioned, he construed the right of way as limited in its user. Counsel for the plaintiff argued that the user which FARWELL, J., found was wrongful was not the user for omnibuses, but the user for a

E frequent passage of omnibuses. I do not so read the judgment. The case went to the Court of Appeal where the point was not really argued, but LORD HANWORTH, M.R., in referring to it, stated the width of the bus and the narrowness of the roadway as the things which impressed his mind in coming to the same conclusion as that to which the learned judge had come. MAUGHAM, L.J., on the other hand, was prepared to pay more attention to the weight

F of the vehicle. However that may be, this court expressed its approval of the decision to which FARWELL, J., had come.

The present case appears to me to be entirely different. There is no limitation to be extracted from the nature of the land over which the right was granted. The land over which the right was granted was not only laid out or going to be laid out as a 20ft. to 30ft. roadway, but it was to be a road of such a character

G that the local authority in due course would take it over as a public road. It seems to me there is nothing in the nature of the land which makes it in any way inconsistent with the user described in the same sense as the user in Todrick's case (1) was inconsistent with the physical condition of the road. Counsel points to the fact that the vendor is under covenant to make complete and maintain the road, but he cannot rely on that as proving his case, because,

H if he says that " maintain the road " means only maintain it in a condition suitable for a road in a private building estate, he is really begging the question. I read the covenant to make up, complete, and maintain the road in the manner described until it shall be taken over as a public road as of importance in deciding whether the unrestricted words as to the right of way are in some way to be cut down. I read that as, if anything, having the opposite effect. They tend to confirm the view that the right of way granted is to be a right of way of the ordinary character which you would find in the case of a road of this size which is to be taken over by the local authority. Counsel says: "No, you must limit the right of way granted by reference to what must have been in the contemplation of the parties, namely, that this house was only going to be used as a private dwelling-house on an estate containing nothing but private dwelling-houses." It is, however, contemplated that it will eventually be a public roadway, and as a public roadway there will be nothing to prevent heavy traffic going down it. Moreover, as I have pointed out, it cannot have been contemplated that any restrictions would have lasted for ever. That seems to me really to dispose of that point.

I do not think there is any other matter which arises on the argument, but one case to which counsel for the plaintiff referred us is, in my opinion, strongly against him. He very frankly admitted that the highest case in his favour was Todrick's case (1) and that he had no other case which helped him more than that case did. The other case to which reference was made was White v. Grand Hotel, Eastbourne, Ltd. (2), from which I have already read a passage from the judgment of HAMILTON, L.J. There a private road leading from a certain mews was used by the defendants who had acquired the dominant tenement for the purpose of providing garage accommodation and access for customers to their hotel. At the time when the roadway came into existence the dominant tenement was used as a private house and it was said that the user of this right of way must be limited to the sort of user that was in existence and was contemplated by the parties at the time when the right was created, namely, such user as would be necessary and convenient for the occupier of a private residence. JOYCE, J., rejected that argument and he said, quoting from THEOBALD'S LAW OF LAND, pp. 90, 91, with approval (106 L.T. 788):

"Where there is an express grant of a right of way to a particular place to the unrestricted use of which the grantee of the right of way is entitled, the grant is not to be restricted to access to the land for the purposes for which access would be required at the time of the grant."

In this court COZENS-HARDY, M.R., said ([1913] 1 Ch. 116):

"It is not a right of way claimed by prescription. It is a right of way claimed under a grant, and, that being so, the only thing that the court has to do is to construe the grant; and unless there is some limitation to be found in the grant, in the nature of the width of the road or something of that kind, full effect must be given to the grant, and we cannot consider the subsequent user as in any way sufficient to cut down the generality of the grant."

FARWELL, L.J., took the same view and so did HAMILTON, L.J. It appears to me that, though the facts of this case are not precisely on all fours with the facts in that case, the principle there laid down is one which is applicable to this case. For these reasons, without going into the facts of this case, I am of opinion that the appeal must be dismissed.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: I agree.

EVERSHED, L.J.: I agree.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

LANCASTER v. LONDON PASSENGER TRANSPORT BOARD.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Porter, Lord Uthwatt, Lord du Parcq, Lord Normand and Lord Morton of Henryton), June 30, October 29, 1948.]

Master and Servant—Common employment—Linesman and trolley bus driver.

On Sept. 10, 1945, the appellant, who was employed by the respondents, the London Passenger Transport Board, as a linesman, was working on the platform of a tower wagon repairing the overhead wires spanning the highway which supplied electric power to the respondents' trolley buses when he was injured through the negligence of the driver of one of the respondents' trolley buses which came into collision with the tower wagon. The tower wagon consisted of a driving motor attached to a skeleton tower which could be swivelled into the position required for the work. When the accident occurred the platform was projecting from the side of the wagon and was struck by the trolley bus which was passing along the road.

HELD (LORD PORTER and LORD DU PARCQ dissentiente): the trolley buses and the possible carelessness of their drivers did not constitute a special risk to the appellant, but the risk to which he was exposed by the nature of his employment was a general risk of the highway, and, therefore, he was not in common employment with the driver of the trolley bus and the respondents were liable to him in damages.

APPEAL from a decision of the Court of Appeal (TUCKER, SOMERVELL and EVERSHED, L.J.J.), dated June 30, 1947, reported [1947] 2 All E.R. 267, affirming the decision of HENN COLLINS, J., dated Nov. 6, 1946, and reported [1946] 2 All E.R. 612.

While on a tower wagon, engaged in repairing the overhead gear which supplied current to the respondents' trolley buses, the appellant, who was employed by the respondents as a linesman, was injured through the negligence of the driver of one of the respondents' trolley buses. The Court of Appeal, affirming the decision of HENN COLLINS, J., found that the trolley bus driver was in common employment with the appellant, who, therefore, could not recover against the respondents in respect of his injuries. The House of Lords (LORD PORTER and LORD DU PARCQ dissenting) now reversed this decision. The facts appear in the opinion of LORD PORTER.

Russell Vick, K.C., and Aarvold for the appellant.

Paull, K.C., and Armstrong-Jones for the respondents.

The House took time for consideration.

LORD PORTER: My Lords, this case raises once again the problem which is now becoming obsolete but has exercised the courts on numerous occasions and has recently been discussed more than once in your Lordships' House, viz. :—In what circumstances can two persons be said to be in common employment.

The facts in the present instance are as follows. The appellant was a linesman working in the Overhead Electrical Department (Maintenance) of the respondents and on Sept. 10, 1945, in the course of that employment was engaged in repairing the overhead span wires which pass from a pole on one side of the road to a pole on the other and support the electrified wires which drive the trolley buses. For this purpose he was standing on the elevated platform of a tower wagon which consists of a driving motor attached to a tall skeleton tower on the top of which is a platform which can be swivelled into the position most suitable for doing the work required and when swivelled will extend some distance out beyond the base of the tower. The approximate position of the tower at the material time was somewhere between the two lines of rails in London Road, Isleworth, and at this spot the road is 32ft. 3ins. from pavement to pavement. While in that position the platform was struck by a trolley bus proceeding towards Hammersmith. These trolley buses derive their power from an overhead wire making contact by means of an arm which slopes backwards and can, if necessary, be lowered so as to disconnect it from the wire. The bus itself can then proceed for a short distance on a storage battery, but, even if the arm is not disconnected, the bus can swing some 13ft. to either side of the overhead wire. These wires are placed above a spot in the roadway which at the relevant position is 10ft. 3ins. from the pavement edge so that without disconnecting the arm the trolley bus could have passed safely on the near side of the tower wagon and possibly, but more doubtfully, could have swung round on its far side. The platform was turned so as to overhang the roadway towards the side of the road along which the trolley bus was proceeding. The roof of the bus itself would have cleared the platform, but, rising above the roof, is a turret supporting the driving arm, and the driver failed to steer close enough to his near side in passing the tower wagon with the result that this turret struck the platform and caused the accident. Admittedly this was a negligent piece of driving for which the respondents are liable unless they are excused because the driver of the bus and the appellant were in common employment when the accident took place and it was the driver's negligence which caused the injury to the appellant.

My Lords, the general principle on which it is to be determined whether two persons are in common employment is simple enough, but its application to particular facts is often supremely difficult. That principle has been re-stated with care and clarity in two cases which have lately received consideration in your Lordships' house, viz. :—Miller v. Glasgow Corporation (1) and Glasgow Corporation v. Neilson (2). In the former two tramcars came into collision because when one ran backwards the other could make no lateral movement, and, therefore, was unable to avoid an accident. The driver of one tram and the conductress of the other were held to be in common employment because they were engaged in the task of running the corporation's trams and in so doing were exposed to the special risk of one tram colliding with another, a risk which was not shared with all other users of the highway. The latter was the case of two buses colliding, the running of which was held to expose the drivers and conductors to no special risk from the collision of one bus with the other beyond that to which any vehicle on the road is exposed from collision with any other vehicle.

The principle is, perhaps, most clearly expressed in Miller's case (1) when it is said that to establish the defence of common employment the two persons concerned must be not only employed by the same persons but also engaged at the time of the accident in a common work, and common work embraces a case where the work of the one is so related to the work of the other that the risk of injury to the one owing to the carelessness of the other is not shared by the world at large but is a special risk which must be deemed to have been contemplated as possible when the workman entered into the service. If the risk of collision between the two vehicles is merely the ordinary risk arising from contiguity in traffic of being run into by another vehicle, whoever the driver of that other vehicle may be, then the injured party has no special interest in the skill and care of the driver though that driver works under the same employer. He is taking an ordinary risk of the road, not a risk which is due to the special relationship between himself and a fellow employee. But if the work of the two is such that one of them depends for his safety in a special degree on the skill and care of the other, then they are engaged in a common work and each must be deemed to have undertaken the risk of negligence on the part of the other.

It is said, however, that the principles set out in Miller's case (1) must be read in the light of the later case of Glasgow Corporation v. Neilson (2) and that the reasoning in that case compels one to come to the conclusion that there is no particular association in the present case between the driver of the trolley bus and the appellant working on the supporting wires, and that the appellant was exposed to no greater risk of injury from a trolley bus than from any other vehicle, or, at any rate, from any other vehicle of sufficient height to strike the platform. No doubt, a reasonably skilful driver of a trolley bus would in the circumstances of this case have avoided striking the tower without difficulty, but the arm of his trolley bus was attached to the driving wire and unless he lowered the arm, which is inconvenient and causes delay, he might well feel that he ought not to go too far from the wires through which he obtains his driving force. The question is not what a skilful driver would do, but whether an ordinary driver would not feel himself more circumscribed in his course than would the driver of a vehicle not dependent for its motion on a flow of electricity from the wires, and, in particular, it is, I think, not unworthy of note that the space through which the trolley bus had to pass was narrowed by the extension of the platform in the direction of the pavement. In my view, the driver of a trolley bus would be more likely to drive near the tower, and, forgetting the height of the turret supporting the arm, to strike it, than would the driver of a non-electrical vehicle of a height sufficient to strike the platform, nor do I think that the construction of trolley buses with their raised turret or the frequency with which they must pass the tower can be altogether neglected. As TUCKER, L.J., said in the Court of Appeal ([1947] 2 All E.R. 268):

“I think that there was a special risk attached to the plaintiff of suffering injury from the stream of trolley vehicles which was passing throughout the day along this defined route, and the mere fact that there might occasionally be other vehicles which would constitute some danger to the plaintiff would not make his risk an ordinary traffic risk.”

I find myself in agreement with this statement and with the decision of the Court of Appeal and for my part would dismiss the appeal.

LORD UTHWATT [read by LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON]: My Lords, there is no dispute as to the facts of the case and I do not propose to re-state them. It is sufficient to draw attention to the general features which emerge from them. To these general features it is permissible to add the knowledge of the man in the street as to traffic conditions in London. The trolley bus system involves, in addition to the use of the overhead wires by a trolley bus, work on the overhead wires at a time when vehicles, including high vehicles, may in the ordinary course of road traffic, pass under or near the wires. The work is carried out on a platform carried by a tower wagon. The platform is at such a height that a high vehicle, but not a low vehicle, might collide with it. Among the high vehicles which may collide with the platform there are to be included trolley buses. The trolley bus is, within the limits of area imposed by its arm, as readily manoeuvrable as any other vehicle. Within that limit it is just as able as any other vehicle to avoid other traffic and to avoid road obstructions, and, in particular, to avoid a stationary tower wagon. In this case the length of the arm of the trolley bus and the width of the road were such that all the nearside of the road and most of the offside was within the area of free movement open to the trolley bus. The argument for the respondents is that on these facts the appellant and the trolley bus driver were engaged in a common work, that a special risk was involved in the relation between the appellant and the trolley bus driver, and that the risk of collision between the tower wagon and the trolley bus was not an ordinary traffic risk arising from contiguity of traffic.

The test to be applied in determining whether the defence of common employment has been made out has been often formulated and your Lordships in recent years have had more than one occasion to consider the matter. I do not propose to review the authorities or to add to the many formulations of the test. I am content to recall that The Petrel (3) was approved in Radcliffe v. Ribble Motor Services, Ltd. (4), and to observe that your Lordships' decision in Glasgow Corporation v. Neilson (2) was not given until after the present case was decided in the Court of Appeal. The specific question which arises in this case out of the test—the general terms of which are not questioned—is whether there was here a special risk arising out of the relation between the driver and the appellant. In my opinion, the risk to which the appellant was exposed by the nature of his employment was a general risk of the highway and not a special risk arising out of the relation between the driver and the appellant. The work of both the driver and the appellant was being carried out in a public thoroughfare. The risk from the operations of a trolley driver did not, to my mind, differ, either in character or in probability of maturing into an accident, from the risk attaching to the operations of any other driver of a high vehicle in that road. I emphasise that the trolley bus was for all relevant purposes just as manoeuvrable as other vehicles. The demands made by the presence in the road of the tower wagon on the skill of the driver of the trolley bus were no greater than the demands so made on the skill of the drivers of other high vehicles. The driver of a trolley bus was at least as likely—I should think probably more likely—to have in mind the risks incident to the superstructure of his vehicle as the driver of any other high vehicle. In the end one is left merely with the fact that only a high vehicle could cause such an accident as here happened and that the trolley bus is a high vehicle. That is irrelevant, unless, evidence being absent, one is to assume that trolley buses stand in respect of their height in a class apart. That assumption I decline to make. As a man in the street I take the view that equally high vehicles are not so uncommon as to be negligible in making an estimate as to the ordinary risks of the road to which the appellant was exposed. In the light of these considerations there was, to my mind, no relevant special risk.

The noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack has drawn from the circumstances a conclusion different from that which appeals to me, but I do not, I trust, differ from the noble and learned Lord on any question of law or in the method of approach to the solution of the case. I would allow the appeal. Such allowance would entail that, in accordance with the estimate made by HENN COLLINS, J., judgment should be entered for the appellant in the sum of £1,600.

LORD DU PARCQ: My Lords, the doctrine of common employment had long been regarded as troublesome before it received its death blow from the legislature. Your Lordships now have to apply it, perhaps for the last time, and the problem with which it thus posthumously confronts the House is worthy of the reputation which it bore during its life, as is shown by the difference of opinion which unhappily exists in a case where the facts are simple and not in dispute.

A The case is, perhaps, not far from the border line, but, for myself, I am satisfied that the defence of common employment ought to succeed. I will refer to only a few passages which I take from cases which must be regarded as authoritative in this House. Let me take first the words of SIR FRANCIS JEUNE, P., in The Petrel (3), which seem to have sowed the seed from which the more recent decisions were developed, with debilitating effects on the vitality of the doctrine. The learned President, whose observations have been approved in your Lordships' House, carefully considered earlier authorities, including Bartonhill Coal Co. v. Reid (5), in which it was made clear that it is not necessary, in order to establish that two men working for the same employer are engaged in a common work, to show that they are both engaged in performing similar acts: see per LORD CRANWORTH (3 Macq. 295). I will not quote at length the passage in the judgment of the learned President in which he states the principle to be applied. I am content to extract the principle and to apply it to the facts of this case. Following the language which I find in the judgment ([1893] P., 326) I put to myself this question: Can it be said that the safety of a man whose work demands that he should stand on a tower wagon and repair the overhead wires used by trolley buses is in the ordinary and natural course of things dependent on the skill and care of the drivers of the trolley buses?

C My Lords, in my opinion, the answer to this question should be "Yes." The man on the tower wagon is, no doubt, exposed to many risks from the traffic on the highway, but in order to give an affirmative answer to the question it is not necessary to be satisfied that he is immune from the general risks of the road. In Miller v. Glasgow Corporation (1), where the driver of one tram-car and the conductress of another were held to be carrying out a common work, and the corporation was held free of liability in respect of injury caused to the conductress by the negligence of the driver, LORD PATRICK, who had tried the action as Lord Ordinary, had said (1946 S.C. 112) that the pursuer was not subject in any greater degree to the risk of her car being in collision with the other:

E " . . . than she was to the risk of it being in collision with one of the countless vehicles in whose vicinity it would be while traversing the streets of Glasgow."

This view was rejected by your Lordships' House, although it is, of course, true that a tram car is by no means immune from the risk of collision with vehicles other than tram cars. The reason for rejecting it was stated by F VISCOUNT SIMON when, speaking of the phrase "common work," he said ([1947] 1 All E.R. 4):

G "The phrase covers the case where the work of one is so related to the work of the other that the risk of injury to the one, due to the carelessness of the other, is not merely fortuitous, but is a special risk involved in the relationship itself, so that that risk must be deemed to have been in contemplation of the injured servant when he entered into his contract of service."

I omit a few lines, not because they are unimportant, but in the interests of brevity. Finally, LORD SIMON contrasted cases in which the risk which a man runs is "a mere risk of the road in the sense that he might equally well be run into by anyone else driving in his vicinity" with those in which "the relation between the work of the two fellow-servants is such that one of them depends for his safety from harm in a special degree on the care and skill of the other," and said that in cases of the latter class the fellow-servants "are engaged in a 'common work' and the term in the contract of employment exonerating the common employer from liability has to be implied."

H My Lords, if the conductress of a tram car depends for her safety from harm in a special degree on the care and skill of drivers of other tram cars (as, even apart from authority, your Lordships will hardly doubt that she does), I can find no adequate reason for holding that the worker on the tower wagon does not equally depend in a special degree on the care and skill of the drivers of trolley buses, who are taking part with him in the conduct of a single department of the traffic on the roads in circumstances which make it certain that many of them will constantly pass along the road below him, often very close to him, and normally with a rather more limited mobility than other vehicles. If one must imagine the workman, when he enters into his contract of service, applying his mind to the question whether the care and skill of trolley bus drivers is of special importance to him, I think that he could hardly fail to say that it was. It is beside the point to say that a careful driver of a trolley bus need never cause him injury. The question is not what will come of careful driving, but what is likely to happen if there is careless driving, and by reason of their inevitable and frequent proximity and the somewhat restricted field of the normal lateral movement, to which must be added their unusual height, I can only come to the conclusion that trolley buses and the possible carelessness of their drivers constitute a special risk to the worker overhead. Though I should not expect any of your Lordships to greet with enthusiasm the triumph of a now defunct doctrine in what may be its final appearance in your Lordships' House, I am bound to say that, in my opinion, this appeal should be dismissed.

LORD NORMAND : My Lords, the respondents, on whom the onus lay, succeeded in the defence of common employment in the courts below. The facts have already been stated, but I would emphasise that the case arises out of a collision in broad daylight in a busy London street between two vehicles owned by the respondents, and driven by their servants, and that it belongs to the class of common employment cases relating to traffic collisions in public thoroughfares or on the high seas and in public navigable waters. The test, therefore, is whether the injury was suffered in consequence of a negligent act which was one of the general risks of public traffic or of a negligent act which was a risk connected with a relation between the two servants constituted by the work they were performing at the time. Decisions dealing with the defence of common employment where the two servants are employed on private premises give little help towards solving this problem.

I am of opinion that the appellant and the fellow servant whose negligence caused the injury were brought by their employment into a relation which was different from the relation in which the appellant stood to all others in the same street who were not his fellow servants. The appellant was engaged in repairing the overhead wires, and I think it is immaterial that he was working, not on the live wire, but on a cross wire supporting it. The other employee was driving a trolley bus which derived its power from the live wire by contact with it through the runner arm. The work of the two men thus brought them into a relation which involved the appellant in a special risk of a particular kind of negligent act by the trolley bus driver. I do not know whether this example is technically correct, but it illustrates my meaning. If the trolley bus driver by some negligent operation of his controls had caused an electric flash from the live wire and the appellant had been injured in that way, there would, I think, have been a close connection between the negligent act and the relation between the two fellow servants established by the work which each was performing, and the defence of common employment would have succeeded. But the connection between the negligent act and the relation established between the fellow workmen may vary from a clear case like that to one where the connection is so remote as to be negligible. The question is one of degree. Here the issue is whether there was any substantial connection between the negligent act which brought about a road collision and the relation established by the work being done by the appellant and by the negligent driver. The work each was doing involved that the appellant would be in proximity to other vehicles including trolley buses on the same side of the street, but proximity is not enough and I respectfully agree with TUCKER, L.J. (quoting from the judgment of LORD SIMON in Miller v. Glasgow Corporation (1) ([1947] 1 All E.R. 4)) that :

“ If the risk of collision between them is merely the ordinary risk arising from contiguity in traffic, i.e., the risk of being run into by another vehicle, whoever is its driver, then the injured party has no special interest in the skill and caution of a driver who is his fellow servant.”

The projection over the street at a height of 11ft. 8ins. of the tower wagon's platform on which the appellant was standing and the corresponding height of the trolley bus which made the collision with the platform possible do not add anything. The peculiar structure of the tower wagon involved risk of collision with any other high vehicle passing in the street, the driver of which was careless, but that was an ordinary traffic risk, for vehicles of the necessary height are not so uncommon as to be outside the category of ordinary traffic. It was, however, not the roof of the trolley bus that struck the tower wagon platform. It was not high enough to do so, but on the roof and occupying a comparatively small space near the centre of it, there is a structure from which springs the runner arm that makes contact with the live wire. This structure is called the trolley base platform and it was it that struck the tower wagon platform. It is, therefore, necessary to consider the suggestion that the driver of a trolley bus would be more prone to leave out of account the height of the trolley base platform than the driver of (e.g.) a high motor van would be to leave out of account the height of the van's roof, the forward part of which might be within the range of his vision. There is no finding of fact to support the suggestion and it is not even mentioned in the judgments of the courts below. I can only deal with it as a matter of impression and my impression is against the respondents. I think that a trolley bus driver has more practical concern with the height, not so much of the trolley base platform as of the runner arm which rises above it, than the driver of a motor van has with the height of its roof, and he would be less likely than the van driver to take a risk in passing under the tower wagon platform. I think that it should be expected that he would have in mind the runner arm and the damage which it might suffer by the slightest contact with the other vehicle, and that no special risk of negligence by the trolley bus driver has been established.

To my mind, the power of manoeuvre possessed by the driver of the trolley bus is crucial. If he had been unable to steer so as to avoid the tower wagon where it stood in the middle of the street while the appellant was working at the overhead wires the case would have been indistinguishable from Miller v. Glasgow Corporation (1), in which a collision between two tramway cars was brought about by the negligence of the driver of one of them and caused injury to a fellow servant, the conductress of the other, but the trolley bus in this case could have been steered clear of the tower wagon without any difficulty, for, without dipping its runner arm and breaking contact with the live wire, it could have gone close to the near kerb leaving ample room between its other side and the tower wagon at all levels. There would have been nothing exceptional in steering close to the kerb. A trolley bus must do that many times on every journey that it takes, and the advantage claimed for the trolley bus over the tram car lies precisely in this power of manoeuvre. The driver was, therefore, in no greater difficulty than the driver of any other high vehicle would have been and I am unable to distinguish this case from Glasgow Corporation v. Neilson (2). In that case LORD SIMON reserved his opinion on the application of the defence of common employment to a collision between two buses drawing up one behind the other at an appointed stopping place. Counsel for the respondent sought to liken the case which LORD SIMON had in view to the present case. I see no resemblance. There is, on the other hand, a close resemblance between the present case and one where a bus standing at a stopping place appointed for it is negligently run into by another bus on its way along the road and not destined for that stopping place, and it is a resemblance which brings out more clearly that the appellant's injury was caused by a general traffic risk and that the negligent act was independent of and not connected with any special relation constituted by the employment of the appellant and of the trolley bus driver.

The judgment of HENN COLLINS, J., seems to me to have gone astray, if I may respectfully say so, in testing the application of the defence by asking whether it would have applied if the street in which the accident occurred had been confined to the use of the respondent's trolley buses. By using that test the real problem is avoided. In the judgments of the Court of Appeal attention was concentrated on the question whether there was a special relation between the two servants arising out of their work, but the connection between that relation and the collision was not, it appears to me, sharply raised as an issue for decision. It might have been otherwise if the appeal in Neilson's case (2) had been decided in time to be cited to the court. The decision in the Court of Session, which was affirmed by this House, was not cited. I would allow the appeal and award to the appellant the sum of £1,600 at which HENN COLLINS, J., assessed the damages.

LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON : My Lords, the only question arising on this appeal is whether the defence of common employment enables the respondent Board to defeat the appellant's claim for damages—in other words, whether at the time of the accident the appellant was in “common employment” with the driver of the trolley omnibus whose negligence was the cause of the accident.

In the very recent case of Glasgow Corporation v. Neilson (2) this House had to consider whether the appellant corporation could make good the defence of common employment. The facts, as stated by LORD SIMON ([1947] 2 All E.R. 347) were as follows :

“The respondent was employed by the appellant corporation as a bus-conductress, and on Dec. 7, 1944, was on duty in such employment on a motor-bus engaged on service No. 19. At about 11.40 a.m. this bus was run into from behind by another of the corporation's motor-buses, which was being driven by a servant of the corporation named Pantrini. This bus was engaged on service No. 2. A substantial portion of the routes followed in these two services is common to both. The accident occurred while both buses were travelling westwards along Great Western Road, Glasgow, which is one of the main arteries of the city for traffic of all sorts. The time-tables of the two services show that the buses operating thereon run at frequent intervals, and it must often happen that such buses travel in close proximity to each other, though, if the prescribed timing could always be strictly observed, there would be a larger space between successive vehicles than there was in this instance. The cause of the collision was that the leading bus had to apply its brakes to avoid a pedestrian, and that the following bus, which happened to be close behind, skidded into the former on the ice-bound road, thus injuring the respondent. The respondent brought her action against both Pantrini and the corporation, alleging that Pantrini had caused her injuries by driving negligently and that the corporation were answerable as his employer. Pantrini put in no defence, and the corporation admitted that the collision and consequent damage were caused by the negligence of Pantrini, but they went on to plead that Pantrini and the respondent were fellow-employees engaged in a common work, and that, consequently, the corporation were not liable to the respondent. This defence raised the sole issue in the appeal."

A This House was unanimous in thinking that the defence of common employment could not succeed. That case was the last of a series of four cases dealing with collisions on the highway between vehicles, in each of which the injured person and the driver who was responsible for his injuries were in the service of the same employer. The preceding three cases were Radcliffe v. Ribble Motor Services, Ltd. (4), Metcalfe v. London Passenger Transport Board (6), and Miller v. Glasgow Corporation (1). Radcliffe's case (4) and Miller's case (1) were decisions of this House, and Metcalfe's case (6), a decision of the Court of Appeal, was referred to with apparent approval in Miller's case (1) by LORD SIMON, with whose speech LORDS THANKERTON, SIMONDS, and DU PARCQ
B concurred.

In my view, these three cases, considered in conjunction with Neilson's case (2), show that it is extremely difficult for the defence of common employment to succeed when the injured person, or the vehicle carrying the injured person, is, at the time of the accident, on the open highway, exposed to the risk of being run into by any other vehicle using the highway. In the first
C two cases it was held that the defence of common employment failed. In Miller's case (1) that defence succeeded, but it is important to note how the last-mentioned case was distinguished when this House came to consider the later case of Neilson (2). In Neilson's case (2) LORD SIMON observed ([1947] 2 All E.R. 348):

D "In Miller's case (1) the collision occurred between two of the corporation's tram-cars engaged in the same service and following the same uphill route on the same pair of rails. The significant circumstance was that, if danger of collision between them arose, neither car could avoid it by lateral movement, for each car could move only along the same fixed grooves. It was this circumstance which led the House to take the view, affirming the E Court of Session, that the risk of collision was not merely the ordinary risk arising from contiguity in traffic of two vehicles, but that the injured party serving on one car had a special interest in the skill and caution of the driver of the other car who was his fellow-servant."

My Lords, I do not think that the present case is an easy one, and I have, of course, considered with great care the views expressed by my noble and learned
F friends LORDS PORTER and DU PARCQ, and (before the decision in Neilson's case (2)) by the Court of Appeal and HENN COLLINS, J. In the end, however, I have come to the conclusion that this appeal should be allowed, for reasons which I can state quite shortly and simply. It has been said, more than once, in this House, that every case in this branch of the law depends on its own facts, but I do not think that there is any satisfactory ground on which the present
G case can be distinguished from Neilson's case (2). The two cases are not, of course, identical in their facts, but in each case there was a collision between two vehicles on the open highway, and in each case the vehicle on which the injured person was standing was exposed to the risk of being run into by any other vehicle using a busy road. It is true that only vehicles of a certain height could actually strike the extended platform on which the appellant was standing,
H but I see no reason why the accident might not have been caused by some lower vehicle dashing into the vehicle carrying this extended platform and thereby causing the appellant to fall. Finally, I attach great importance to No. 6 of the facts agreed between the parties: "The extent of the area of mobility of the trolley bus is at least 13ft. either way." Thus, in the present case, as in Neilson's case (2), the drivers of all vehicles on the road, including the drivers of the respondent Board's trolley omnibuses, were quite free to pass the vehicle on which the injured person was standing, without touching it.

This fact, as it seems to me, distinguishes the present case from Miller's case (1), in which "each car could move only along the same fixed grooves," and renders it indistinguishable from Neilson's case (2). For these reasons I would allow this appeal and direct that judgment in the action be entered for the appellant for £1,600 damages and costs.

Appeal allowed.

VICTORIA LAUNDRY (WINDSOR), LTD. v. NEWMAN INDUSTRIES, LTD. (COULSON & CO., LTD., Third Party).

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Streetfeild, J.), October 13, 14 and 15, 1948.]

Contract—Breach—Default of sub-contractor—Liability of contractor—Contract by defendant to deliver plant to plaintiff—Contract between defendant and sub-contractor to dismantle plant—Delay in delivery to plaintiff through fault of sub-contractor.

Damages—Remoteness of damage—Loss of profit—No notice to defendant of special circumstances—Purchase of boiler for use in business—Need to extend business—Seller ignorant of need—Delay in delivery.

A company, who were not manufacturers of boilers and had no special knowledge of them, undertook to sell a second-hand boiler to a company of launderers and dyers for use in their business. They did not know that the boiler was required to extend the business. The boiler was damaged while being dismantled by the third parties, sub-contractors employed by the sellers to load it on to the purchasers' transport, and considerable delay in delivery resulted:

HELD: (i) as the sellers had contracted to load the boiler, they were liable for breach of contract to the purchasers, although the delay arose from the default of the sub-contractors.

(ii) the boiler being part of an entire plant and the sellers being unaware of the purpose for which it was required (beyond use in the business), damages could not include loss of profit through delay in delivery, since such loss was not in the contemplation of both parties as the probable result of the breach.

ACTION for damages for negligence and breach of contract.

The plaintiffs were a company of launderers and dyers who required a boiler for use in their business. They contracted to purchase a second-hand boiler from the defendants who employed the third party to dismantle and load the boiler on to the plaintiffs' transport sent to collect it. In the course of dismantling the boiler was damaged, and considerable delay resulted in delivery. The court held that the defendants were liable for damages for breach of contract notwithstanding that the delay arose from the default of the third party, a sub-contractor employed to carry out the dismantling. The plaintiffs claimed to include as damages the loss of profits resulting from the enforced delay in extending their business for which the boiler was required, the ground for this claim being that the contract with the defendants was made on the basis that the boiler was required for use in the plaintiffs' business. The court held that these damages were too remote.

Beney, K.C., and Morle, K.C., for the plaintiffs.

Paull, K.C., and A. J. Hodgson for the defendants.

Sir Valentine Holmes, K.C., and Caplan for the third party.

STREATFEILD, J. : Counsel for the defendants submits that on the pleadings, on the admissions made in this court, and on the evidence the plaintiff company could not recover damages for loss of profits. He does not submit that damages under two other heads are irrecoverable, but counsel for the third party, as he is entitled to do, steps into the shoes which counsel for the defendants vacates for this purpose, and submits that the plaintiffs are not entitled to any damages at all. In my opinion, the submission of counsel for the defendants must prevail, though I do not accede to the other submission made by counsel for the third party.

The action is for damages for breach of contract for the supply of a boiler for use by the plaintiffs in their Victoria Laundry, at Windsor, and it is important to consider, first, the circumstances in which the contract was entered into and the circumstances in which the laundry found themselves just before it was concluded. They wished to extend their activities. They desired, not only to increase the laundry part of their business, but also, in particular, to extend the dyeing portion of it which is the more profitable. They anticipated being able to obtain contracts from the Ministry of Supply and they were in process of installing additional and larger vats to enable them to cope with additional work. They required a larger boiler than the one which was then actually in use, and, seeing the advertisement of the defendants in a newspaper, they wrote, on Jan. 17, 1946, for particulars of the boilers which were advertised for sale. It has been pointed out that not only did they ask for particulars of the boilers, but they also asked whether the defendants were in a position to undertake the carriage and re-erection of those boilers. The evidence does not show that the defendants are manufacturers of boilers, or have any particular knowledge of boilers, or are experts in boilers or experts in carrying out a laundryman's or dyer's business. They were merely a company who happened to have two second-hand boilers for disposal at Harpenden, and when they were asked for particulars, they wrote a letter which sets out with great particularity a description of the boilers and their capacity, and a price of £2,200 each. That price was to include the service for loading free on transport at Harpenden. In a letter of Jan. 31, 1946, the defendants quote the price of "£2,150 loaded on to your transport at Harpenden" as being the minimum price they were prepared to accept. On Feb. 16 there came into existence a report by the insurance company on the boiler, saying that it was suffering from no defects. On Feb. 20, the defendants enclosed their official acknowledgment of the order and asked for payment of 50 per cent. of the purchase price. On April 26, 1946, is the first intimation that the plaintiffs make of any particular urgency in the matter. They enclose their cheque for 50 per cent. of the purchase price and they continue: "We are most anxious that this be put into use in the shortest possible space of time and we shall be pleased if you can arrange to have it dismantled and ready for our transport by Friday, May 3." Later the plaintiff company sent another letter to the effect that the boiler was very urgently required.

It seems to me that by that time the contract was complete in the sense that the one party had agreed to buy and the other had agreed to sell this boiler free on transport at Harpenden. Indeed, it had been paid for, although it had not been placed on the transport. In due course the intimation was received that the boiler was ready to place upon the transport, and on June 5 a representative of the plaintiff company went to Harpenden. There he found that an untimely accident had taken place. The defendants, in pursuance of their obligation under the contract, had specially contracted with the third party to dismantle and load the boiler on the transport, but in some way with which I am not concerned the boiler was overturned and damage was done to it, with the result that the defendants were not in a position to carry out their contract to load on the transport that which they had contracted to sell, namely, a sound boiler. In that they were in breach of their contract. Thereafter there was an unconscionable delay over many weeks, with the final result that it was not until November that the boiler was repaired and was once more ready to be put on the transport. This was done by the third party, this time without mishap, and it is in respect of those facts that this claim for damages, in particular, for loss of profits, arises.

It is admitted on behalf of the defendants that the defendants knew that the plaintiffs were launderers and dyers, that they were carrying on a business as such at Windsor, that they required the boiler for use in their business, and that the contract was made on that basis. The defendants knew nothing more than those facts. They knew that the plaintiffs required this boiler for use in some way in their business—how, they were not told. In what way it was to be installed and what its function was to be, was never imparted to them. At the very highest, the only information that was ever given to them was after the actual formation of the contract, when they were told that it was urgently required. They were, moreover, in my view, people who had contracted to supply what was obviously only a part of an entire plant. It was not in itself a whole plant, which was capable by itself of being a profit-earning machine. I think that confusion has arisen through regarding the boiler as being in itself a profit-earning machine. I do not think it was. In those circumstances they were providing a part of a machine, the function of which they did not know, except that it was to be used in some way in connection with the laundry and dyers' business. In fact, it was to be used for the purpose of extending that business. That meant that new parts for the dyeing part of the business had to be supplied, and that either had been done, or was going to be done, but the defendants knew nothing about that. They knew nothing more than the bare fact that they were required to supply this part of a profit-earning plant. In those circumstances I have come to the conclusion that this case falls within the second, rather than the first, rule, of Hadley v. Baxendale (1). Damages under that rule are recoverable in two circumstances, and I think it is right that, for greater accuracy, I should refer to the words in Hadley v. Baxendale (1) which indicate the rule with which I am concerned.

ALDERSON, B., in that case stated the rule in this way (9 Exch. 354):

"Now we think the proper rule in such a case as the present is this:—Where two parties have made a contract which one of them has broken, the damages which the other party ought to receive in respect of such breach of contract should be"—[and I am inserting the word "either," which I understand appears in the LAW JOURNAL REPORTS, and, indeed, I think it is quite obvious that that word ought to be inserted]—"such as may fairly and reasonably be considered either arising naturally, i.e., according to the usual course of things, from such breach of contract itself, or such as may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of both parties, at the time they made the contract, as the probable result of the breach."

He continues:

"if the special circumstances under which the contract was actually made were communicated by the plaintiffs to the defendants, and thus known to

A both parties, the damages resulting from the breach of such a contract, which they would reasonably contemplate, would be the amount of injury which would ordinarily follow from a breach of contract under these special circumstances so known and communicated. But, on the other hand, if these special circumstances were wholly unknown to the party breaking the contract, he, at the most, could only be supposed to have had in his contemplation the amount of injury which would arise generally, and in the great multitude of cases not affected by any special circumstances, from such a breach of contract. For, had the special circumstances been known, the parties might have specially provided for the breach of contract by special terms as to the damages in that case ; and of this advantage it would be very unjust to deprive them."

B That is the general principle and I think that the principle running through the cases is that, if there is nothing unusual, if it is a normal user of the plant in question, it may well be that the parties must be taken to contemplate that a loss of profits may result from the non-delivery, or the delay in delivery, of the particular article. On the other hand, if there are—as I think there are here—special circumstances, I do not think that the defendants are liable for loss of profits unless the special circumstances were brought to their notice. In looking at the cases, I think there is a distinction between the supply of a part of the profit-making machine, as against the profit-making machine itself, and I do not think that it is necessary for me to review the cases which have been quoted.

D I think that one of them, however, is of assistance, because it illustrates the distinction between a part of the machine and the entire machine. That case is Portman v. Middleton (2). There was a contract for the repairing of a threshing machine before the harvest, and the repairer sub-contracted for the supply of a new firebox which was to be made within a fortnight, but he did not inform the supplier of the firebox of his own contract to put it into the threshing machine so as to have it ready before the harvest. It was held that, in the absence of knowledge that it was required for that purpose, the supplier of the firebox was not liable to pay to the repairer of the threshing machine the loss of profit which he had had to pay to the owner, and which he himself was liable to pay because he had entered into a contract for delivery of the entire machine by a specific time. That case shows that the supplier of part of the machine, namely, the firebox, was in a different position from the person who was repairing the whole machine. Another case to which my attention has been drawn is Simpson v. London & North Western Railway Co. (3). In that case, COCKBURN, C.J., used these words (1 Q.B.D. 277) :

G "The law, as it is to be found in the reported cases, has fluctuated ; but the principle is now settled that, whenever either the object of the sender is specially brought to the notice of the carrier, or circumstances are known to the carrier from which the object ought in reason to be inferred, so that the object may be taken to have been within the contemplation of both parties, damages may be recovered for the natural consequences of the failure of that object."

H It is to be observed that, not only must the circumstances be known to the supplier or the carrier, but they must be such that the object must be taken to have been within the contemplation of both parties. I do not think that on the facts it can be said that it was within the contemplation of the suppliers that any delay in the delivery of this boiler was going to lead necessarily to loss of profits. There was nothing that I know of in the evidence to indicate how the boiler was to be used or whether delivery of it by a particular day would necessarily be vital to the earning of profits. I agree that it was no part of the contract and cannot be taken to have been the basis of the contract that the laundry would be unable to work if there was a delay in the delivery of the boiler, or that the laundry was extending its business or had any special contracts which could be fulfilled only by getting delivery of this boiler.

In my view, therefore, this case falls within the second rule of Hadley v. Baxendale (1) under which the defendants would not be liable for the payment of damages for loss of profits unless there were evidence before the court—which there is not—that the special purpose of this boiler was drawn to their attention and that they contracted on the basis that delay in the delivery would make them liable to payment of loss of profits. However much one may sympathise with the plaintiffs, they having been deprived for a time of the use of this boiler, I do not think that they are entitled to claim any damages on the basis of loss of profits.

That leads me to the submission made by counsel for the third party. First, he says that a sum of £12 10s. paid to a transport contractor in respect of his journey in June is not recoverable because there is no evidence that it has been paid. I think it is clear that that £12 10s. was paid and is an item of damage which is recoverable by the plaintiffs against the defendants. With regard to a figure of £50, which is the sum of damages claimed for the extra costs of erection of this plant in November as compared with what it would have cost had the boiler been delivered in June, it seems to me that £50 is a very moderate figure for the extra charges incurred and that the plaintiffs are entitled to claim that figure. Counsel submits that there is no liability for either of these items, because the contract itself does not specify delivery at any specific time, and, therefore, the matter must fall to be decided on the ordinary principle that delivery is to be “in a reasonable time.” Further, he says that it must be shown that the failure to deliver was by reason of the default of the defendants, and he submits that the actual default, if it was a default—and as to that he makes no admission, was that of a reputable contractor who was employed to carry out the work of dismantling and on-loading this boiler. I do not consider, however, that that argument ought to prevail. In my view, it was part of the contract itself that the boiler should be loaded on to the lorry by the defendants free of charge, and, if they cared to delegate that duty to a contractor and if he failed, for whatever reason, to effect that object of loading on to the transport, that becomes their breach of contract although it was done by the hand of a contractor employed by them.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Humphreys, Lynskey and Byrne, JJ.), October 22, 1948.]

Emergency Legislation—Price control—Footwear—Price in excess of controlled price—Price marked on box containing footwear constituting offer for sale at that price—Goods and Services (Price Control) Act, 1941 (c. 31), s. 1, s. 20 (4) (a)—General Footwear (Maximum Prices and Charges) Order, 1946 (S.R. & O., 1946, No. 1413) (as amended), arts. 1, 5.

The appellant was convicted by justices of offering for sale a pair of shoes at a price exceeding the maximum price, contrary to the Goods and Services (Price Control) Act, 1941, s. 1, and an Order made thereunder. The shoes in question were in a box on which the price of the contents was marked.

HELD : the price on the box constituted a notification by the appellant that he proposed to sell to anyone who chose to give him the amount of money stated the contents of that particular box, and there was, therefore, an offer for sale.

CASE STATED by Winchester justices.

The facts appear in the judgment. The appeal was dismissed.

J. T. Molony for appellant.

H. L. Parker for the respondent.

HUMPHREYS, J. : This is a Case stated by Winchester justices as the result of a proceeding which took place before them when the appellant, the proprietor of a shoe shop, was summoned for the offence that he did unlawfully, in the course of business of a retailer, offer for sale a pair of men's shoes at a price which exceeded the maximum price, contrary to certain articles of the General Footwear (Maximum Prices and Charges) Order, 1946, and contrary to s. 1 of the Goods and Services (Price Control) Act, 1941, under which those Orders are made.

By s. 1 of the Act it is provided that :

"The Board of Trade may by Order fix the maximum price to be charged, in the course of a business of any class specified in the Order, for goods of any description so specified."

The Act itself is described as :

"An Act to make further provision to prevent excessive prices being charged for goods and excessive charges being made for performing services in relation to goods (including hiring and subjecting to a process), to amend the Prices of Goods Act, 1939, and for purposes connected with the matters aforesaid."

The facts are simple. The appellant carried on business as a retailer of footwear at High Street, Winchester, the shop being of the ordinary, well-known type of boot shop. The footwear in stock was kept in cardboard boxes of uniform shape and size, stacked on shelves against the wall. Some of those cardboard boxes were empty, but at least seven of them on the material day were filled with shoes of different sorts, men's, women's and children's, which come under the terms of the Order. It is stated by the justices as a fact that in the ordinary way no customer would handle or inspect any of those boxes, but the prices thereon were marked in plain, ordinary numerals, not in any cypher, and the boxes with the prices marked thereon could be seen by anyone looking at the shelves. An inspector went into the shop, proceeded to the shelves and took out a number of boxes at random. On each box there was the price of the contents marked. On opening the boxes and looking at the contents, the inspector found that in each case the price marked was in excess of the price which could lawfully be charged for those contents. The justices further found that "the prices marked on the said boxes were the prices at which the appellant proposed to sell the footwear contained therein," the offence charged being the offence of offering for sale those articles at too high a price.

The point made on behalf of the shopkeeper was that there was no "offer to sell" within the meaning of s. 1 (1) of the Act of 1941. It may well be that, if we were looking to the ordinary interpretation of the word "offer" in a contract case, here there would be no offer to sell any of those goods at a particular price, and reference has been made to Wiles v. Maddison (1) in which this court made some observations to that effect, observations which would be of great importance, and, indeed, might even form a precedent which would be binding on us, if the statute which was being dealt with in that case were similar to the statute with which we have to deal in this case, but it is not, for this all-important reason, that the Act of Parliament with which we are now dealing has something like a definition of the word "offer" which was absent from the statute under consideration in Wiles v. Maddison (1).

It is not necessary to say any more about that authority. Any court which is asked to consider whether a person has committed an offence contrary to s. 1 of this Act is bound to consider s. 20, which provides :

"In this Act the following expressions have the meanings hereby respectively assigned to them, that is to say . . . (4) In this Act and the principal Act, references to an offer to sell goods include references to a notification by a person (a) of the price proposed by him for a sale of goods . . ."

Can it be said here that there is any doubt that there was a price proposed by the shopkeeper for the sale of the contents of any particular box which was taken ? There was the box, which professed to contain shoes for sale, and it is conceded by counsel for the appellant that, if the shoes had been taken out of the boxes and put in the window, there would have been an offer to sell those shoes to anybody who liked to come in, assuming that each pair of shoes had a price attached to it, but he says the fact that there was a price on the boxes does not carry the respondent the length of being able to say that there was an offer to sell this particular pair of shoes at the price which is marked on the box.

To continue reading s. 20 (4), instances are given in which the legislature has almost gone out of its way to make as wide as possible the meaning to be attached to the expression "offer"—"price proposed by him for a sale of goods," "whether made by the publication of a price list," and "by exposing the goods for sale in association with a mark indicating price, by the furnishing of a quotation or otherwise howsoever," so that, if the goods are exposed for sale, it is not necessary that there should be on them a price which can be decyphered by an ordinary member of the public. That is language about as wide as it is possible to conceive.

In my opinion, there was evidence here on which the justices could say that there was an offer for sale, because it is plain that an offer for this purpose includes a notification by the appellant that he proposes to sell to anyone who chooses to give him in return the amount of money stated that particular parcel of goods, the contents of that particular box. I can see no reason for cutting down the terms of the very salutary provision which is inserted in the Act of Parliament by way of definition for the purpose of preventing, if possible, the sale of necessary articles at an unreasonable price, and the legislature has decided what would be an improper and unreasonable price. I think, therefore, this appeal should be dismissed.

FOX v. HUNTER-PATERSON.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Birkett, J.), October 20, 1948.]

Landlord and Tenant—Notice to quit—Tenancy at will.

On Mar. 13, 1948, H.B., a brother of the defendant, arranged with the plaintiff's agents to rent a flat on a 14 years' lease at an exclusive rent of £290, it being agreed that a premium of £800 should be paid on the flat being taken over. A deposit of £80 was paid by H.B., who requested that the defendant might be allowed to take possession on Mar. 17, 1948. The defendant took possession on that date, but, although the required references were in due course taken up and were all satisfactory, no formal lease was ever executed, the defendant being in possession as a tenant at will. On May 20, 1948, the plaintiff's solicitors wrote to the defendant's solicitors as follows: "Dear Sirs, Re 15 G. Gardens. Proposed lease to Mrs. H.-P. Failing your client's settling this matter satisfactorily this week, we have instructions to take proceedings against her for possession and damages."

HELD: the letter was an unambiguous and valid determination of the tenancy at will.

Doe d. Price v. Price, (1832) (9 Bing. 356), applied.

Case referred to:

(1) Doe d. Price v. Price, (1832), 9 Bing. 356; 2 Moo. & S. 464; 31 Digest 43, 1889.

ACTION for possession.

The plaintiff, Mrs. Dorothy Cunliffe Fox, claimed from the defendant, Mrs. Hunter-Paterson, possession of a flat known as 15, Gledhow Gardens, London, which the defendant occupied in the capacity of tenant at will. Judgment was given for the plaintiff. The facts appear in the headnote.

Charles Lawson for the landlord.

Colin Duncan for the tenant.

BIRKETT, J.: It being conceded that the position of the defendant here was that of a tenant at will, the only question before me is whether it has been properly and legally determined? Counsel for the landlord suggested that it had, in fact, been terminated lawfully and properly in two ways—first by the letter of May 20, 1948, written by Messrs. Hall, Bryden & Co., to Messrs. Dod, Longstaffe & Co., the solicitors who were acting for the defendant:

"Dear Sirs, Re 15, Gledhow Gardens. Proposed lease to Mrs. Hunter-Paterson. Failing your client's settling this matter satisfactorily this week, we have instructions to take proceedings against her for possession and damages."

Further, counsel says, additionally or alternatively, the issue of the writ itself in this action, the service of which was accepted on June 17, was in itself an unequivocal and unambiguous termination of the tenancy at will. To those matters counsel for the tenant answers that the letter of May 20 is not a proper and legal determination in as much as it is too vague in its terms to determine even a tenancy at will. The essential condition of any such determination, it is said, is that it must be unambiguous, and this letter, which states: "Failing your client's settling this matter satisfactorily this week," imports an ambiguous term in the sense that something might be done, although, in fact, it was not done. The wording of the letter, therefore, is said not to conform with the precise and unambiguous language which a notice requires.

Counsel for the landlord has drawn my attention to Doe d. Price v. Price (1), which is over 100 years old, but where the same kind of controversy as that which we have heard today was indulged. The letter in that case which came up for the determination of the court was this :

"Mr. Thomas Price cannot have given you a correct statement of the transaction between him and his brother. Mr. Robert Price has a conveyance of the property mentioned in your letter, as well as the original title deeds ; but he will be very happy to convey back the property, and deliver up the title deeds, if his brother will pay him what he owes him ; unless, however, he does that, Mr. Robert Price will not only not deliver up the title deeds, but, as his brother has threatened hostilities, he will without delay take measures for recovering possession of the property. The money due to Mr. Robert Price you will find to amount to a great deal more than the value of the property conveyed to him."

On that, at the trial at Gloucester Assizes, the learned judge found for the plaintiff, with leave for the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit instead if the court should be of opinion that there had been no sufficient demand of possession. Accordingly, a rule nisi was obtained and TINDAL, C.J. ((1832), 9 Bing. 357) said :

"Upon the facts reported in this action it appears that Thomas Price, the defendant, had conveyed the land in question to his brother Robert Price, the lessor of the plaintiff, 17 years ago. There was some dispute whether Robert Price had or had not paid a consideration for the property ; the one asserting and the other denying that a debt was due from Thomas to Robert Price, to the amount of the value of the land. Thomas Price after an absence of some length, was let into possession by his brother about 15 years ago, upon what terms does not appear, but he continued in possession till the present time and cropped the land. It cannot be contended, therefore, that he had a less interest than a tenancy at will ; because, after an occupation of such length, it would be hard, if, on the determination of the tenancy, he were not entitled to the emblements, which a tenant at will may always claim. The question therefore, is, whether the letter of Robert Price's agent was sufficient to determine the holding at will ; and I am of opinion that it was, because anything which amounts to a demand of possession, although not expressed in precise and formal language, is sufficient to indicate the determination of the landlord's will. Now it is impossible to read this letter without seeing that it is an answer to some former letter, and that the correspondence was passing between two attorneys clothed with the character of agents. It equally appears that Thomas Price had made claim to the title deeds, a claim inconsistent with any interest other than that of landlord. That alone would be a disclaimer. But, besides that, there is a sufficient manifestation that the tenancy, if any, was to determine—'Unless Mr. Thomas Price pays what he owes, Mr. Robert Price will not only not deliver up the title deeds, but will, without delay, take measures for recovering possession of the property.' The intimation that the lessor of the plaintiff would without delay take measures, unless a certain demand were complied with, throws it on the other party to act. Upon the ground, therefore, that the defendant has made a disclaimer, and that the offer not accepted was a sufficient indication of an intention to eject, I am of opinion that the defendant's tenancy at will was determined, and that this rule must be discharged."

The other two learned judges, GASELEE, J., and BOSANQUET, J., concurred.

That really covers this case. This is a letter written from the agent of the landlord to the agent of the tenant, and it follows on previous letters in which the landlord's solicitors were complaining to the tenant of the delay and of the necessity for immediate settlement. The letter of May 20 is the climax of those delays, and begins: "Failing your client's settling this matter satisfactorily this week, we have instructions to take proceedings against her for possession and damages." Counsel for the tenant suggested that the statement in Doe d. Price v. Price (1), which amounted to the threat, "Unless you pay me what you owe me I shall take immediate measures to recover possession," could be distinguished, but I do not feel that it can. If the letter of May 20 be ambiguous, surely the wording of the attorney's letter of 100 years ago has the same quality of ambiguity. With great respect to the argument of counsel, I fail to see the distinction between the two matters, and I hold that this letter of May 20 is an unambiguous determination of the tenancy at will. I think it left no room for doubt, and I hold that it was a sufficient and proper determination of the tenancy. The other point regarding the writ, therefore, becomes academic, and I need not discuss it further. I hold that there must be judgment here for the landlord.

Judgment for the landlord.

R. v. PWLLHELI JUSTICES. Ex parte SOANE AND OTHERS.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Humphreys and Byrne, JJ.), October 19, 20, 1948.]

Justices—Fishery board—Chairman of justices member of fishery board instituting proceedings—Qualification to hear case—No part taken in proceedings of board—Salmon and Freshwater Fisheries Act, 1923 (c. 16), s. 8 (1), s. 76.

The chairman of justices was a member of a fishery board which had instituted proceedings against the applicants under s. 8 (1) of the Salmon and Freshwater Fisheries Act, 1923, in respect of the pollution of a river. The chairman took no part in the proceedings of the board when the voting for a prosecution took place.

HELD: the justice was not disqualified from hearing the case.

APPLICATION for orders of certiorari.

The applicants were convicted by the Pwllheli justices of polluting a river by discharging ammonia into it. It was contended that since the chairman of the justices was also a member of the fishery board which instituted the proceedings the conviction was bad and should be quashed. The application was dismissed.

J. H. L. Royle for the applicants.

Lloyd-Jones for the respondents (the justices).

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: In this case the applicant, one Basil William Soane, applies for an order of certiorari to quash a conviction against him at the petty sessions for Pwllheli for an offence under s. 8 (1) of the Salmon and Freshwater Fisheries Act, 1923. He was charged with polluting a river by discharging into it offensive matter, ammonia, and a fine of £15 was ordered; and he was also ordered to pay a sum for costs which was not specified. The ground on which he moves to quash the conviction is that the chairman of the justices was a member of the fishery board who were the prosecutors in the case. Under the Salmon and Freshwater Fisheries Act, 1923, a prosecution has to be instituted either by the fishery board or by a certificate from the Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries, and in this case it was a prosecution by the fishery board. Section 76 of the Act, however, provides that :

"A justice of the peace shall not be disqualified for hearing any case arising under this Act by reason only of his being a member of a fishery board, or a subscriber to any society for the protection of fish : Provided that a justice shall not be entitled to hear any case in respect of an offence committed on his own land or in relation to any fishery of which he is owner or occupier."

The chairman of the justices, therefore, was not disqualified from sitting merely because he was a member of the fishery board, but it is said that he was present at the meeting of the fishery board at which it was decided to take proceedings against the applicants. He has sworn that, although he was physically present at the meeting of the board, which would have a considerable amount of business to transact, he took no part in the question whether or not there should be a prosecution. In other words, he acted, during the course of the argument, very much as a justice sometimes acts when he, sitting at petty sessions, finds that a case is called on in which he has an interest. He does not physically leave the court, but he sits at the end of the bench away from the other justices and takes no part in the decision. Of course, if he retires with the justices and takes part in the decision, even though he says: "I took no part in the discussion in the room," that would make a conviction bad, but it does not make the conviction bad that he is physically present on the bench at the time but has taken no part in the decision. In the present case, the solicitor for the defendant took objection to the justice sitting because he was a member of the fishery board, and only because he was a member of the fishery board. On his attention being called to s. 76 of the Act which expressly removes that disqualification if that is the only objection, he withdrew his objection, but at that time he did not know that the justice had been at the meeting of the fishery board. It is now sought to quash these convictions on the ground that the justice was, not only a member of the fishery board, but one of the members of the board who were prosecutors in the case.

The cases to which we have been referred by counsel for the applicants show that, if a member of a fishery board who is also a justice votes for a resolution authorising a prosecution, he cannot sit on the hearing of the summons because the section does not permit him to do so. He is not disqualified from sitting merely because he is a member of the fishery board, but he must not sit if he is one of the active persons in passing the resolution to prosecute. The matter was clearly put by this court in R. v. Henley (1), where a justice who was a member of a board of conservators was present at a meeting of the board at which a resolution was unanimously passed to take legal proceedings against the defendant, and his name appeared as being present when the resolution was passed to authorize proceedings. LAWRENCE, J., in giving the leading judgment, said ((1892) 1 Q.B. 507) :

"[The statute] does not authorize him to take part as a member of the board in directing a prosecution to be instituted against a particular individual, and afterwards to act as a justice and hear and determine the very prosecution that he (with others) has already ordered to be instituted."

That seems to me to lay down clearly the reason why the court quashed the conviction in that case. The justice had not only been present, but he had also been a party to the resolution which directed the prosecution. WRIGHT, J., who was the other member of the court, referred to R. v. Lee (2). There, the prosecution was instituted under the Public Health Act, 1875. Section 258 of that Act provided :

“ No justice of the peace shall be deemed incapable of acting in cases arising under this Act by reason of his being a member of any local authority . . . ”

A In that case, the prosecution was “ instituted in pursuance of a resolution passed at a meeting of the sanitary committee of the borough and approved by a resolution passed at a subsequent meeting directing the town clerk to take such steps as he deemed advisable against Shaw. W. H. Lee, one of the justices who sat at the hearing of the information when Shaw was convicted, and acted as chairman of the justices, was a member of the corporation and of the sanitary committee and was present at the meeting at which the latter resolution was passed and concurred in the resolution.” He therefore had made himself an active prosecutor in the case.

C In the present case, the justice in question has sworn that, although he was present at the meeting of the board in his capacity as a member of the board, he took no part in this resolution. If he had merely got up and stood outside the door while this resolution was passed, no possible exception could be taken to him. This court is not inclined to look too narrowly at such a case, though we appreciate how important it is that no suggestion of bias should be made and we should always quash a conviction if we thought there was any real reason for suggesting that a justice had authorized or been a party to authorization of proceedings. By the terms of the statute the justice is clearly entitled to sit unless he is a prosecutor in the sense of having taken an active part in directing the prosecution. If he has taken no active part in the direction of the prosecution, the mere fact that he is in the building at the time when some of the other members of the board voted for a prosecution, ought not, in my opinion, to disqualify him from sitting. It is in evidence that the resolution of the fishery board was not unanimous. There was a division, and it is not suggested that the justice took any part in the voting. That distinguishes this case from that on which counsel for the applicants relied, R. v. Milledge (3), where the two justices to whom objection was taken were members of the council when the resolution was passed. They denied that they had taken an active part in the proceedings, but that was in issue, and they insisted on sitting when objection was taken. They voted for the resolution, and it is not surprising that in those circumstances the court quashed the conviction.

F In the present case we do not think the facts justify us in saying that this gentleman was doing more than sitting on the bench, hearing a case which he was entitled to do although he was a member of the fishery board, it being a case in which he had not voted or taken any part in instituting the prosecution or in the preliminary proceedings. Therefore, on that ground I would refuse these applications, but the part of the order dealing with costs will have to be quashed. The conviction states that the applicants are to pay a fine of £15 and “ do also pay a sum for costs ” on Dec. 25, 1947. The statute under which justices in petty sessions can award costs expressly states that the justice must fix the costs. Consequently, that part of the order must be quashed, but the rest of the order will stand.

S. STONE & SONS (HOUNSLOW), LTD. v. PUGH.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Humphreys, Lynskey and Byrne, JJ.), October 22, 1948.]

Food and Drugs—Samples—Samples taken after delivery at purchaser's premises—Name and address of consignor not appearing on container—Right of consignor to have part of sample submitted to him—Evidence of public analyst—Food and Drugs Act, 1938 (c. 56), ss. 70 (1), (2), 81 (1).

On Jan. 28, 1948, sausage meat was delivered by the appellants to the purchasers by van, on metal trays which belonged to the appellants but did not bear their name and address, and it was removed from the trays by the purchasers' storekeeper. After the appellants' van driver had left, a sampling officer took samples of the sausage meat, and, in compliance with the Food and Drugs Act, 1938, s. 70, divided the samples into three parts, sending one part to the public analyst for analysis, and retaining the other two parts. The appellants were not notified that samples were taken and were to be analysed, and only became aware of the fact on Feb. 27, 1948. On Mar. 24, 1948, they asked that one part of each sample should be delivered to them, but their request was refused. The appellants were charged under s. 3 of the Act of 1938 with selling to the prejudice of the purchaser articles of food not of the nature, substance and quality demanded. At the hearing of the case, they required the public analyst to be called as a witness, and his evidence was that some of his assistants had helped him to make the analysis on which his certificate was based. The appellants contended that the requirements of ss. 70 and 81 of the Act had not been complied with in that (a) the appellants had not been notified of the fact that samples had been taken for analysis, (b) their request that one part of each of the samples should be sent to them had been refused, and (c) the public analyst who had been called to give evidence was not the analyst who should have been called.

HELD : (i) by the proviso to s. 70 (1) of the Act, in the case of samples taken from goods in transit or at their destination at the premises of the consignee, where the name and address of the consignor do not appear on the container containing the article sampled the provisions of s. 70 (1) in regard to the giving of information to the seller or his agent and the manner of dealing with samples were not incorporated into s. 70 (2). In that case (a) the person taking the sample was under no duty to inform the seller or his agent, and (b) it was the duty of the person taking the sample to retain "the first-mentioned part of the sample"; and, therefore, he was bound to retain it at least until the hearing of the case, and the seller had no right to have one of the samples submitted to him or to compel the sampling officer to deliver it.

(ii) the public analyst who was called to give evidence was the person whom the appellants could require to be called under s. 81 (1) of the Act, and it was for the justices who heard the case to decide whether his evidence was sufficient.

CASE STATED by Hendon justices.

The appellants were charged on an information under the Food and Drugs Act, 1938, s. 3, with selling to the prejudice of the purchaser certain articles of food not of the nature, substance and quality demanded. They were convicted by the justices, and appealed on the ground that the requirements of the Act had not been complied with. The Divisional Court now dismissed the appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of LYNSEY, J.

Collard for the appellants.

F. H. Lawton for the respondent.

HUMPHREYS, J. : I will ask my brother LYNSKEY to give the first judgment.

LYNSKEY, J. : In this case, Messrs. S. Stone & Sons (Hounslow), Ltd., are appealing by way of Case Stated against a conviction on three summonses for that they on Jan. 28, 1948, at Redhill County Hospital, Edgware, in the county of Middlesex, sold to the Middlesex County Council, to the prejudice of the purchasers, certain articles of food which were not of the nature, substance and quality demanded, being some beef sausage meat, a second parcel of beef sausage meat, and a third parcel of beef sausage meat, consisting of 100lbs., 50lbs. and 4lbs. respectively. The facts as found in the Case are that the appellants delivered this sausage meat on Jan. 28, 1948, to the hospital, which belonged to the Middlesex County Council, that it was delivered there by van on metal trays, that the driver of the van carried the meat in on the metal trays to the store, that the storekeeper received the meat and took it off the metal trays belonging to the appellants after he had verified the weights and description of the goods. The metal trays on which the sausage meat was carried into the store did not bear the name or address of the appellants, nor, of course, did the sausage meat bear that name or address. As soon as the driver of the appellants' van had departed, Mr. Kenneth Batson Dale, who was a sampling officer employed by the Middlesex County Council, examined the sausage meat, and took samples from each of the three parcels. In compliance with the Food and Drugs Act, 1938, s. 70, he divided the samples taken from each of the three parcels of meat into three parts, sending one of them to the public analyst for analysis. He retained the other two parts in his possession, and he did not notify the appellants at the time that he had taken the samples or that he proposed to have them analysed. The matter did not come to the notice of the appellants until Feb. 27, 1948, just a month after the samples were taken and the meat was delivered. On Mar. 24, 1948, the appellants' solicitors wrote to the respondent, Sydney John Pugh, in these terms :

"Pursuant to s. 70 of the Food and Drugs Act, 1938, I hereby require you to deliver to my clients or to me on their behalf one part of each of the samples of the goods in respect of which you have laid the three informations. It is unfortunate that this was not done at the time."

To that letter a reply was sent by the respondent :

"I regret that I am unable to comply with your request to be supplied with a portion of each of the samples, since the name and address of the seller or consignor did not appear on the container and I am required by reason of the provisions of s. 70 (2) of the above Act to retain such portions of the samples. The reserved portions will of course be produced at the hearing of the summonses and it will be open to your clients if they dispute or require confirmation of the public analyst's certificate to request that portions of the samples be sent to the government chemist."

On Mar. 24, 1948, the solicitors for the appellants required the respondent, pursuant to s. 81 of the Act, to call the public analyst as a witness. The case came on for hearing on Apr. 12, 1948, and at that hearing there was called as a witness Mr. Eric Voelcker, the county public analyst, who gave evidence verifying the certificate that had been granted by him under the Act. In due course he was cross-examined, and it appeared that he was acting as public analyst for six local authorities and agricultural analyst for nine local authorities and that he had the assistance of six assistants in his laboratory who helped him to make his various analyses, and some one or more of them helped to make the particular analysis on which the certificate was based in this action, the analyst himself, Mr. Voelcker, having taken some part in the analysis—what particular part is not very clear.

On that, the appellants have raised three points. The first was that the appeal ought to be allowed because the respondent did not deliver to them one part of the sample which had been taken when he was required by them so to do in writing by the letter from the solicitors of Mar. 24, 1948. The second was that the appeal ought to be allowed because the respondent failed forthwith to notify the appellants of the fact that samples had been taken and were being submitted for analysis. The third was that the analyst who was called to give evidence at the proceedings before the justices was not the analyst who ought to have been called, or, if he was one of the analysts who ought to have been called, his assistants should also have been called to verify the facts stated in his certificate, of which he had no immediate knowledge himself.

The first two points really can be considered together. They depend on the construction of the Food and Drugs Act, 1938, s. 70 (1) and (2). Section 70 (1) provides :

“ A person purchasing a sample of any food or drug with the intention of submitting it to be analysed by a public analyst, or taking a sample of food on any premises with the intention of submitting it to be so analysed, shall, after the purchase has been completed or the sample has been taken, forthwith inform the seller or his agent who sold the sample, or, as the case may be, the occupier of the premises or the person for the time being in charge thereof, of his intention to have the sample analysed by the public analyst, and shall then and there divide it into three parts, each part to be marked, and sealed or fastened up, in such manner as its nature will permit, and shall—(a) if required so to do, deliver one part to the seller or his agent, or, as the case may be, to the occupier of the premises or the person for the time being in charge thereof; (b) retain one part for future comparison; and (c) if he thinks fit to have an analysis made, submit one part to the public analyst : Provided that, in relation to samples taken in such circumstances as are mentioned in either of the two next succeeding sub-sections, the foregoing provisions with respect to the giving of information and the manner of dealing with samples shall have effect as modified by those sub-sections.”

Section 70 (1) is dealing with the case where the sample of food is taken on the premises of a person who is apparently proposing to sell, and may be liable for offering for sale, food not in compliance with the Food and Drugs Act, 1938. Section 70 (2) deals with the case where the sample is taken while the goods are in transit or after they have reached the premises of the purchaser, consignee, or consumer. Section 70 (2) is :

“ A person taking a sample of any food while it is in transit or at the place of delivery to the purchaser, consignee or consumer shall, if he intends to submit it to be analysed by a public analyst, deal with it in the manner provided by the preceding sub-section, except that he shall retain the first-mentioned part of the sample unless the name and address of the consignor appear on the container containing the article sampled, in which case he shall forward that part of the sample to the consignor by registered post or otherwise, together with a notice informing that person that he intends to have part of the sample analysed by the public analyst.”

It is contended on behalf of the appellants that the effect of those two sub-sections, read together, is to incorporate, by reason of the proviso to s. 70 (1), the provisions of s. 70 (1) (a), “ if required so to do, deliver one part to the seller or his agent,” into s. 70 (2), where the sample is taken and no name or address of the consignor appears. It is a pure question of construction, and, in my view, the effect of the proviso is to incorporate the provisions of sub-s. (1) into sub-s. (2), except in so far as the provisions of sub-s. (1) deal with the giving of information and the manner of dealing with samples. Those are the words of the proviso. By those words, the provisions of sub-s. (2), when one is dealing with samples taken from goods in transit or at their destination at the premises of the consignee or consumer, are substituted for the provisions of sub-s. (1).

In my view, the effect of sub-s. (2) is that, if the name and address appears on the goods, then, instead of a demand being necessary before the obligation is imposed on the sampler to deliver a part to the seller of the goods, there is an obligation imposed on him without any demand to send by registered post the sample and to give the notice. That is to say, in the case of goods on which the name and address appears, different provisions are substituted for those contained in sub-s. (1). The question of demand does not arise; there is an obligation imposed on the sampler without demand. With regard to goods in respect of which no name or address appears, where normally the sampler would not know to whom the goods belong, his obligations are contained in sub-s. (1), subject to the exception set out in sub-s. (2) in regard to retaining the part of the sample dealt with in sub-s. (1) (a), that is to say:

“...if he intends to submit it to be analysed by a public analyst, deal with it in the manner provided by the preceding sub-section, except that he shall retain the first-mentioned part of the sample unless the name and address of the consignor appear...”

In my opinion, those words mean necessarily what they say. They mean that he shall retain the sample, and he is bound to retain it, it seems to me, until the hearing, or, possibly, thereafter. The duties imposed on a sampling officer are purely statutory. The rights given to the person proceeded against are again purely statutory, and, unless the Act confers on the person who is to be charged or whose goods are going to be analysed a right to have one of the samples submitted to him, he is not entitled to compel the sampling officer to deliver it. Such a right is conferred on him when samples are taken on his premises. It is conferred on him when goods are sampled which bear his name and address and the sample is taken in transit or at the destination of the goods, but no such right is conferred on him when the sample is taken from goods in transit, or when they reach their destination, if his name and address do not appear. In those circumstances, although it may seem in some degrees a hardship that the person proceeded against does not get a sample of his goods prior to the hearing at the court, and then only has the right to have it sent to the government chemist to analyse, the words are so clear, in my view, that it is not open to this court to incorporate or read into them any other meaning.

The final point taken is that the public analyst who was called to give evidence was either not the right person, or ought to have had his evidence added to by that of his assistants, and that, because of the absence of those two assistants, the alleged deficiency in the meat had not been proved by the prosecution. In my view, the analyst is the person whom the appellants could require to be called under the provisions of s. 81 of the Act. Section 81 (1) reads:

“In any proceedings under this Act, the production by one of the parties of a document purporting to be a certificate of a public analyst in the prescribed form, or of a document supplied to him by the other party as being a copy of such a certificate, shall be sufficient evidence of the facts stated therein, unless, in the first-mentioned case, the other party requires that the analyst shall be called as a witness.”

In this case “the other party” did require the analyst to be called as a witness, and the effect of that was, of course, that the certificate of the public analyst in its prescribed form ceased to be evidence, and it was a matter, therefore, for the justices, having heard the evidence given by the analyst who was called, to say whether in their view there was evidence which they could accept which would justify them in coming to the conclusion that there was a deficiency. The analyst was called, the justices heard him, they heard the cross-examination, and apparently they were satisfied by the evidence he was able to give that the prosecution had proved the offence. In my view, it was a matter for the justices, and they came to, and were entitled to come to, the conclusion to which they did. The result is, in my view, that this appeal ought to be dismissed.

DUNN v. DUNN.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Bucknill and Denning, L.JJ., and Pilcher, J.), October 18, 19, 1948.]

Desertion—Burden of proof—Rebuttal of charge by respondent—Matrimonial home—Right to decide where matrimonial home shall be.

Per DENNING, L.J., and PILCHER, J. : The legal burden of proof, where a husband petitions for a decree of divorce on the ground of his wife's desertion, is on the husband to show that she deserted him without cause. If the husband shows that he asked her to join him and she refused, that is a fact from which the court may infer that she deserted him without cause, but it is not bound to do so. The wife may seek to rebut the inference of desertion by proving just cause for her refusal, but there is no legal burden on her to do so. Even if she does not prove just cause, the court has still to ask itself whether the husband has discharged the legal burden resting on him.

Per DENNING, L.J. : There is no proposition of law that a husband has the right to say where the matrimonial home should be. The decision where the home is to be is one affecting both parties and their children, and it is the duty of the parties to decide it by agreement, each having an equal voice. If such an arrangement is frustrated by the unreasonableness of one or the other and this leads to a separation, then the party who has produced the separation by reason of his or her unreasonable behaviour is guilty of desertion.

APPEAL by a husband from an order of JONES, J., dated Mar. 15, 1948, refusing a decree of divorce.

The husband was in the Navy, and from 1937-1941 he was on the China station. In May, 1941, on his return to England, and again at Christmas, 1941, he went to see his wife at the matrimonial home at Morpeth, but quarrels arose over money matters. They did not live together after 1941. The husband on a number of occasions after April, 1942, asked the wife to stay with him in England at various places where he was stationed, but she would not do so because she suffered from acute deafness which made her unhappy away from home among strangers, because her son had started work at Morpeth, and for various other reasons. The husband petitioned for a decree of divorce on the ground of his wife's desertion without just cause, and asked for the discretion of the court to be exercised in respect of his own adultery, but JONES, J., accepting the wife's evidence, held that having regard to all the circumstances the wife did not desert the husband and was justified in the course she took. The majority of the Court of Appeal (PILCHER, J., dissentiente) affirmed his decision.

G. R. F. Morris (Norman Porter with him) for the husband.

Ackner for the wife.

BUCKNILL, L.J. [after stating the facts, and examining the arguments and the judgment in the court below, concluded :] The learned judge tried the case very carefully. He saw the witnesses, he investigated the whole matter. He had to decide whether, in the circumstances, what the wife did was reasonable, and he decided that what she did was reasonable. Speaking for myself, I cannot say that that conclusion of his was wrong and ought to be reversed. For these reasons, in my view, this appeal should be dismissed.

DENNING, L.J. : I agree. In his able argument counsel for the husband put forward the proposition that the husband has the right to decide where the parties shall live, and that, if the wife refuses to join him, she is guilty of desertion unless she can prove that she had a just cause for her refusal. The burden, he said, was on her to prove just cause. This argument contains a fallacy which has been put forward from time to time in many branches of the law. The fallacy lies in a failure to distinguish between a legal burden of proof laid down by law and a provisional burden raised by the state of the evidence. I have endeavoured to explain the distinction in an article I wrote in 61 LAW QUARTERLY REVIEW, p. 379, and Emanuel v. Emanuel (1).

The legal burden throughout this case is on the husband, as petitioner, to prove that his wife deserted him without cause. To discharge that burden, he relies on the fact that he asked her to join him and she refused. That is a fact from which the court may infer that she deserted him without cause, but it is not bound to do so. Once he proves the fact of refusal, she may seek to rebut the inference of desertion by proving that she had just cause for her refusal ; and, indeed, it is usually wise for her to do so, but there is no legal burden on her to do so. Even if she does not affirmatively prove just cause, the court has still, at the end of the case, to ask itself : Is the legal burden discharged ? Has the husband proved that she deserted him without cause ? Take this case. The wife was very deaf, and for that reason could not explain to the court her reasons for refusal. The judge thereupon considered reasons for her refusal which appeared from the facts in evidence, though she had not herself stated that they operated on her mind. Counsel for the husband says that the judge ought not to have done that. If there were a legal burden on the wife he would be right, but there was none. The legal burden was on the husband to prove desertion without cause, and the judge was right to ask himself at the end of the case : Has that burden been discharged ?

I want to say a word also on the proposition that a husband has the right to say where the home should be, for, indeed, it is the same fallacy in another form. If that were a proposition of law it would put a legal burden on the wife to justify her refusal, but it is not a proposition of law and I am sure HENN COLLINS, J., in Mansey v. Mansey (2) did not intend it as such. It is simply a proposition of ordinary good sense arising from the fact that the husband is usually the wage-earner and has to live near his work. It is not a proposition which applies in all cases. The decision where the home should be is a decision which affects both the parties and their children. It is their duty to decide it by agreement, by give and take, and not by the imposition of the will of one over the other. Each is entitled to an equal voice in the ordering of the affairs which are their common concern. Neither has a casting vote, though, to be sure, they should try so to arrange their affairs that they spend their time together as a family and not apart. If such an arrangement is frustrated by the unreasonableness of one or the other, and this leads to a separation between them, then the party who has produced the separation by reason of his or her unreasonable behaviour is guilty of desertion. The situations which may arise are so various that I think it unwise to attempt any more precise test than that of unreasonableness. Views as to unreasonableness may vary, and the decision is essentially one for the trial judge with which this court should not interfere unless the conclusion is one which could not reasonably be drawn. If a wife refuses to join her husband at a place when he is ready to receive her, that is, of course, a factor of great weight, but it is not necessarily decisive. Take this case. The judge has held that the wife's refusal was not unreasonable. She was living with the two children, aged 14 and 7, in the matrimonial home at Morpeth. She had never been away from Morpeth except for a few days in 1934. The husband wanted to uproot them for a stay in wartime at Immingham or Barrow. The stay was to be of uncertain duration and it might be for a few weeks or a few months. It was to be in rooms. The wife was deaf and had difficulty in making herself understood by strangers. A considerate husband would have recognised her difficulty and not have insisted on her coming. A considerate wife would have put up with the difficulties and gone. Neither was considerate. Neither was unreasonable. From his point of view he was not acting unreasonably; from her point of view she was not acting unreasonably. Each insisted on their own point of view, and hence the marriage came to an end. The decisive matter, to my mind, is that throughout the matrimonial home was at Morpeth and the wife was ready and willing to have him there on his leave whenever he could get there, and that is where the family were. Her refusal to go for a short stay elsewhere in the circumstances which I have mentioned, it seems to me, was not unreasonable. At all events, there was ample ground on which the learned judge could come to the conclusion which he reached, that it was not unreasonable on her part to fail to go and stay with him. Unless I could say that finding was unreasonable I do not think this court should interfere. I cannot say that, and, therefore, I think the appeal should be dismissed.

PILCHER, J., accepted the findings of JONES, J., that in December, 1941, the husband was reasonable in wanting his wife to join him and that she ought then to have done so, but he held that the learned judge had misdirected himself on the facts by relating to this point of time certain abusive letters written by the husband some six months later and that his finding that the wife was justified in not returning, based as it was on this misconception of the facts, could not be supported. He agreed with the observations of DENNING, L.J., about the onus of proof in cases of desertion involving disputes as to the locus of the matrimonial domicile.

LORD HOWARD DE WALDEN v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Porter, Lord Uthwatt, Lord du Parcq, Lord Normand and Lord Morton of Henryton), July 12, 13, October 29, 1948.]

Sur-tax—"Income arising under a settlement"—Undistributed income of foreign company—Apportionment and sub-apportionment—Taxpayer controlling chain of foreign companies—Finance Act, 1922 (c. 17), s. 21—Finance Act, 1938 (c. 46), s. 41 (4) (a) (ii)—Finance Act, 1939 (c. 41), s. 13 (3).

H. was beneficially entitled to 15,000 shares in the D. company which were held on his behalf by the E. company as trustee. The D. company was incorporated in Canada, and was associated with six other companies incorporated either in Canada or Kenya, the share capitals of which were held either by others of the same companies or by the D. company. By reason of his majority shareholdings in the E. and D. companies, the associated companies were indirectly also under the control of H. On Aug. 20, 1934, H. executed a marriage settlement, which was a "settlement" within ss. 38 and 41 (4) (b) of the Finance Act, 1938. The D. company had declared no dividends, and, consequently, the trustees of the settlement of 1934 had neither received nor distributed any income. H. was assessed to sur-tax on the footing that income of the six companies could be apportioned and sub-apportioned so that ultimately a due proportion would devolve on the trustees of the settlement as holders of the shares in the D. company and become income "arising under a settlement" within s. 41 (4) (a) (ii) of the Act of 1938. Section 41 (4) provides: "For the purposes of this Part of this Act—(a) the expression 'income arising under a settlement' includes . . . (ii) where the amount of the income of any body corporate has been apportioned under the Finance Act, 1922, s. 21, for any year or period, or could have been so apportioned if the body corporate were incorporated in any part of the United Kingdom, so much of the income of the body corporate for that year or period as is equal to the amount which has been or could have been so apportioned to the trustees of or a beneficiary under the settlement . . ." The Finance Act, 1939, s. 13, provides: "(3) . . . any reference in any enactment to apportioning income under or for the purposes of the provisions . . . of s. 21 or of . . . sched. I [of the Finance Act, 1922] shall be construed as a reference not only to apportioning by means of an original apportionment but also to apportioning by means of an original apportionment together with one or more sub-apportionments or series of sub-apportionments . . ."

HELD: (i) before the passing of the Act of 1939, s. 41 (4) (a) (ii) of the Act of 1938 referred only to an original apportionment, and the effect of s. 13 (3) of the Act of 1939 was that not only the original apportionment but every possible sub-apportionment that could flow from an original apportionment was to be taken into account, but s. 41 (4) (a) (ii), as amended by s. 13 (3), had not been expanded so as to embrace foreign companies to which income had been apportioned, and, therefore, the D. company was outside the operation of the section as regards the income apportioned to it from the six associated companies.

(ii) the undistributed income of the six companies attributed to the D. company did not form part of the "actual income from all sources" of the D. company within s. 21 of the Act of 1922. "Actual income" could mean only income which was in some real sense capable of distribution.

Decision of the Court of Appeal ([1947] 2 All E.R. 502), reversed.

APPEAL by a taxpayer from an order of the Court of Appeal ([1947] 2 All E.R. 502), reversing an order of ATKINSON, J., dated Apr. 1, 1947.

By a deed of gift dated June 7, 1923, Lord Howard de Walden gave the taxpayer (his son) 25,000 shares in Dufferin Investment Co., Ltd. (hereinafter called "Dufferin"), a company incorporated in Canada. The shares had previously been transferred into the name of Established Investments, Ltd. (hereinafter called "Established"), another Canadian company, who were parties to the deed of gift and thereafter held the shares as trustees for the taxpayer. By a further deed, dated Dec. 11, 1933, the taxpayer, who had come of age on Nov. 27, 1933, gave back to his father 5 shares, which continued to be registered in the name of Established as trustees. On Aug. 20, 1934, the taxpayer, in view of his intended marriage, executed a deed whereby he created trusts over 15,000 out of the 24,995 shares in Dufferin then held by Established as trustees for him. Under this deed the whole income from the 15,000 shares was payable to the taxpayer during the joint lives of himself and his father, on the death of either the intended wife became entitled to an annuity of £1,000, and on the death of the survivor that annuity was increased to £5,000. The unexpended income of the trust property was to be held in trust for the children, and the taxpayer had a power of appointment among them. The taxpayer and his father were alive during the whole of the years under appeal, so that the former was entitled to any income arising from the 15,000 shares. By deed dated Oct. 28, 1937, the taxpayer and his father purported to terminate certain provisions of the deed of Dec. 11, 1933, and the father returned to the taxpayer the 5 shares which had been given him. At all material times there were in existence besides Established and Dufferin six other companies incorporated in Canada or Kenya. Dufferin held shares in five of them, and there was considerable reciprocal shareholding. By virtue of the voting rights attached to the classes of shares in the various companies and the shareholdings, the taxpayer directly controlled Established, and, by means of his control of Established, was able indirectly to control all the companies in the chain. Dufferin had declared no dividends and the trustees under the deed of 1934 had consequently made no distribution of income.

The taxpayer was assessed to sur-tax on the footing that the deed of Aug. 20, 1934, was a "settlement" within the meaning of that term in ss. 38 and 41 (4) (b) of the Finance Act, 1938, and that the income arising under that settlement was to be treated as the income of the taxpayer in accordance with s. 38 (3) of that Act since he had an interest in such income. The Court of Appeal, differing from the Special Commissioners and ATKINSON, J., held that the additional assessments were in order. The House of Lords now reversed that decision.

Frederick Grant, K.C., and L. C. Graham-Dixon for the taxpayer.

The House took time for consideration.

Oct. 29. LORD PORTER : My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading beforehand the speeches of my noble and learned friends who will succeed me. I find myself in agreement with their reasoning and the result, and I have not thought it necessary to provide a speech of my own.

LORD UTHWATT (read by LORD PORTER) : My Lords, under a settlement dated Aug. 20, 1934, made by the appellant, Established Investments, Ltd., as the trustees of the settlement, held 15,000 shares (part of a total issue of 25,000 shares) in Dufferin Investment Co., Ltd. (hereinafter called "Dufferin") on trusts under which at all material times the whole of the income arising from such shares was payable to the appellant. Dufferin is a company incorporated in Canada and six other companies which were incorporated either in Canada or in Kenya come into the picture. All the share capital of each of these six companies was held beneficially either by others of the same companies or by Dufferin. All the companies are under the control of the appellant. In these circumstances a question arose whether, on the true construction of the Finance Act, 1938, s. 41 (4) (a) (ii), when read in conjunction with the Finance Act, 1939, s. 13 (3) and (4), income of the six companies could be apportioned and sub-apportioned thereunder so that ultimately a due proportion was sub-apportioned to the trustees as holders of shares in Dufferin and became income "arising under the settlement." Additional assessments to sur-tax were made on the footing that such income could be so dealt with. The Court of Appeal, differing from the view taken by the Special Commissioners and ATKINSON, J., held that the additional assessments were in order.

The Finance Act, 1938, s. 41, provides :

"(4) For the purposes of this part of this Act—(a) the expression 'income arising under a settlement' includes . . . (ii) where the amount of the income of any body corporate has been apportioned under the Finance Act, 1922, s. 21, for any year or period, or could have been so apportioned if the body corporate were incorporated in any part of the United Kingdom, so much of the income of the body corporate for that year or period as is equal to the amount which has been or could have been so apportioned to the trustees of or a beneficiary under the settlement . . ."

The Finance Act, 1939, s. 13, provides :

"(3) Subject to the last preceding sub-section and to any other express provision of this Act, any reference in any enactment to apportioning income under or for the purposes of the provisions, or any specified provisions, of the said s. 21 or of the said sched. I shall be construed as a reference not only to apportioning by means of an original apportionment but also to apportioning by means of an original apportionment together with one or more sub-apportionments or series of sub-apportionments . . . (4) In this section the expression 'sub-apportionment' means such an apportionment of income as is provided for by the Finance Act, 1927, s. 32 (which applies the said s. 21 to inter-connected companies) and the expression 'original apportionment' has the same meaning as in the said s. 32."

The effect of the amendment on the wording of the relevant provision of the Act of 1938 was conveniently and accurately stated by COHEN, L.J., by re-writing that provision as follows ([1947] 2 All E.R. 505) :

"Where the amount of the income of any body corporate has been apportioned by means of an original apportionment under s. 21 of the Finance Act, 1922, for any year or period or by means of such an original apportionment together with one or more such sub-apportionments or series of sub-apportionments as is provided for by s. 32 of the Finance Act, 1927, or could have been so apportioned if the body corporate were incorporated in any part of the United Kingdom, so much of the income of the body corporate for that year or period as is equal to the amount which has been or could have been so apportioned to the trustees of or a beneficiary under the settlement."

Before dealing with the section it is desirable to recall the principles on which the Finance Act, 1922, s. 21, and the Finance Act, 1927, s. 32, proceed. I will refer to bodies corporate incorporated in the United Kingdom as British companies and to bodies corporate incorporated elsewhere as foreign companies. Under the Act of 1922, the actual income of British companies which are under the control of not more than five persons and which are neither "subsidiary companies" nor companies in which the public are substantially interested (I will call them "controlled British companies") is alone capable of an original apportionment. Under the Act of 1927, it is that income when apportioned (less such part of it as has been distributed in a particular way) which is sub-apportionable, but sub-apportionment may be made only as respects income apportioned or sub-apportioned to a controlled British company. Income apportioned or sub-apportioned to a foreign company, in whosoever hands the control of that foreign company may be vested, is not sub-apportionable. A foreign company finds a place in the process, but only as a body to whom income may be apportioned or sub-apportioned. At no stage in the process is the income attributed on an apportionment or sub-apportionment to a controlled British company mixed up with that company's own income. Where an apportionment is directed to be made as respects the actual income of that company, a new departure affecting only that income is made.

It is outside one's province to speculate why foreign companies were excluded from the class of bodies corporate whose actual income might be apportioned, or why income of a controlled British company attributed to a foreign company on an apportionment or sub-apportionment was excluded from sub-apportionment wherever control of that foreign company might lie. It is, however, pertinent to observe that there is no necessary or logical connection between the two exclusions. If income of a controlled British company attributed on any apportionment to a foreign company had been made sub-apportionable, the sanctity accorded to the foreign company's own income would not be affected, nor would the foreign company, under the provisions relating to collection, be liable to be assessed if income so sub-apportioned reached the hands of a person liable to sur-tax. The facts that emerge are that, as a means of tracing the income of a controlled British company down to individuals through controlled concerns, the scheme of sub-apportionment is obviously defective, and that this defect is not dictated by or due to the circumstance that only the income of controlled British companies can be the subject of an original apportionment. The legislature for good or bad reason has chosen that the flow of apportioned income along any particular channel is to be stopped by the appearance of a foreign corporate body in that channel. As a result of the way in which the relevant sections are drafted, the extension of the definition of the expression "company" so as to include a foreign company would not only make its actual income liable to apportionment, but would also render actual income of any body corporate apportioned or sub-apportioned to a foreign company sub-apportionable, but if a provision is made which merely treats as subject to apportionment and sub-apportionment the actual income of a foreign company, and nothing else is done, the machinery of sub-apportionment remains unaffected and will work in exactly the same way as before, and, in particular, will suffer from exactly the same lack of completeness.

Turning now to s. 41 of the Act of 1938, it was common ground that, as unamended, it applied only to income which resulted from an original apportionment. The contention of the appellant was to the effect that the amendment made by the Act of 1939 was merely to bring into play the ordinary machinery of sub-apportionment both to income apportioned under the first limb of the section and to income treated as apportionable under the second limb. Any such income duly sub-apportioned to trustees or a beneficiary under a settlement would thereby become income arising under that settlement. In the particular case, as Dufferin was a foreign company no income apportioned to it would on this basis be sub-apportionable. The contention of the respondents was to the general effect that in the circumstances, s. 41 of the Act of 1938, as amended, on its true construction required it to be assumed that, for the purposes of sub-apportionment, any foreign company to which income was apportioned or sub-apportioned was incorporated in some part of the United Kingdom. The machinery of sub-apportionment was altered. Unless the section bore this construction, income apportioned or sub-apportioned to a foreign company could not become "income arising under a settlement." The section, as amended, was in their submission patient of a construction which would

A give effect to their contention, if, indeed, its terms did not demand it. All that was needed was to read the first reference in s. 41 to "the body corporate" as a reference to "the relevant bodies corporate" or as a reference to "the relevant body corporate." The respondents were concerned to establish their proposition only in the case where a hypothetical apportionment was made under the second limb of s. 41 (4) (a) (ii). It was left in doubt whether the assumption for which

B they contended was also to be made where an actual apportionment and sub-apportionment had been made as envisaged by the first limb of the section. For the purpose of disposing of this case it is not, however, necessary to consider the exact ambit of the respondents' contention.

The Court of Appeal accepted the respondents' contention. With all respect to the Court of Appeal, I am unable to see that the section, as amended, is patient

C of the construction sought to be placed on it by the respondents. In my opinion, the section, as amended, is unambiguous and its proper construction clear. In its original form the only operation to be taken into account was an original apportionment, and any such original apportionment might be made as respects income of a foreign company as well as income of a British company. In the amended form, the results, not only of the original apportionment, but of every

D possible sub-apportionment that can flow from an original apportionment, are to be taken into account, but otherwise no attempt has been made to alter any word contained in the section and no attempt has been made to alter the process of sub-apportionment. The machinery of sub-apportionment is brought in sans phrase. Read without a gloss the section appears to me to be precise in expression. The only bodies corporate referred to in the wording of the

E section, as amended, are those whose income has been actually apportioned with or without sub-apportionment, or whose income on a certain assumption as to place of incorporation could have been apportioned with or without sub-apportionment. In the process of apportionment and sub-apportionment British companies and foreign companies may or may not appear as bodies to whom income of the original body corporate is attributed. I fail to see any line of

F reasoning by which references in a section to bodies whose income is apportionable can be expanded so as to embrace bodies to whom that income is apportioned. Taking this view of the section as I do, I need not examine in detail the particular gloss suggested by the respondents. I would merely observe that "the relevant bodies corporate" would as a matter of language still appear only as bodies in respect of whose income an apportionment, followed

G may be by a sub-apportionment, could on a certain hypothesis be made and that the possibility of making such an apportionment is in no way dependent on any matter affecting the status of the recipients under it.

There is no doubt that, under the appellant's contention, the amendment made by the Act of 1939 may well add to the income arising under the settlement. Under the first limb, income of a controlled British company apportioned to another controlled British company and then sub-apportioned to the trustees of a settlement or a beneficiary under the settlement, would for the first time become income arising under the settlement. Exactly the same result emerges where income of a foreign company is hypothetically apportioned under the second limb to a controlled British company. It cannot therefore be said that the amendment is futile, but I must not be taken as suggesting that futility is a reason for the courts, under the guise of construing an enactment, to depart from the plain meaning of unambiguous language appearing in it. The case for the respondents appears to me to rest merely on the indisputable fact that, on the appellant's reading of the section, income apportioned or sub-apportioned to a foreign company can never in any circumstances become income arising under a settlement. With all respect to the Court of Appeal I think they have attributed to this fact consequences which sound principles of construction deny to it.

COHEN, L.J., thought that bringing in sub-apportionments necessarily involved giving an enlarged meaning to the expression "body corporate" since, applied to sub-apportionments, the expression would otherwise be inept. The only possible ineptitude is failure to bring within sub-apportionable income any income apportioned or sub-apportioned to a foreign body corporate. That may or may not be a casus omissus, but I am unable to see any expression of an intention that such income shall be sub-apportionable. ASQUITH, L.J., thought s. 13 (3) of the 1939 Act inartistically drafted but its intention unmistakable. With all respect to the Lord Justice, I cannot agree with his criticism of the drafting of s. 13 (3). An exact technical description is given in s. 13 (3). No difficulty arises by reason of the application of that section to s. 41 of the Act of 1938 unless an assumption is made that the intention was to bring in the omitted income. I differ too from him as to the intention. To my mind the only intention expressed is to bring in all possible sub-apportionments for what they are worth. I agree with the Court of Appeal to the extent that the introduction of new words into an existing section may alter the meaning of words already there. But no such alteration can result unless (1) the requirements of the English language demand it, or (2) those requirements permit it and the sense of the section demands it. The alteration suggested by the Court of Appeal does not, in my view, fulfil either condition. I do not further criticize the gloss made by the Court of Appeal, for the real objection is not to the gloss selected to be made, but to the making of a gloss at all.

My Lords, with all respect to the Court of Appeal it appears to me that, while recognising the well settled principle that a statute must be construed according to the intention expressed in the statute itself, they failed to apply it. The principle was put thus by LORD WATSON in Salomon v. Salomon & Co. (1) ([1897] A.C. 38):

" 'Intention of the legislature' is a common but very slippery phrase, which, popularly understood, may signify anything from intention embodied in positive enactment to speculative opinion as to what the legislature probably would have meant, although there has been an omission to enact it. In a court of law or equity, what the legislature intended to be done or not to be done can only be legitimately ascertained from that which it has chosen to enact, either in express words or by reasonable and necessary implication."

It is an application of this principle that a statute may not be extended so as to meet a casus omissus. As appears in the judgment of the Privy Council in Crawford v. Spooner (2) (6 Moo. P.C.C. 8):

" . . . we cannot aid the legislature's defective phrasing of the Act, we cannot add, and mend, and, by construction, make up deficiencies which are left there."

In the present case I cannot but think that the absence of any stateable reason for not including foreign companies as part of the machinery for tracing actual income of a body corporate in any circumstances has led the Court of Appeal to read in the Act of 1939 words which are not there. In my opinion, therefore, no gloss falls to be put on the section and the respondents' contention is wrong.

A second contention was preferred by the respondents in the alternative. This contention was to the effect that where actual income from all sources of company No. 1 is attributed to company No. 2 as the result of an apportionment, that attributed income forms part of the "actual income from all sources" of company No. 2 within the meaning of the Finance Act, 1922, s. 21. For this contention reliance was placed on the fact that the Act in terms provided that the attributed income is to be deemed to be the income of company No. 2, and that the phrase "actual income" elsewhere appears in the Income Tax Acts as descriptive of income for tax purposes. The contention is somewhat surprising. ATKINSON, J., passed it over in silence, and the Court of Appeal rejected it, and, in my opinion, rightly rejected it. The phrase "actual income from all sources" appears but once in s. 21. It there appears in this sentence (I omit the immaterial words):

"(1) Where it appears to the Special Commissioners that any company . . . has not . . . distributed . . . a reasonable part of its actual income . . . the commissioners may, . . . direct that . . . the said income . . . shall, . . . be deemed to be the income of the members, and the amount thereof shall be apportioned among the members . . ."

It is elementary that no part of the "deemed income" resulting from the application of the section in fact enters into the coffers of a company to which it is attributed. It is worth while stating the consequences that emerge if the respondents' contention be correct. First, the result would be ridiculous—a pertinent matter if the relevant phrase is ambiguous. The income deemed to be the income of the members of company No. 1 is the whole of the actual income of that company, no deduction being made of sums in fact distributed thereout to its members. The actual income of company No. 2 to be apportioned among its members would therefore include (a) all sums received by way of dividend out of the actual income of company No. 1, and (b) its due proportion of the whole of such actual income. Sur-tax would be payable by members of company No. 2 in respect of a sum they never could have got. Secondly, as ASQUITH, L.J., pointed out ([1947] 2 All E.R. 509), if this contention be correct, no useful purpose to the Revenue was served by the enactment of s. 32 of the Finance Act, 1927. The application of s. 21 of the Act of 1922 to companies entering into a chain would do all that was necessary. That again is a relevant consideration if the words "actual income" are ambiguous. Thirdly, the direction to the commissioners is to decide at the outset whether a reasonable part of the actual income of a particular company has been distributed. It would be more than curious if in that task they were to direct their minds to an arithmetical total composed of income which is capable of distribution and of "deemed income" (such deemed income being merely a figure—not even a book entry) which is incapable of distribution. In a case where company No. 2 owned nothing but shares in company No. 1 the arithmetical total to be considered might well be only "deemed income."

My Lords, for myself I am content to take the view that in light of the context the words "actual income" can mean only income which is in some real sense capable of distribution. Apart from that context, indeed, the phrase "actual income" is hardly apt to include fictional income, and non-existent income composed of amounts deemed to be income is fictional income. I would allow the appeal.

LORD DU PARCQ : My Lords, I agree that this appeal should be allowed for the reasons given in the opinion which has just been read by my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack. I also desire to express my agreement with the opinions about to be read which I have had the pleasure of reading.

LORD NORMAND : My Lords, I agree with the speeches delivered by my noble and learned friends. I have had the advantage of reading in print the speech which my noble and learned friend, LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON, is about to deliver, and with it also I agree, but, since I have had the misfortune to differ from the Court of Appeal, I shall state as succinctly as I can the broad ground on which I think that the Crown's case most clearly fails.

The Finance Act, 1939, s. 13 (3), so far as material to the appeal, is clear in its terms. It requires that any reference to apportionment for the purposes of the provisions of s. 21 or of sched. I of the Finance Act, 1922, shall be construed as a reference, not only to apportioning by means of an original apportionment, but also to apportioning by means of an original apportionment together with one or more sub-apportionments. It requires no more than that, and that requirement has been exactly applied to the Finance Act, 1938, s. 41 (4) (a) (ii), by COHEN, L.J., in his judgment ([1947] 2 All E.R. 505). The effect is that s. 41 (4) (a) (ii) reads as follows:—

“Where the amount of the income of any body corporate has been apportioned by means of an original apportionment under s. 21 of the Finance Act, 1922, for any year or period or by means of such an original apportionment together with one or more such sub-apportionments or series of sub-apportionments as is provided for by s. 32 of the Finance Act, 1927, or could have been so apportioned if the body corporate were incorporated in any part of the United Kingdom, so much of the income of the body corporate for that year or period as is equal to the amount which has been or could have been so apportioned to the trustees of or a beneficiary under the settlement.”

This amended version of s. 41 (4) (a) (ii) is not abortive or inept, for it is common ground that this amendment widens the scope of both branches of the original enactment though not sufficiently to enable the Crown to succeed. The counsel who represented the Crown, therefore, argued that logically it was necessary to add to this amended version words which are not to be found in the Finance Act, 1939, s. 13 (3), and without which according to the argument the intention of s. 13 (3) would be defeated. They presented the argument in a variety of forms, all of them ingenious, and all, in my opinion, fallacious, for they arbitrarily assumed an intention, not discoverable from the terms of s. 13 (3) of the Finance Act, 1939, to deal with a chain into which foreign companies enter on precisely the same footing as a chain of companies incorporated in the United Kingdom and they branded as illogical any construction which failed to give effect to this assumed intention. Liberties like these are not allowable in construing any statute, and they are peculiarly out of place in construing a taxing act.

LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON: My Lords, for the sake of brevity I shall refer to Dufferin Investment Co., Ltd., and Finance and Trusts, Ltd., respectively as “Dufferin,” and “Finance and Trusts.” It is now admitted by the appellant that 15/25th of the income of Dufferin must be computed as income arising under the settlement of Aug. 20, 1934, and it is common ground between the parties that for the purpose of this appeal any reasoning which applies to the case of Finance and Trusts will also apply to the cases of the “other foreign companies” mentioned in para. 15 of the Stated Case. It is, therefore, only necessary to consider what is the effect of the Finance Act, 1938, s. 41 (4) (a) (ii), coupled with the Finance Act, 1939, s. 13 (3), in regard to the income of Finance and Trusts. COHEN, L.J., after observing that the latter section was a good example of bad referential legislation, continued (ibid):

“Applying that section literally to s. 41 of the Finance Act, 1938, s. 41 (4) (a) (ii), would read as follows: ‘Where the amount of the income of any body corporate has been apportioned by means of an original apportionment under s. 21 of the Finance Act, 1922, for any year or period or by means of such an original apportionment together with one or more such sub-apportionments or series of sub-apportionments as is provided for by s. 32 of the Finance Act, 1927, or could have been so apportioned if the body corporate were incorporated in any part of the United Kingdom, so much of the income of the body corporate for that year or period as is equal to the amount which has been or could have been so apportioned to the trustees of or a beneficiary under the settlement’.”

I entirely agree with the passage just quoted, and, with all respect to those who have thought otherwise, I feel no doubt that the phrase “the body corporate” bears the same meaning on the two occasions on which it occurs, and that on each occasion the phrase refers back to the body corporate mentioned in the first line of the subsection. This was, undoubtedly, so in s. 41 (4) (a) (ii) before s. 13 (3) of the Act of 1939 was passed. Counsel for the Crown endeavoured to persuade your Lordships that the phrase “the body corporate” where it first appears does not now refer back to the body corporate mentioned in the first line of the subsection, but has some such meaning as “any appropriate or relevant body corporate.” They are constrained to admit, however, that the phrase “the body corporate” where it last occurs does refer back to the body corporate mentioned in the first line of the subsection. My Lords, I can find no good reason why this phrase should now bear two different meanings when it occurs twice, in rapid succession, in one and the same subsection. There is nothing in s. 13 (3) of the Act of 1939 which justifies this wholly artificial construction of s. 41 (4) (a) (ii) of the Act of 1938, and I can find no other reason which compels your Lordships to depart so far from the ordinary and well-founded rules of construction. As has been pointed out, even if the Crown’s contention is rejected, s. 13 (3) of the Act of 1939 substantially widens the scope of s. 41 (4) (a) (ii) of the Act of 1938. I now proceed to apply the latter subsection, in the modified form set out by COHEN, L.J., to the case of Finance and Trusts. The income of that body corporate has not been apportioned in the manner mentioned in the modified sub-section, but it could have been so apportioned if that body corporate were incorporated in the United Kingdom. This fact would have helped the Crown if Dufferin had been incorporated in the United Kingdom, because income of Finance and Trusts could have been apportioned to Dufferin and then (by means of a sub-apportionment) to the trustees of the 1934 settlement; but as Dufferin was not in fact incorporated in the United Kingdom there can be no sub-apportionment of any income apportioned to it. Thus, no income of Finance and Trusts can be apportioned to the trustees of the settlement of 1934 by means of an original apportionment, because they are not shareholders in Finance and Trusts, and no income of Finance and Trusts can be apportioned to the trustees by means of a sub-apportionment of income apportioned to Dufferin, because Dufferin was not incorporated in the United Kingdom. As the same reasoning admittedly applies to the income of the other foreign companies in question, I am of opinion that ATKINSON, J., and the Special Commissioners arrived at the right conclusion, that this appeal should be allowed, and that the respondents should pay the appellant’s costs here and below.

Appeal allowed with costs here and below.

LONGHURST v. METROPOLITAN WATER BOARD.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Porter, Lord Uthwatt, Lord du Parcq, Lord Normand and Lord Morton of Henryton), July 7, 8, October 29, 1948.]

Negligence—Highway—Leakage in water-pipe—Paving-stones on footpath affected—Water undertakers not aware of danger—Liability.

Nuisance—Waterworks—Statutory powers—Damage occasioned without negligence—Liability.

Waterworks—Statutory duty—Damage due to defective water-pipe—Duty to re-instate and repair road confined to portion taken up—Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847 (c. 17), s. 32.

For the purpose of their water supply, a water board, which had statutory authority to lay down pipes for the supply of water, placed a stop-cock in the surface of the road outside the appellant's house. On June 30, 1945, the appellant noticed that some of the paving-stones outside her gate had become dislodged and reported the matter to the highway authority. On July 4 the highway authority, finding that there was moisture around the stones owing to a leakage in the stop-cock, informed the water board, who immediately sent workmen to carry out the necessary repairs. To stop the leakage the workmen had to take up and replace six of the paving stones round the stop-cock. While the repairs were being carried out, a foreman of the highway authority visited the site and saw what was being done. At 9 a.m. on the following morning the water board delivered a notice to the highway authority informing them that the work had been done and requiring them to effect a permanent re-instatement of the paving-stones. At 11.30 a.m., before a permanent re-instatement had been effected, the appellant slipped on the roadway outside her house and twisted her ankle owing to a paving-stone, which was loose, tilting as she stepped on it. This stone had been affected by the leakage, but was not one of those which had been taken up and replaced by the water board on the previous day. Although this and the adjoining stones were uneven, they looked perfectly safe, and the water board did not know that they were in a dangerous condition.

HELD : (i) since the board had no knowledge of the danger to the public at the place in question and no reason to suspect the danger, and since there was no evidence that they had failed to exercise due care, they were not guilty of negligence.

(ii) since the board were acting under statutory authority, they were not liable for nuisance in the absence of negligence.

Geddis v. Bann Reservoir Proprietors, (1878) (3 App. Cas. 430), and Green v. Chelsea Waterworks Co., (1894) (70 L.T. 547), applied.

(iii) (per LORD PORTER) the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, s. 32, under which the board carried out the works in question, obliged the board to re-instate and repair such portion of the road as they had taken up in the course of their statutory authority, but had no bearing on their liability to answer for any other damage to the street.

APPEAL from a decision of the Court of Appeal (TUCKER, SOMERVELL and EVERSLED, L.J.J.), dated July 8, 1947, allowing the appeal of the respondents, the Metropolitan Water Board, from a judgment of HUMPHREYS, J., dated Feb. 25, 1947.

The appellant suffered injuries as a result of slipping on a paving-stone which had become loose owing to a leakage in a stop-cock placed in the surface of the road by the respondents, acting under statutory authority. Other paving-stones near to the one in question had been removed and replaced by employees of the respondents on the day before the accident, but the respondents did not know, and had no reason to believe, that this particular stone was in a dangerous condition. In an action brought by the appellant against the respondents claiming damages for negligence or nuisance, HUMPHREYS, J., gave judgment for the appellant, but an appeal by the respondents from his decision was allowed by the Court of Appeal and the House of Lords now dismissed the appeal from the decision of the Court of Appeal. The facts appear in the opinion of LORD PORTER.

R. F. Levy, K.C., and F. G. Paterson for the appellant.

Pritt, K.C., and Roy Wilson for the respondents.

The House took time for consideration.

Oct. 29. LORD PORTER: My Lords, the respondents are a statutory body and as such are authorised to supply water in the borough of Dartford. The material powers which they possess are to be found in the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, in ss. 28 to 32 inclusive which are worded as follows:

"And with respect to the breaking up of streets for the purpose of laying pipes, be it enacted as follows:

28. The undertakers, under such superintendence as is hereinafter specified, may open and break up the soil and pavement of the several streets and bridges within the limits of the special Act, and may open and break up any sewers, drains, or tunnels within or under such streets and bridges, and lay down and place within the same limits pipes, conduits, service pipes, and other works and engines, and from time to time repair, alter, or remove the same, and for the purposes aforesaid remove and use all earth and materials in and under such streets and bridges, and do all other acts which the undertakers shall from time to time deem necessary for supplying water to the inhabitants of the district included within the said limits, doing as little damage as can be in the execution of the powers hereby or by the special Act granted, and making compensation for any damage which may be done in the execution of such powers.

30. Before the undertakers open or break up any street, bridge, sewer, drain, or tunnel, they shall give to the persons under whose control or management the same may be, or to their clerk, surveyor, or other officer notice in writing of their intention to open or break up the same, not less than 3 clear days before beginning such work, except in cases of emergency arising from defects in any of the pipes or other works, and then so soon as is possible after the beginning of the work, or the necessity for the same shall have arisen.

31. No such street, bridge, sewer, drain, or tunnel shall, except in the cases of emergency aforesaid, be opened or broken up, except under the superintendence of the persons having the control or management thereof, or of their officer, and according to such plan as shall be approved of by such persons or their officer, or in case of any difference respecting such plan, then according to such plan as shall be determined by two justices; and such justices may, on the application of the persons having the control or management of any such sewer or drain, or their officer, require the undertakers to make such temporary or other works as they may think necessary for guarding against any interruption of the drainage during the execution of any works which interfere with any such sewer or drain: Provided always, that if the persons having such control or management as aforesaid, and their officer, fail to attend at the time fixed for the opening of any such street, bridge, sewer, drain, or tunnel, after having had such notice of the intention of the undertakers as aforesaid, or shall not propose any plan for breaking up or opening the same, or shall refuse or neglect to superintend the operation, the undertakers may perform the work specified in such notice without the superintendence of such persons, or their officer.

32. When the undertakers open or break up the road or pavement of any street or bridge, or any sewer, drain, or tunnel, they shall with all convenient speed complete the work for which the same shall be broken up, and fill in the ground, and re-instate and make good the road or pavement, or the sewer, drain, or tunnel, so opened or broken up, and carry away the rubbish occasioned thereby, and shall at all times, whilst any such road or pavement shall be so opened or broken up, cause the same to be fenced and guarded, and shall cause a light sufficient for the warning of passengers to be set up and kept thereagainst, every night during which such road or pavement shall be continued open or broken up, and shall, after replacing and making good the road or pavement which shall have been so broken up, keep the same in good repair for 3 months thereafter, and such further time, if any, not being more than 12 months in the whole, as the soil so broken up shall continue to subside."

For the purposes of their water supply the respondents place stop-cocks in the surface of the roads in (amongst others) that borough of Dartford, and one of their stop-cocks is situated in Holly Road. On the north of that road and close to the stop-cock lies a house numbered 17 in which the appellant lives. The footpath in front of this house and contiguous to the stop-cock is paved with square stone slabs. For convenience sake, 16 of these slabs, which lie in front of the appellant's garden, have been numbered 1 to 8 and 1A to 8A. The unlettered numbers represent slabs lying in sequence alongside her garden front and the lettered numbers those which lie next to them but further out towards the roadway. Numbers 1 and 1A lie east of the entrance to No. 17 and numbers 6, 6A, 7, 7A, 8 and 8A are placed round the stop-cock. All these stones are 2ft. wide, some are 2ft. and others 2ft. 6ins. long, and they are placed lengthwise across the pavement so that each combination of stones measures 2ft. across and 4ft. 6ins. in length. The salient facts of the case as proved or admitted are summarised as follows in chronological order: (a) June 30, 1945. The appellant noticed that some of the paving stones outside her gate had become dislodged, and reported the fact to the surveyor of Dartford Corporation, which was the local highway authority. (b) July 4, at about 8.40 a.m. A foreman employed by the Dartford Corporation (one Turner) found that there was moisture around the paving stones in the footpath as the result of a leakage, and telephoned the information to the respondents' district foreman. The latter immediately instructed the turncock, the assistant turncock, and a trenchman to go and carry out the necessary repairs. (c) July 4, from about 9.30 or 10 a.m. until about 4.15 p.m. The respondents' three men were at work on the site. On their arrival they found that the paving stones numbered 3, 3A, 4, 4A, 5, 5A, 6, 6A, 7, 7A, 8 and 8A had become slightly dislodged from their seating, and that a ridge of about one inch had formed between the inside stones (marked 3, 4, etc.) and the outer stones (marked 3A, 4A, etc.). They found that there was water in the stop-cock boxes under the paving stone

A number 7, and that water was leaking as the result of leather washers having become dried up. In order to repair the cause of the leakage, they removed the paving stones numbered 6, 6A, 7, 7A, 8 and 8A. On completion of the repairs they effected a temporary re-instatement of those stones. (d) July 4, during the afternoon. While the respondents' men were engaged on the work, the same Dartford Corporation foreman, who had reported the leakage to the respondents (see (b) above), visited the site and saw what was being done.

B (e) July 4, at about 4 or 4.15 p.m. The respondents' men left the site and returned to the respondents' district foreman's office. Thereupon an emergency works notice and a re-instatement voucher were made out, but it was too late to serve them on the corporation that evening. (f) July 5, shortly after 9 a.m. The emergency works notice and the re-instatement voucher were delivered

C by hand to the corporation. (g) July 5, at about 11.30 a.m. The accident occurred. The facts are not in dispute. When the appellant stepped with her left foot on the paving stone numbered 2A it moved or tilted under her weight, causing her foot to come into contact with the stone numbered 2, with the result that her ankle was twisted and her foot bruised. The appellant stated that the paving stones, although uneven, looked perfectly safe to tread on.

D (h) July 6, in the morning. A pavior employed by the corporation attended at the site to effect permanent re-instatement. He found that at that time the pavement was in a very dangerous condition. He permanently re-instated not only the six stones which the respondents had taken up, but also the other stones which had become dislodged, and left them all safe. (j) July 6. The appellant wrote a letter of complaint to the town clerk of Dartford Corporation.

E (k) July 12. Dartford Corporation passed the matter to the respondents. As the Metropolitan Water Board denied liability for the accident, the appellant brought an action claiming damages against them for negligence or nuisance. She appears to have learnt that, when they came to make repairs, the respondents had themselves found the paving stones dislodged and the stop-cock leaking and not unnaturally came to the conclusion that they had removed or replaced

F all the stones marked from 1 to 8 and 1A to 8A. In this opinion she was supported by some witnesses, but the learned judge thought their observations mistaken. In this belief her statement of claim was framed on the supposition that stones 2 and 2A had been so moved and that their instability was due to that cause. This was the attitude adopted on her behalf when the trial of the action opened. The learned judge, however, accepted the contrary evidence

G of the respondents and thought her mistaken. He, accordingly, found, at any rate inferentially, that stones 6, 6A, 7, 7A, 8 and 8A alone had been touched. On the other hand, he found that stone 2A was dangerously loose and that its condition was caused by the leakage of water from the stop-cock which percolated down hill as far as the spot where it was set. For this leakage he found the respondents responsible and held that, as a public authority, they had a

H duty to see that members of the public were not endangered by a condition of which they were aware, and they should have immediately notified the corporation of Dartford and, until that body took charge, should have taken care that the public were warned of the danger.

The Court of Appeal, on the other hand, thought that the respondents were not liable. EVERSHED, L.J., was of opinion that the respondents owed no duty to give any such warning, whether they knew or did not know of the state of the pavement, and, in particular, that they were under no duty when the corporation, who were the highway authority, had as much knowledge of the state of the pavement as the respondents had, and, finally, that there was no evidence or no sufficient facts proved from which it could be inferred that the respondents knew or ought to have known of the dangerous condition of the stones. SOMERVELL, L.J., agreed with this view, but TUCKER, L.J., considered that there was ample evidence from which knowledge could be inferred. He agreed, however, that the appeal should be allowed solely on the ground that no duty was cast on the board in a case where the highway authority were in as full possession of the facts as were the respondents. All three of the contentions which appealed to EVERSLED, L.J., were maintained before your Lordships' House, but I do not think it necessary to pronounce on each of them.

It is obvious that the first gives rise to a very difficult and controversial question. The respondents' argument involved the proposition that their only duty was to stop the leak and put back paving stones or soil which they had moved and see that they were safely housed. They might, it was asserted, know that leakage from their pipe had loosened the seating of stones so as to make them dangerous to tread on to their knowledge, or, indeed, so as to wear away a portion of the soil and leave a gaping hole which was invisible at night. In such circumstances they might have a social or moral duty to warn the public, but, it was maintained, no legal one. To accede to the argument and accept the limitation of duty involved would require an elaborate inquiry and very careful consideration. As I do not think a decision on this point is necessary, I should prefer, for my own part, to express no view on it. Nor do I think it necessary to determine whether the knowledge of Dartford Corporation, who were the highway authority, was a factor which relieved the respondents from any further liability. Whatever one may think of its legal effect, the respondents were responsible for the condition of the stone which moved, in the sense that it was the escape of their water which rendered it insecure, and in these circumstances it is at least arguable that they should have set a watchman to warn passers-by until the highway authority had sent, not an observer, but some workman to take charge.

On the third point, however, I think the respondents are entitled to succeed. They knew, no doubt, that a ridge had been formed between the stones and that those immediately round the stop-cock required replacing, but the peccant stone and those in its immediate neighbourhood looked safe to those who did the work and to the appellant. It was urged that she was not an expert and that the workmen who removed the six stones should have known that the percolation of water was likely to make the others unsafe, or, at least, should have tested them to see if they were safe, and until they did so the respondents should have warned the public against a possible danger. My Lords, in my view, the respondents had no reason to suspect any danger. I do not think that one is entitled to infer that a skilled man would suspect a paving stone of working loose or of becoming more liable to tilt owing to the percolation of water. I can imagine the opposite being the case and its being thought that the moistening of the seating would make the stone rest more firmly in its place in spite of the formation of the ridge. Moreover, the appellant is in the further difficulty that, owing to her mistaken belief that the stone which moved under her tread was one of those taken up, the question whether a skilled man would have suspected its firmness was never considered, nor were any questions asked in order to ascertain what an expert would have thought the result of the percolation would be. It is true that on the day after the accident the pavior employed by Dartford Corporation found all the 16 stones, both those re-laid and those untouched, to be in a dangerous state, but he expressed the opinion that the six which were taken up may have been safely re-laid on July 4 and become loose afterwards and a similar explanation may well have accounted for the state of the other ten. He was never asked whether he would have suspected any danger from any of them as a result of the leakage. Speaking for myself, I am unable to draw an inference from this evidence that danger should have been feared or suspected. If I am to draw such an inference, I should require evidence to support it, and none is forthcoming. In these circumstances, I do not accept the view that the respondents were guilty of any negligence or have been proved to have failed to exercise due care.

A If no negligence is proved, the only remaining basis of claim is that the respondents were liable for nuisance, and a number of cases were cited in which it was maintained that nuisance furnished a ground of action, although negligence in causing the nuisance was not established. My Lords, even in the case of a private individual, liability for nuisance without negligence or deliberate act is not readily established, apart, of course, from cases of the Rylands v. Fletcher (1) type. All the cases quoted to your Lordships involved, I think, B a consideration of negligence in some form or other. Mourton v. Poulter (2), Slater v. Worthington's Cash Stores (1930), Ltd. (3), and Dollman v. Hillman, Ltd. (4) are cases where the injury was due to some act of negligence on the part of the defendant, amounting, it may be, to nuisance, but still negligence. Pope v. Fraser & Southern Rolling & Wire Mills, Ltd. (5), on the other hand, was a case where there was no original negligence on the part of the defendants, but, C after a nuisance had been created, the defendant, with knowledge of its existence, failed to take steps to abate it or warn those endangered of the risk they ran. The principle on which it was decided is stated in and quoted from the judgment of ROWLATT, J. ([1926] 2 K.B. 338) in Noble v. Harrison (6):

D " . . . a person is liable for a nuisance constituted by the state of his property : (1) if he causes it ; (2) if by the neglect of some duty he allowed it to arise ; and (3) if, when it has arisen without his own act or default, he omits to remedy it within a reasonable time after he did or ought to have become aware of it."

In the latter case the action failed because no such knowledge was established.

E All these, however, are cases of defendants who were not acting under statutory powers and, whatever may be the liability of private individuals, that of statutory authorities acting under statutory powers has always been held to be more limited. The principle to be adopted has most generally been quoted from the language of LORD BLACKBURN (3 App. Cas. 455) in Geddis v. Bann Reservoir Proprietors (7):

F " . . . I take it, without citing cases, that it is now thoroughly well established that no action will lie for doing that which the legislature has authorised, if it be done without negligence, although it does occasion damage to anyone ; but an action does lie for doing that which the legislature has authorised, if it be done negligently."

An example showing the difference between the position of a statutory authority acting in the course of its duty and that of a private individual is G to be seen in Green v. Chelsea Waterworks Co. (8), where the defendants were held not liable for damage due to the bursting of a main without any negligence on their part. Pope v. Fraser & Southern Rolling & Wire Mills, Ltd. (5) contains an example of negligence in failing to remedy a danger caused in the course of carrying out the authorised work, but which was or should have been known to the defendants and was not remedied by them in a reasonable time. H Had the danger been unknown to the defendants and had they had no reasonable ground for suspecting it, the result would have been different.

The only further ground of claim was based on the wording of s. 32 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847. This section, it is claimed, imposes a duty on the respondents to fence and guard, re-instate and keep in repair, not only any portion of a road which they have broken up, but also any portion of the road which has become out of repair and unsafe owing to the pipes and their works or the fact that they have laid their pipes in and carried a supply of water to the neighbourhood. I cannot so read the section. It appears to me to oblige the Water Board to re-instate and repair such portion of the road as they have taken up in the course of their statutory authority, but to have no bearing on their liability to answer for any other damage to the street. I should dismiss the appeal.

LORD UTHWATT (read by LORD NORMAND): My Lords, it is common ground that the leakage of the stop-cock was not due to any negligence on the part of the respondents and it was established that the respondents did not in the course of the work of repair interfere in any way with the particular stone on which the appellant slipped. There was no suggestion that the work of repair was not carried out under proper supervision and there was no evidence that when the work of repair was completed the particular stone was loose. I agree with EVERSHED and SOMERVELL, L.JJ., that there was no evidence that any of the employees of the respondents had reason to believe that the particular stone would become loose or that otherwise the pavement at that spot might become a source of danger as a result of the leakage that had occurred. Lastly, it is common ground that the highway authority knew the circumstances. It was they who had informed the respondents of the leakage. The fact that the respondents in the matter of the maintenance and user of the water main and stop-cock were acting under statutory authority absolves them, in the absence of negligence, from liability for any damage resulting from that maintenance and user. Liability can attach to them, if at all, only on the ground that it was due to their activities that the particular stone was displaced in the highway to the danger of the public, and that they thereby came under a duty to take such steps as were reasonably necessary to protect users of the highway from harm.

In a proper case, it may be necessary to consider precisely the circumstances in which a person who is responsible for obstructing a highway to the possible or probable danger of its users comes under some such duty and to consider, by reference to the facts of any such case, what particular activities are required for the proper performance of that duty. The present case calls for no such detailed examination. The matter may be summed up in this way. All the activities of the respondents were lawful. They neither knew nor had reason to believe that there was or would be an obstruction of any kind dangerous to the public at the place in question, and the highway authority, on whom rested a duty to repair the highway, knew all the material facts. No step directed to protecting users of the highway could reasonably be expected of the respondents. I desire only to add, with reference to an obiter dictum appearing in the judgment of EVERSHED, L.J., that I reserve my opinion on the right of the respondents, had they been aware of the dislocation of the pavement, to make good that dislocation. The matter was not debated before your Lordships and may, I think, require consideration. I would dismiss the appeal.

LORD DU PARCQ: My Lords, in my opinion, it is not necessary for the decision of this appeal that your Lordships should come to a final conclusion on any of the more difficult questions of law which were mooted during the argument. The question involved is one of fact, and the only legal propositions which it is necessary to have in mind are simple and elementary.

The respondent board had statutory authority to lay down pipes for the supply of water, and it is conceded that down to the moment when the stop-cock in Holly Road began to leak, they had done nothing wrongful. There was no evidence that any negligence on the part of the board caused the leak. Having learned from the highway authority that the stop-cock was leaking, the board, in pursuance of its statutory powers and of its duty, did the repairs necessary to stop the leakage. The men who did the work of repair found it necessary to take up and replace paving-stones. The work was done, and, so far as those paving-stones which were taken up and replaced are concerned, the appellant has no complaint to make. Her complaint, as it was finally formulated, was that other paving-stones had been affected by the penetration of water caused by the leak, and that one of these had become so loose by the morning of July 5, the day after the board's men did the repairs, that it tilted when the appellant stepped on it so that she twisted her ankle and suffered other slight injuries. There was no evidence that any workman or other agent of the board knew or had reason to believe on July 4 that the stone in question was loose or likely to tilt, nor, indeed, was it proved that on July 4, or for any considerable length of time before the mishap to the appellant occurred at about 11.30 a.m. on July 5, the stone had in fact become loose. It is true that the paving-stones were uneven, and that the board's men had noticed the unevenness, but the appellant had noticed it too, and has never alleged that it was a cause of her misfortune for which the board can be blamed.

I have said that the respondent board was told of the leak by the highway authority. That authority was Dartford Corporation, and I have no doubt that from June 30 the corporation came under a duty to see that any part of the highway which was affected by the leak was kept in repair, and to make any inspection that was reasonably necessary. It may be, though I express no opinion as to this, that the corporation was remiss. If that be so, the rule of law which protects it against an action for mere non-feasance sufficiently explains the fact that the appellant did not make it a defendant. I am not prepared to say that one can exclude the possibility that the respondent board might in certain circumstances be liable for negligence in respect of the results of a leak in its system, even though the primary liability rested on the highway authority. HUMPHREYS, J., thought that there was such negligence in the present case. In his view it was the duty of the board, first, to give notice at once to the corporation of the danger, and, secondly, to station a man at the dangerous spot in order that he might warn people off it.

I agree with the Court of Appeal that there could be no duty to warn the corporation of what it not only already knew, but had itself brought to the notice of the board. It may be that in other circumstances the board would have been under a duty to give a warning to the corporation of dangerous possibilities which they knew or had the means of knowing. In a case where the board has knowledge of facts unknown to the highway authority, or means of knowledge of such facts which are not available to that authority, it may well be the board's duty to warn the authority, and, in an emergency, to take immediate steps for the protection of the public. In the present case the board had no knowledge and no special means of knowledge of the particular danger of which the appellant complains, and I do not think that it is a fair inference from the facts proved that its servants or agents omitted to take any step which reasonable care for the safety of the public would have dictated. The leak from the board's stop-cock created a danger, but in all the circumstances the board cannot be held liable either for the occurrence of the leak or for the damage which the appellant suffered as one of its unforeseen consequences. In my opinion, the appeal should be dismissed.

LORD NORMAND : My Lords, the noble and learned Lords who have preceded me have so fully expressed the opinion which I have formed that it would be superfluous of me to attempt to make any addition to their opinions.

LORD PORTER : My Lords, my noble and learned friend, LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON, has asked me to say that he concurs in the opinions expressed.

Appeal dismissed.

Re NORTON'S WILL TRUSTS. LIGHTFOOT v. GOLDSON.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Jenkins, J.), October 20, 1948.]

Charitable Bequest—Gift "for benefit of church and parish"—Support of church school—Upkeep of graves and bier house—No faculty for bier house.

A testator bequeathed £500 "to the church council of B.N. as a thank offering for 56 years of happiness with my devoted wife to whom I was married in this church. This offering to be applied by the council to any use they may think best for the benefit of the church and parish, but preferably for the support of the church school and a small provision for keeping in repair the graves of my wife's parents J. and S.T., and the bier house given by us on our golden wedding." The bier house had been erected in the churchyard without a faculty, but it did not appear that the testator appreciated that this was so or that a faculty was in fact necessary.

HELD: (i) this was a valid charitable trust for the benefit of the inhabitants of the parish.

Dictum of LORD SELBORNE, L.C., in Goodman v. Saltash Corpn. (1882) 7 A.C. 633, 642; 48 L.T. 239, 242), applied.

Farley v. Westminster Bank, Ltd. ([1939] 3 All E.R. 491; [1939] A.C. 430; 161 L.T. 103), distinguished.

(ii) the upkeep of the graves, not being tombs in a church, was not a valid charitable purpose: Re Dalziel, Midland Bank Executor and Trustee Co., Ltd. v. St. Bartholomew's Hospital ([1943] 2 All E.R. 656; [1943] Ch. 277; 169 L.T. 168), applied, but the fact that it might not be possible to carry a particular charitable purpose into effect did not invalidate the charitable gift and the amount which might have been applied to the particular purpose, could the trustees lawfully have achieved it, would become available for the general charitable purposes for which the legacy was given.

(iii) the upkeep of the bier house was "for the benefit of the church and parish" and was a good charitable purpose, and the gift for that purpose was not rendered invalid by the absence of a faculty.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine whether the trusts of a legacy were charitable trusts. The facts appear in the judgment.

R. W. Goff for the plaintiffs (executors of the will).

J. H. A. Sparrow for the first defendant (the parochial church council of Blo Norton).

Mulligan for two persons interested in residue.

Danckwerts for H.M. Attorney-General.

JENKINS, J.: The testator, George William Norton, made a will dated Apr. 26, 1939, and died on Feb. 21, 1940. His will, with one codicil which is not material for the present purpose, was proved by the plaintiffs on June 4, 1940.

The question which I have to decide relates to a legacy of £500 bequeathed by the will, and is : How far, if at all, the trusts of this £500 legacy are charitable trusts. The gift in question is in these terms :

- A "I give £500 to the church council of Blo Norton as a thank offering for 56 years of happiness with my devoted wife to whom I was married in this church. This offering to be applied by the council to any use they may think best for the benefit of the church and parish but preferably for the support of the church school and a small provision for keeping in repair the graves of my wife's parents John and Sarah Taylor and the bier house given by us on our golden wedding."
- B There are two circumstances which I should mention before turning to the question of construction. The bier house referred to in the gift was a wooden structure, erected in the churchyard. No faculty was obtained for its erection, which means that, unless and until a faculty is obtained, the bier house is an unlawful structure, which could be removed at any time under the order of the appropriate ecclesiastical authority. I am not prepared to assume that the
- C testator knew that a faculty had not been obtained or indeed appreciated the necessity for a faculty.

The defendants to the summons are the parochial church council of the parish of Blo Norton, which is incorporated under the Parochial Church Councils (Powers) Measure, 1921, the two persons who are interested in the residuary estate of the testator under his will, and the Attorney-General representing

D the interests of charity generally.

- Before considering the law applicable to the gift, I will first endeavour to place what I conceive to be the correct construction on it. It is a gift of £500 to the church council of Blo Norton "as a thank offering for 56 years of happiness," which the testator enjoyed with his wife, "to be applied by the council to any use they may think best for the benefit of the church and parish." So
- E far, it is, in my judgment, a gift to the council "for the benefit of the church and parish" with a discretion to the council as to the particular mode of its application within those limits. The testator goes on to express certain preferences or suggestions of a precatory character as to the mode in which he thinks the legacy might preferably be applied—"but preferably for the support of the church school and a small provision for keeping in repair the graves of
- F my wife's parents John and Sarah Taylor and the bier house given by us on our golden wedding." It has been argued that the passage introduced by the words "and a small provision" makes a separate and independent gift of an unascertained sum over and above the £500. I find myself unable to accept that view. The "small provision" is one of the purposes for which the testator expressed a preference in regard to the application of that sum. What he says
- G in this part of the gift amounts to this : "but preferably for the support of the church school subject to a small provision being made for keeping in repair the graves of my wife's parents and for keeping in repair the bier house." That conclusion follows from the grammatical structure of the gift. The only words of gift are : "I give £500 to the church council of Blo Norton," and they introduce one gift only, a gift of £500. It is to be noticed that it is a gift of
- H £500 to the church council of Blo Norton, and not a gift to the church council of Blo Norton of a sum of £500. If the words had been in that order, it would have been less difficult, perhaps, to construe the "small provision" as an additional item of gift. In my view, as the will stands, the testator means the "small provision" to come out of the £500, if the council thinks fit to adopt his recommendation.

That being the meaning of the gift, is a gift to the parochial church council to be applied by the council "to any use they may think best for the benefit of the church and parish " a valid charitable gift ? It is not disputed that a gift simply for the benefit of the church would be a valid charitable gift. The contest centres on the addition of the words " and parish." For the residuary legatees it is argued that the inclusion of the reference to the parish brings the gift within the principle of Farley v. Westminster Bank (1), where it was held that a gift for " parish work " might include objects which were not charitable in the legal sense, with the result that the gift for parish work was held to fail. On the other hand, I have been referred to Goodman v. Saltash Corpn. (2), where LORD SELBORNE, L.C., said ((1882) 7 A.C. 642):

" A gift subject to a condition or trust for the benefit of the inhabitants of a parish or town, or of any particular class of such inhabitants, is (as I understand the law) a charitable trust . . . "

I have also been referred to a number of later cases in which the proposition embodied in that passage has been recognised as settled law. In my judgment, there is a real difference between a gift for " the benefit of the parish " and a gift for " parish work." The gift for " parish work " may well embrace all sorts of matters which would not come within the ambit of a gift for the " benefit of the parish." A gift for the benefit of the parish is, in my judgment, a gift for the benefit of the inhabitants of the parish and comes exactly within the principle stated by LORD SELBORNE, L.C., in Goodman v. Saltash Corpn. (2). Therefore, in my judgment, the gift here should be upheld on that principle, and the decision in Farley v. Westminster Bank (1) with respect to gifts for parish work has no application to this will. It follows that down to the words " and parish " the gift in this will is a valid charitable gift for the benefit of the church and the inhabitants of the parish.

It remains to consider whether that conclusion is displaced by the precatory words which follow. In my opinion, it is not. The main recommendation which the testator has made is that the £500 should be applied for the support of the church school. That is a valid charitable purpose. He adds : " and a small provision for keeping in repair the graves . . . and the bier house." In substance he says that he would prefer that the £500 should be applied for the support of the church school, subject to a small provision being made for the repairs he mentions. Of these two objects for which the " small provision " is contemplated, the first, inasmuch as those graves are not tombs in a church, is not a valid charitable purpose. The consequence of its invalidity is that this passage in the will is ineffective, and the council cannot lawfully make any provision for that purpose.

Does that result in any part of the £500 not being validly disposed of so that it falls into residue ? In my judgment, the answer to that question must be " No," because this is a case in which the testator has devoted the whole of the legacy to charitable purposes, and then has empowered the trustee of the legacy to apply a part of it to the particular non-charitable purpose of keeping in repair two specified graves. That being the position, the result of the invalidity of the power conferred on the council quoad this particular object is that the power should to that extent simply be ignored. Any amount which they might have spent on this object, had it been a valid charitable object, will be available for the general charitable purpose to which the legacy as a whole is subjected. That conclusion can also be justified on the principle of the " tomb cases," reference to which is made in the judgment of COHEN, J., in Re Dalziel (3), that a provision for the repair of a tomb is to be regarded as imposing only a moral obligation. On this principle the moral obligation, being one which cannot be validly carried out, should simply be ignored and the testator's disposition in favour of valid charitable objects should be treated as extending to the whole of the subject-matter of the gift.

The second purpose for which the testator recommends that provision should be made is the repair of the bier house. In my judgment, the repair of the bier house, being a bier house in the parish churchyard used for the purpose of housing biers in connection with funerals, would be a purpose "for the benefit of the church and parish," and is a good charitable purpose. It is, however, suggested that this gift is rendered invalid by the absence of a faculty. I think that is wrong and the position is more accurately stated thus. Here is a gift in intention and in character a perfectly valid charitable gift. It may be, however, that the circumstance that no faculty has been obtained will make it impossible to carry that particular charitable purpose into effect. If that is so, then there will be a circumstance not contemplated by the testator, which will make it impossible for the trustee to carry out this particular wish of his. That will not, however, invalidate the charitable gift of the legacy of £500 or any part of it. The result will simply be that any amount which the trustees might have applied in repair of the bier house, could they lawfully have done it, will simply become available for the general charitable purposes for which the legacy of £500 was given.

For these reasons, I propose to declare that, upon the true construction of the will, the bequest of £500 is in its entirety a valid charitable gift to the council for any use they may decide for the benefit of the church, including in particular the support of the church school and keeping in repair the bier house so far as that lawfully can be done. I propose to answer in that sense the question put to me.

PHILLIPS v. WELTON AND ANOTHER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Greene, M.R., Tucker and Somervell, L.JJ.), September 29, 30, October 26, 1948.]

Rent Restriction—Possession—Notice of increase of rent in 1920—Death of tenant in 1922—Widow statutory tenant—Whether statutory tenancy passed to daughters on death of widow—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (c. 17), s. 12 (1) (g)—Rent Restrictions (Notices of Increase) Act, 1923 (c. 13), s. 1 (1).

In 1904, W. became the tenant of a dwelling-house to which in due course the Rent Restrictions Acts applied, and in 1920 he was served with notices of increase of rent, which notices the Court of Appeal found to be valid. He died intestate in 1922, and his widow continued to reside in the house with the defendants, her daughters. Rent was paid and accepted until her death in 1947. The plaintiff refused to accept rent from the daughters, and claimed possession.

HELD: although at the date of his death W. was a contractual tenant, the court was bound by the Rent Restrictions (Notices of Increase) Act, 1923, s. 1 (1), to treat the notices of increase given in 1920 as notice to terminate the tenancy so that W. became a statutory tenant; Mrs. W. became tenant on the death of W. by virtue of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 12 (1) (g); the defendants could not themselves become tenants by virtue of s. 12 (1) (g) on the death of Mrs. W.; and the plaintiff was entitled to possession.

Pain v. Cobb, (1931) (146 L.T. 13), and Summers v. Donohue, ([1945] 1 All E.R. 599; 172 L.T. 310), followed.

Per cur.: if a statutory tenant dies leaving someone living in the house capable of being "tenant" within s. 12 (1) (g), and, without any assertion of right under s. 12 (1) (g), that person simply continues to pay rent, the proper inference is that he or she is continuing in possession by virtue of the section.

APPEAL by the defendants from an order of His Honour JUDGE HUNTER, K.C., at Ilford County Court, dated Feb. 19, 1948, granting possession of a dwelling-house to the landlord. JUDGE HUNTER held notices of increase of rent, given in 1920 to the then tenant, to be defective, and that, therefore, since there had been no notice to quit, that tenant must be considered as a contractual tenant at the date of his death (intestate) in 1922, and s. 12 (1) (g) of the Act of 1920 could not apply for the benefit of the defendants, the tenant's daughters. The Court of Appeal now affirmed JUDGE HUNTER's order, but based their decision on different grounds. The facts appear in the judgment of SOMERVELL, L.J.

A. E. Holdsworth for the defendants.

Winn for the plaintiff.

Cur. adv. vult.

Oct. 26. LORD GREENE, M.R.: I have had the advantage of reading the judgment about to be delivered by SOMERVELL, L.J. I can only say that I agree with it and have nothing myself to add.

SOMERVELL, L.J., read the following judgment. In this case the plaintiff asks for and has obtained an order for possession of No. 24, Cooke Street, Barking, on the basis that the defendants are trespassers. A number of points have been raised, but the argument mainly turns on whether the defendants can claim to remain in possession by virtue of the provisions of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 12 (1) (g), as amended by the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1935, s. 1. The relevant words are as follows:

"... the expression 'tenant' includes the widow of a tenant who was residing with him at the time of his death, or, where a tenant leaves no widow or is a woman, such member of the tenant's family so residing as aforesaid as may be decided in default of agreement by the county court."

Mr. Welton, the defendants' father, became tenant of the house in 1904. He died intestate in 1922. No letters of administration were taken out. His widow continued to reside in the house with the defendants, who are her daughters, and paid rent which was accepted until her death intestate in 1947. The plaintiff has refused to accept rent from the daughters. It has been held that the benefit of the words cited from s. 12 (1) (g) cannot be exercised on successive occasions. If, for example, when a husband dies, his widow remains in possession by virtue of s. 12 (1) (g), at her death a member of the family residing with her cannot claim the benefit of the section. The widow is not a "tenant" within the relevant words: Pain v. Cobb (1); Summers v. Donohue (2). It has been held by two recent decisions of this court that the words of s. 12 (1) (g) apply only where the deceased is at the time of his death a statutory tenant: Thynne v. Salmon (3); Smith v. Mather (4).

A The learned judge decided that when Mr. Welton died he was a contractual tenant. This contractual tenancy, assuming that it existed, vested at that time in the judges of the High Court. No notice to quit was served. The county court judge held that by reason of this outstanding contractual tenancy s. 12 (1) (g) could not apply, nor could the plaintiff enter into a new contractual tenancy with Mrs. Welton or anyone else. Mrs. Welton was not a tenant, and the defendants could not rely on s. 12 (1) (g). On the view I take it is unnecessary to decide this issue. I think, however, there is much to be said for the argument that where the deceased intestate had a contractual tenancy at his death, as found here by the judge, a landlord who accepted rent from a widow or anyone else would be estopped from himself disputing the existence of a tenancy as against that person. If he proceeds to serve that person with a notice of increase in the statutory form it may well be that he must recognise him as being a statutory tenant on whose death a member of his family residing with him would become entitled to rely on s. 12 (1) (g).

B
C The position on Mr. Welton's death is complicated. In 1920 he was served with documents purporting to be notices of increase of rent under ss. 2 and 3 of the Act of 1920. The increased rent as set out was paid. In Kerr v. Bryde (5) the House of Lords decided that a landlord could not validly increase rent as provided in the statute merely by giving a notice of increase, but that the contractual tenancy must first be determined, and that a notice of increase in statutory form did not itself operate as a notice to quit. The Rent Restrictions (Notices of Increase) Act, 1923, s. 1 (1), then provided :

E
F "Where notice of intention to increase rent has, whether before or after the passing of this Act, been served on a tenant in conformity with s. 3 (2) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (hereinafter referred to as the principal Act), and a notice to terminate the tenancy was necessary in order to make such increase effective, the notice of intention to increase the rent shall have effect and shall be deemed always to have had effect as if it were or had been also a notice to terminate the existing tenancy on the day immediately preceding the day as from which the increase is or was first to take effect, or on the earliest day thereafter on which if it had been a notice to terminate the tenancy, it would have been effective for that purpose, and in the latter case a notice of increase served before the passing of this Act shall be deemed to have had effect as if such earliest date had been specified in the notice as the date as from which the increase was to take effect."

G
H Unless, therefore, the notices of increase suffer from some further defect, this court would have to proceed on the basis that Mr. Welton became a statutory tenant as from the date when the first increase took effect, that is in 1920. The learned county court judge found the notices were defective. They cannot, I think, have been analysed before him as they were before us. All except a line at the foot is in statutory form. The notice dated July 9 sets out an increase in respect of rates, the increase under that head to date from July 19, "being one clear week from the date of this notice." This was correct and in accordance with the Act. The other increases are stated to date from Aug. 9, being "four clear weeks from the date of this notice." This was also in accordance with the Act. The increase in respect of rates was 8½d. a week, the other increases amounted to 1s. 4d. a week. As the rent was paid in arrear the 8½d. became due at least by July 26, and by Aug. 9 three weeks' increase at 8½d., namely, 2s. 1½d. would be due. The 1s. 4d. in respect of the other increases would become due at least on Aug. 16 and the total of the increases would bring the rent up from 5s. 6d. to 7s. 6½d. The words on which the argument turns are at the bottom of the form below the signature—"7s. 6½d. The rent to be paid on and after Monday, Aug. 9, 1920." The judge held that these words were demanding rent for one week short of the period of "four clear weeks which has to elapse under the 'Act.'" If in respect of all the increases four weeks had had to elapse, the learned judge would have been plainly right. In respect, however, of the increase based on an increase of rates there was due by Aug. 9 a sum of 2s. 1½d. to be added to the 5s. 6d., making 7s. 7½d. No doubt, the words are unfortunate in form. They do not, however, demand a sum in excess of that to which the landlord was entitled under the notice which was admittedly, apart from these words, in proper form and correct. In my opinion, this added sentence does not invalidate the notice. The notice, therefore, comes within s. 1 of the Act of 1923 and has effect and shall be deemed always to have had effect as if it had been an effective notice to terminate the existing tenancy. Under the Act we have to consider the legal position of Mr. Welton and of his widow as if the notice had had effect in July, 1920, as a notice to terminate, and, therefore, creating a statutory tenancy, as from the first day on which the first of the increases became effective.

There remains, however, a further point. In Summers v. Donohue (2) it was not disputed that the widow whose child was claiming the protection of the section continued in possession on her husband's death by virtue of s. 12 (1) (g). This is disputed here. If when a statutory tenant dies there is correspondence, and, for example, his widow asserts a right under s. 12 (1) (g), the matter, of course, is clear, and members of her family cannot on her death claim the protection of the section. Suppose, however, nothing is said. The widow—or it might on the "first occasion" be some other relative—simply continues to pay the rent. If it is clear that the person left in possession is within s. 12 (1) (g), then, in my opinion, the proper inference is that he or she is continuing in possession by virtue of the section. That is the position here, except for the fact that Mr. Welton as the law stood at the time of his death was not a statutory tenant. He was a contractual tenant either at the old rent, or at a rent increased by agreement up to the permitted maximum. The court, however, is precluded by the Act of 1923 from considering the position on the basis of the law as it was in October, 1922. By virtue of the retroactive effect of the Act, we have to treat Mr. Welton as a statutory tenant. It follows, in my opinion, that we have to treat Mrs. Welton as the widow of a statutory tenant, and as such entitled to the protection of s. 12 (1) (g), and, therefore, remaining in possession in virtue of the provisions of that section. If that is right, then, on the authorities to which I have referred, the defendants cannot claim the protection of that section. The appeal therefore fails.

HIDA v. NOLAN.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Greene, M.R., Tucker and Somervell, L.JJ.), October 11, 12, 29, 1948.]

County Court—Payment into court—Tender—Plea filed after payment in—Applicability of County Court Rules, 1936, Ord. 47, r. 8 (2).

A By County Court Rules, 1936, Ord. 47, r. 8 (2), it is provided: "Where money is paid into court without a denial of liability and without a plea of tender, and the plaintiff does not accept it in satisfaction of his claim . . . the Scale applicable to the costs incurred after the date of the payment into court shall, unless the court otherwise orders, be determined as follows: (a) Where the plaintiff recovers an amount in excess of the amount paid into court, his costs shall be taxed on the Scale applicable to the excess. B (b) Where the plaintiff fails to recover an amount in excess of the amount paid into court, the defendant's costs shall be taxed on the Scale applicable to the amount remaining in dispute."

C The plaintiff, a builder, sued the defendant for the sum of £100 in respect of work done and materials supplied. On July 17, 1947, the defendant filed a defence denying the claim. On Aug. 7, 1947, the defendant paid into court the sum of £69 9s. 7d. with an admission of liability. On Sept. 17, 1947, the defendant paid into court a further sum of £4 9s. 7d., "to cover the costs on the said sum of £69 9s. 7d.," and raised the alternative plea of tender. On Nov. 11, 1947, he paid a further £2 into court. On Apr. 8, 1948, the county court judge gave judgment for the plaintiff for £70 0s. 6d. D with costs on Scale C on the ground that there was a plea of tender and r. 8 (2) of Ord. 47 did not apply.

E HELD: where payment into court was made with an admission of liability and later a plea of tender was raised, the position ought to be considered as it was during the interval, and the plea of tender subsequently raised could not prevent Ord. 47, r. 8 (2), from operating.

F APPEAL by defendant from a decision of His Honour JUDGE RAWLINS at Wandsworth County Court, deciding that a certain payment into court was made with a plea of tender, the case thus being taken out of the provisions of the County Court Rules, 1936, Ord. 47, r. 8 (2). The Court of Appeal allowed the appeal. The facts appear in the headnote and the judgment of LORD GREENE, M.R.

Silkin for the defendant.

Cur. adv. vult.

H Oct. 29. LORD GREENE, M.R., read the following judgment. This appeal raises a curious point. The plaintiff, who is a builder, sued the defendant for the sum of £100 in respect of work and labour and materials supplied. The plaintiff was entered on July 5, 1947, and after long and intermittent proceedings, in part before the judge and in part before the registrar, the plaintiff, on Apr. 8, 1948, recovered judgment for £70 0s. 6d. with costs on Scale C. These costs were taxed at £89 7s. 8d. and it is an unfortunate feature of the case that for the purpose of recovering so small a sum a larger sum of costs had to be incurred. That circumstance, moreover, has led to the present appeal which is against that part only of the judgment which orders the defendant to pay all the costs of the action.

The relevant facts are as follows. On July 17, 1947, the defendant put in a defence in which he disputed the claim on the ground that the work was unsatisfactory and had not been completed, and that the amount claimed was not reasonable having regard to the nature and extent of the work. On Aug. 7, 1947, the defendant paid into court a sum of £69 9s. 7d. As no indication was given as to the nature of this payment it fell to be treated as a payment on account with an admission of liability. On Aug. 11, 1947, the plaintiff's solicitor wrote to the defendant's solicitor inquiring whether the sum paid in was in full settlement or on account of the claim, and whether it was paid in with an admission or denial of liability. To this letter the defendant's solicitor replied on Aug. 14, 1947, that the sum paid into court was with an admission and in full settlement. The plaintiff could have taken the money out of court in satisfaction without leave within three days after receipt of notice of payment (County Court Rules, 1936, Ord. 11, r. 9), or with leave after the expiration of three days (Ord. 11, r. 11). He did neither, preferring to proceed with his action for £100. Had nothing else happened he would, under Ord. 11, r. 9 (d), have been entitled to his costs down to payment in, but on recovering judgment for £70 0s. 6d. he would have been entitled only to such subsequent costs as would have been carried by the sum of 10s. 11d. (the excess of the sum recovered over the sum paid in) unless the court had otherwise ordered (Ord. 47, r. 8 (2) (a)). On Sept. 17, the defendant paid into court a further sum of £4 9s. 3d., and on the same day he delivered "Further and better particulars of defence," a document the concluding paragraphs of which have given rise to the present controversy. They are as follows:

"And take notice that the defendant pleads that on or about February, 1947, before action brought, at Eton Cafe, Balham High Road, he tendered to the plaintiff the sum of £69 9s. 7d. in settlement of his claim and has now paid this sum into court. And take notice that in addition to the sum of £69 9s. 7d. already paid into court and alternative to the plea of tender the defendant has to-day paid into court the sum of £4 10s. 0d. to cover the costs on the said sum of £69 9s. 7d."

The intended effect of these paragraphs is clear. In the first place, they raise a new defence of tender inconsistent with the admission of liability contained in the letter of Aug. 14. In the second place, the first of the two paragraphs purports to relate the first payment in of £69 9s. 7d. to the defence of tender—which is entirely inconsistent with the purpose of the payment as defined in that letter. In the third place, the second of the two paragraphs gives an attribution of the £69 9s. 7d. to a purpose other than the defence of tender, i.e., to the original purpose mentioned in the letter. This is clear from the fact that the sum of £4 9s. 3d. (described as £4 10s. 0d. in the particulars) is said to be paid in to cover the costs on the £69 9s. 7d. There could, of course, be no need to pay money into court for costs in connection with the plea of tender since, if that plea were to succeed, it would operate as a complete defence to the action and the defendant would not be liable for any costs. If, on the other hand, the plea of tender were to fail, the defendant claimed to be entitled to fall back on the alternative contained in the second paragraph, in which case the plaintiff would have been entitled to his costs down to the date of payment in, and it was to cover such costs that the additional sum of £4 9s. 3d. was paid in.

It is not surprising that the plaintiff complains of this pleading as embarrassing. On the other hand, he took no steps to compel the defendant to choose between the inconsistent alternatives which he was putting forward. That a party does not take such steps is, no doubt, more forgivable in a county court than it would be in the High Court, but the omission to do so left the plaintiff in this position. If the plea of tender were to be treated as having been properly raised and the attribution of the payment in to that plea were to be regarded as effective (and, if it were not, the plea of tender must fail: see Ord. 9, r. 4 (9)), then, if the plaintiff were to take the money out (which he could only do with leave : see Ord. 11, r. 10 (b)), he would probably have been ordered to pay the defendant's costs on the basis that the plea of tender must be treated as a good plea. If, on the other hand, he were to claim to take the money out as having been paid in otherwise than with a plea of tender, he might be met by the defendant claiming that he could not do so as that would prevent the defendant from making use of the plea of tender. The plaintiff made no attempt to free himself from this embarrassment by applying to have the pleading struck out or (what would, no doubt, have secured that result by bringing matters to a head) by applying for leave to take the money out of court under Ord. 11, r. 11. Instead, he elected to go on with the action in the hopes, no doubt, of recovering more but with the knowledge (which must be attributed to him) that he was only entitled to recover £70 0s. 6d.

To complete the statement of the relevant facts it is only necessary to mention two matters. At the first hearing before His Honour JUDGE PRATT on Sept. 25, it was held that part of the claim (amounting to £14) failed, and on Nov. 11, a further £2 was paid into court by the defendant on account, thus bringing the amount paid in (other than the £4 9s. 3d. paid in for costs) to £71 9s. 7d., i.e., £1 9s. 1d. more than the amount which the plaintiff ultimately recovered. In these circumstances the argument both before the county court judge and before this court on the question of costs was a simple one. Counsel for the plaintiff asserted that the payment in of the £69 9s. 7d. was or ought in the circumstances to be treated as payment in with a plea of tender. Counsel for the defendant, on the other hand, contended that the payment in was not and could not on the facts be treated as a payment in with a plea of tender. The materiality of the difference between these two contentions was, of course, this, that, if the payment in was or ought to be treated as payment in with a plea of tender, Ord. 47, r. 8 (2), would not apply. That sub-rule (so far as relevant) provides that :

“Where money is paid into court without a denial of liability and without a plea of tender, and the plaintiff does not accept it in satisfaction of his claim . . . the Scale applicable to the costs incurred after the date of the payment into court shall, unless the court otherwise orders, be determined as follows : (a) Where the plaintiff recovers an amount in excess of the amount paid into court, his costs shall be taxed on the Scale applicable to the excess. (b) Where the plaintiff fails to recover an amount in excess of the amount paid into court, the defendant's costs shall be taxed on the Scale applicable to the amount remaining in dispute.”

The county court judge clearly stated the two contentions and decided that the contention put forward on behalf of the plaintiff was correct. His note of the reasons for his judgment is admittedly based on counsel's note of what he had said in delivering the oral judgment, and, if his judgment had been a considered one, he would no doubt have used rather clearer language, but I find myself in no doubt as to what he meant, which is that the matter must be treated as it stood after the plea of tender, and that after this plea had been raised there was nothing to “compel” the plaintiff to take the money out, by which I understand him to mean that if the plaintiff did not do so he would not expose himself to the drastic provisions of Ord. 47, r. 8 (2). He went on to say that it was impossible for the plaintiff to take the money out “in such a way as to make it abundantly clear that he was taking it out in satisfaction or on account,” by which I understand him to mean that on the pleadings as they stood the defendant could have objected to his doing so on the ground which I have mentioned, i.e., that the result would have been to deprive the defendant from making effective use of his plea of tender. This examination of the judge's reasons makes it quite clear to me that all that he was deciding was that Ord. 47, r. 8 (2), did not apply. It was argued that he must be treated as having exercised in favour of the plaintiff the discretion which the sub-rule gives to the judge to depart from the provisions there laid down. Not only can I find no suggestion in the reasons that the judge conceived himself to be exercising a discretion, but the fact that he held that the payment in must be treated as a payment in with a plea of tender necessarily excluded the operation of the sub-rule and negatived the existence of the discretion which it gives.

The first question for decision is whether or not the judge was right in holding that the payment in ought to be treated as payment in with a plea of tender with the result that Ord. 47, r. 8 (2), did not apply. In my opinion, he was not. The plea of tender did not come into the case at all until Sept. 17, 1947, i.e., a month and ten days after the £69 9s. 7d. was paid in. During the whole of this period the position was governed by Ord. 47, r. 8 (2). The plaintiff had ample opportunity to take the money out and so protect himself from the consequences of the rule. He chose not to do so, but he cannot, in my opinion, shield himself from the consequences of his inaction by pointing to something which happened subsequently, namely, on Sept. 17, particularly when that something was an irregularity which, if he had taken appropriate proceedings, could have been put right. He now seeks to take advantage of that irregularity on the ground that it embarrassed him and rendered abortive the elaborate and beneficial provisions of the rule relating to money paid into court, with the result that subsequently to the payment in there have been five hearings before the registrar and three before the judge and the amount recovered exceeds the sum originally paid in by 10s. 11d. For this the defendant is, it is said, to pay the whole costs of the action. The county court judge noted the fact of the interval of time to which I have referred, but he thought that the position ought to be considered as it was after the plea of tender was first raised. I, on the other hand, think that the position ought to be considered as it was during the interval, and that the plea of tender subsequently attempted to be raised could not prevent Ord. 47, r. 8, from operating. By failing to make use of his power to take the money out the plaintiff brought the rule upon himself. Counsel for the defendant argued that in law the payment in could not ex post facto be related to the plea of tender subsequently raised. I do not find it necessary to decide this. It is sufficient, to my mind, that the plaintiff failed to take the opportunity given him and thereby brought the rule into operation.

The only question that remains is whether we should exercise the discretion which the rule gives to make a different order from that laid down by the rule. Speaking for myself, I would not do so. It is true that the defendant, by his own irregularities, is partly responsible for the question having arisen, but, as I have said, a month and ten days elapsed before any irregularity was committed, and when it was committed the plaintiff could have set it right.

The result, in my opinion, will be as follows:—(1) The plaintiff will have the costs of the action down to Aug. 7, 1947, on Scale C; (2) as the excess recovered over £69 9s. 7d. is less than £2 he will have no subsequent costs; (3) as the amount recovered was in excess of the amount paid in down to Nov. 11, 1947, when the £2 was paid in, the defendant is not entitled to any costs in respect of the period before that date; (4) as the plaintiff failed to recover an amount in excess of the amount paid in by Nov. 11, i.e., £71 9s. 7d., the defendant, under r. 8 (2) (b), is entitled to costs on the amount "remaining in dispute," i.e., £100 less £71 9s. 7d. or £28 10s. 5d. on Scale B subsequently to Nov. 11; (5) these costs will be set off; (6) the £4 9s. 3d. paid in in respect of costs on Sept. 17 will be paid out to the party entitled thereto as a result of the set off; (7) the defendants will have the costs of the appeal.

I am authorised by TUCKER, L.J., to say that he has read the judgment which I have delivered and agrees with it.

SOMERVELL, L.J. : I have had considerable doubt whether the learned county court judge proceeded to his conclusions on a decision that Ord. 47,

r. 8 (2), did not apply or whether he exercised his discretion on the facts as a whole without any error of law. On the basis of the judgment of the MASTER OF THE ROLLS that he did decide as a matter of law that Ord. 47, r. 8 (2), did not apply, I agree with my Lord's conclusion. I myself give less weight than he does to the plaintiff's inaction in the period from Aug. 7 to Sept. 17, and more to the fact that the plaintiff took no steps to have the matter cleared up after the particulars of defence, with the attempt to appropriate the money in court as a tender and in the alternative, had been delivered. I agree in the result that the appeal should be allowed and with the order as set out in the MASTER OF THE ROLLS' judgment.

Appeal allowed with costs. Order as to costs below varied accordingly.

REX v. BOARD OF CONTROL (SECRETARY). Ex parte
ABDUL KAYUM.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Humphreys and Byrne, JJ.).
October 19, 1948.]

Mental Deficiency—Person detained by order of a court—Order for transfer to institution for defectives—Date of expiration of order—Power of Board of Control to make a general order for extension—Mental Deficiency Act, 1913 (c. 28), s. 11.

The Mental Deficiency Act, 1913, s. 11 (1) provides: "An order made under this Act that a defective be sent to an institution or placed under guardianship shall expire at the end of one year from its date, unless continued in manner hereinafter provided: Provided that in the case of any institution the Board may by order direct that orders that persons be sent thereto shall, unless continued as hereinafter provided, expire on the quarter day next after the day on which the order would have expired under the above provision." By an order dated April, 1915, the Board directed that "the date of the expiration of the order or authority for detention of all persons detained in certified institutions and certified houses shall be extended to the quarter day next after the day on which the said order or authority for detention would otherwise have expired." In an application for a writ of habeas corpus it was argued that (i) the order of 1915 was invalid because there was no power in the Board to make an order of general application but only to deal with each institution individually, and (ii) that the proviso to s. 11 (1) applied only to persons detained at the time of the coming into force of the Act.

HELD: the order of 1915 was within the Board's powers under s. 11, and the application of the proviso to s. 11 (1) was not limited as contended.

APPEAL from a decision of SLADE, J., in chambers, refusing an application for a writ of habeas corpus.

On Nov. 5, 1946, the Minister of Health made an order transferring J.E.D. from detention under an order of a court to an institution for defectives, and on Jan. 6, 1948, made a further retrospective order continuing the former order in force for one year from Dec. 25, 1947. The appellant contended that the second order was invalid on the ground that it was not made within one month of the date of expiration of the first order as required by the Mental Deficiency Act, 1938, s. 1 (1). Under the Mental Deficiency Act, 1913, s. 11 (1), an order sending a person to an institution expired a year after its date unless continued in the case of any institution by order of the Board of Control until the ensuing quarter day. The Board had made an order in April, 1915, continuing all such orders until the quarter day following the date of expiration under the Act. The appellant contended that this order of the Board was invalid because it applied to all institutions whereas a separate order should have been made in respect of each institution; and that the Minister's order, therefore, expired on Nov. 5, 1947, more than a month before Jan. 6, 1948. It was also contended that the power of continuing orders could only be exercised in relation to persons detained in institutions at the date of the coming into force of the Mental Deficiency Act, 1913. The court rejected these contentions and dismissed the appeal.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: I think SLADE, J., was right. Under the Mental Deficiency Act, 1913, s. 9, it is provided:

"Where the Secretary of State is satisfied from the certificate of two duly qualified medical practitioners that any person who is undergoing . . . detention in a place of detention by order of a court . . . is a defective, the Secretary of State may order that he be transferred therefrom and sent to an institution for defectives . . ."

The subject of the application, Miss D., was detained under an order of the court and by an order of the Minister of Health, dated Nov. 5, 1946, she was sent to an institution for defectives, the Devon and Exeter Girls' School at Exeter. Section 11 of the Act provides:

"(1) An order made under this Act that a defective be sent to an institution or placed under guardianship shall expire at the end of one year from its date, unless continued in manner hereinafter provided: Provided that in the case of any institution the Board [of Control] may by order direct that orders that persons be sent thereto shall, unless continued as hereinafter provided, expire on the quarter day next after the day on which the orders would have expired under the above provision."

By sub-s. (2) provision is made for the extension of orders from time to time. The proviso to s. 11 (1) seems to me to be framed with a view to distinguishing the cases of persons detained in institutions and the cases of persons placed under guardianship. The proviso has no application to persons placed under guardianship, and orders placing persons under guardianship will expire unless continued as provided by sub-s. (2) at the end of one year. It is clear that Parliament considered it desirable—I should think for the convenience of administration—that these orders relating to persons in institutions should be capable of extension by order of the Board of Control, so that all such orders will expire on one or other of the four quarter days.

This Act having come into force on Apr. 1, 1914, in April, 1915, the Board of Control made an order directing that "the date of the expiration of the order or authority for detention of all persons detained in certified institutions and certified houses shall be extended to the quarter day next after the day on which the said order or authority for detention would otherwise have expired." By the Mental Deficiency Act, 1938, s. 1, it was provided that an order having retrospective effect could be made continuing a detention order "within one month after the date on which, but for the provisions of this sub-section, the detention order would be limited to expire." The effect of that is that, if the general order of Apr. 10, 1915, is valid, the order for detention of this young woman would be extended by that order to Christmas Day, 1947; and by virtue of the Mental Deficiency Act, 1938, there was one month, that is to say, till Jan. 25, 1948, for the extension of that order. If the order of 1915 is valid, it must be conceded that the young woman is in lawful custody at this mental home.
